TWENTY-FIRST CONGRESS...SECOND SESSION:

FROM DECEMBER 6, 1830, TO MARCH 3, 1831.

DEBATES IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1830.

This day, at twelve o'clock, the roll having been called over by the Secretary of the Senate, [WALTER LOWRIE] it appeared that there were present thirty-five members; whereupon, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, took the chair, and called the Senate to order. The Secretary was directed to acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate was assembled, and ready to proceed to business; who returned, and informed the Senate that the other House had adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate that a quorum of that House had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

The usual standing committees of the Senate were then appointed.

A communication having been received from the House of Representatives, announcing the adoption by that House of a resolution for the appointment of a committee, on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, in conjunction with a committee on the part of the Senate, and to inform him that both Houses had organized, and were ready to receive any communication that he might be pleased to make to them, the Senate concurred in the resolution, and appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee, subsequently reported that they had performed that duty, and had received for answer from the President, that he would, this day, at half past one o'clock, make a communication, in writing, to both Houses of Congress.

In a few minutes the annual message was received from the President, by A. J. DONELSON, his private Secretary. Five thousand copies of the message, and fifteen hundred copies of the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. [For the message, see Appendix.]

The bill authorizing a subscription to the Louisville and Portland canal, returned by the President with objections to it, was laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8.

The several subjects comprised in the message of the President of the United States were this day referred to the appropriate committees. No other business was transacted.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9.

THE CURRENCY.

On motion of Mr. SANFORD, of New York, it was Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to consider the state of the current coins, and to report such amendments of the existing laws concerning coins as may be deemed expedient.

HONORS TO THE DEAD.

Mr. ELLIS said, that, in consequence of the lamented death of his late colleague, the Honorable ROBERT H. ADAMS, he rose to present a resolution to the consideration of the Senate. The deceased was a native of Rockbridge county, Virginia. After completing the course of his education in Washington college, he studied law, and at an early period emigrated to Knoxville, in Tennessee, where he pursued his profession with unremitting zeal and great success. To a mind at once clear and comprehensive, it appeared perceptible that his prospects would be more flattering in the lower country, and he removed to Natchez, Mississippi, in 1819. There, in the midst of a numerous and talented bar, without fortune or family influence, by the force of high intellectual endowments and pleasing manners, he rapidly rose to the highest honors of his profession. Surrounded, as he was, by an intelligent and extensive acquaintance, he was not long permitted to enjoy the enviable distinction arising from professional merit alone. In January last, he was called by the Legislature of his adopted State to a seat in the councils of the nation. Here he was too well known to require eulogy. Mr. E. would only say, that the death of so young a man, distinguished as he was, must be a loss to the nation. It was publicly, deeply, and universally deplored in the State which he had the honor in part to represent. He, therefore, moved the following resolution; which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the Honorable ROBERT H. ADAMS, deceased, late a Senator of this body from the State of Mississippi, will go into mourning for one month, by wearing crape on the left arm.

Mr. KANE, of Illinois, said, that a paper which he had presented on the first day of the session, announced to the Senate the decease of his late colleague, JOHN McLEAN, of Illinois. He died, after a short illness, at his residence, on the 14th day of October last. Though not a native of the State which he represented, he might well be claimed as one of the favorite sons of Illinois. He had removed there at an early age. There he commenced his career in life; a career of usefulness and distinction, which had fallen to the lot of few in that region of country. In private life, he was remarkable for his benevolence, frankness, and independence of character. No one in the circle in which he moved had a larger share of the confidence and affections of his fellow men. He was by profession a lawyer, possessed of a vigorous mind, a rapid but easy elocution. These qualifications, added to an honesty of purpose, universally accorded to him, raised him to the front rank of his profession; and there sustained him. As a statesman, the people of Illinois would long remember him as the author of many of the most valued portions of their statute books, and as the acute and able presiding officer over the deliberations of the most numerous branch of their Legislature. Mr. McLEAN had been twice elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States, and his last election was the result of the unanimous vote of the members of both branches of the General Assembly. In the state of things which then existed, no stronger evidence of the general esteem in which he was held by those who knew him best could well be given. In order to pay a proper respect to the memory of such a man, Mr. KANE moved the adoption of the following resolution; which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, for the purpose of showing a proper respect to the memory of the Honorable JOHN McLEAN, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Illinois, will go into mourning for one month, by wearing crape on the left arm.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, of Mississippi, it was also Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional evidence of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators from Mississippi and Illinois, the Senate do now adjourn, to meet on Monday next, at eleven o'clock.

MONDAY, DEC. 13.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PECK.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the adoption by that House of a replication to the answer and plea of Judge Peck to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by them.

At twelve o'clock, the Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Peck, of Missouri, was opened in due form by proclamation from the Marshal of the District of Columbia. The Senators were ranged on two sets of benches, covered with green cloth, to the right and left of the Chair occupied by the President of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURN, the Secretary was ordered to inform the House of Representatives, that the Senate had organized itself into a Court of Impeachment for the trial of James H. Peck, judge of the District Court of the United States for the district of Missouri, and were ready to proceed to the trial; and that seats had been prepared for the reception and accommodation of the members of the House of Representatives.

Shortly after the order was passed the respondent, accompanied by Mr. WIRT and Mr. MEREDITH, his counsel, appeared at the bar of the Senate. They were conducted to seats, with a table before them, prepared for their convenience.

In a few minutes, the managers, to conduct the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, also came in, and took their seats.

Mr. BUCHANAN, one of the managers, rose and said, that the managers, on the part of the House of Representatives, were ready to present the replication of that House, to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the District Court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by that body. He then read the replication, as follows:

"The House of Representatives of the United States, having considered the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the District Court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment against him, by them exhibited, in the name of themselves, and of all the People of the United States, reply, that the said James H. Peck is guilty, in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him, at such convenient time and place as shall be appointed for that purpose."

The Court, after some preliminary business, adjourned to Monday next, and the Senate till to-morrow.

[The notices of this trial, which will be found in the following pages, embrace only such reports as were given from day to day, through the columns of the National Intelligencer, for the public information, and to convey a general idea of the merits of the case, and the course and character of the trial. They are mere sketches, and are to be received as such only. A full report of the trial—the testimony and the arguments of the managers and counsel—making a large volume, has been published separately.]

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

This day was principally consumed in receiving and referring petitions, and in the consideration of Executive business.

The Senate elected the Rev. HENRY VAN DYKE JOHNS to be their Chaplain for the current session.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 15.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate took up for consideration the following resolution, which was yesterday submitted by Mr. CLAYTON:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report the present condition of the Post Office Department; in what manner the laws regulating that department are administered; the distribution of labor; the number of clerks, and the duties assigned to each; the number of agents; where and how employed; the compensation of contractors; and, generally, the entire management of the department; and whether further, and what, legal provisions may be necessary to secure the proper administration of its affairs."

Mr. WHITE had no objection to the proposed inquiry; but he felt generally indisposed to the raising of special committees, where the subject matter of a resolution belonged properly to a standing committee. He, therefore, hoped that the honorable mover of this resolution would so modify it as to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, unless he could assign some reason for sending it to a special committee.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed the opinion that this inquiry was not necessarily the business of the Post Office Committee. That committee had arduous and important duties to perform. The session would be short, and they would probably not have time to attend to any other matters than those which ordinarily belonged to them. He thought that the importance of the subject now proposed required its reference to a special committee. He did not, therefore, feel inclined to accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Post Office Department.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WHITE said he would then move that the resolution be so modified as to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. There was nothing in it which was not proper for reference to the regular committee. If the whole affairs of the department were to be examined and considered, the investigation would impart to that committee a fund of information, which would prove useful to them hereafter.

Mr. HOLMES hoped that the resolution would not be so amended. A great deal of labor would have to be performed by this committee. It would be their duty to examine the department well; to see how the business in it was done, and to present the result to the Senate, that they might act upon it as circumstances might require, and the information obtained might go forth to the public for their consideration. It had been understood that a new bureau for removals and appointments had been established in the Post Office Department; a bureau, which, for brevity, might be called the bureau of proscription. It had had a good deal to do: it had done a good deal: its business must be nearly at an end. All had probably been touched by it, whom it could well lay its hands on. Its services might now, perhaps, be dispensed with. He also hoped that the time would soon come when the department could pay all the expenditures with the receipts of the year. It appeared that upwards of eighty thousand dollars had been taken out of the surplus fund to defray the expenses. He admitted that this fund had been also heretofore diminished; but he trusted that it might not be hereafter necessary to apply to it. He was in favor of referring this examination to a special committee, whose particular attention should be directed to that object.

Mr. GRUNDY said that, a member of the Post Office Committee, he ought, perhaps, to be sparing in his remarks on the question before the Senate. Gentlemen were, however, mistaken as to the burthen of business which that committee had to perform. They had nothing to do, except what might be specifically imposed upon them by the Senate. He was indifferent about the disposition which might be made of this resolution, but the duty of the Post Office committee was connected with the business of that department. It was a duty especially assigned to them. They were to ascertain what laws were defective, and in what manner they should be amended. He did not object to the proposed scrutiny; and if it were committed to other members, he should cheerfully acquiesce. He was no fonder of labor than other gentlemen. If the examination were assigned to the Post Office Committee, he, for one, would be willing to engage in it.

Mr. HOLMES observed that the practice of referring duties of this kind to special committees was not novel. It was not unusual in the other House. When there, he had been a member of a committee of investigation. The House had given them the power to send for persons and papers. Some of the heads of Departments had been brought before them. The committee had made a thorough examination, and had discovered some abuses which required correction. A new administration was now in power, and it might be well for the Senate to take a peep behind the Executive curtain. In the Post Office Department great changes have been made; mistakes, errors, abuses, might have crept in. It was, therefore, proper, in order that the subject might undergo a full and thorough examination, that it should be referred to a special committee.

Mr. NOBLE said that he did not mean to be tedious, but he should tell the truth. Great complaints had been made against this department. There was Obadiah B. Brown—he did not wish to be rough—and there were the relations of Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, who had large contracts with that department for carrying the mail. Worthy and honorable citizens felt aggrieved at the favoritism shown by this department. It was well known, that in that and other departments of the Government, they who were the most in the habit of dancing attendance, were the most successful in their applications. Rash as this declaration might be considered in him, he had said it, and he should not retract. Let these departments be brought to the bar of justice, and tested by their conduct. If he were one of the majority, he would not withhold an inquiry into the conduct of any officer, even from Andrew Jackson down to the humblest menial. He meant in this remark no allusion to the high minded and honorable public officers who differed from him in politics. He respected them as much as any gentleman. A star from the West would shortly appear here. He hailed its approach. Mr. NOBLE then inquired of the Secretary, who was the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads? And, upon being informed by the chair that it was Mr. GRUNDY, he inquired whether Mr. BINN, of Kentucky, was not also a member of that committee? [The CHAIR said not.] Mr. NOBLE said that he meant no disrespect by the question. Mr. BINN was the chairman at the last session, and he had thought that he was a member at present. He declared that a rigid committee was required on the present occasion. The sooner the Augean stable was cleansed the better. It would be better to have a special committee for the purpose. He referred, as a precedent in point, to a similar investigation into the General Post Office affairs some years ago, by a special committee, of which that distinguished reformer, the present Secretary of the Treasury, had been the chairman. He also alluded to that other chief of reformers, whose late message had shut up the great outlet of the West.

Mr. BELL said, that many complaints had been made concerning the Post Office Department. They had lately been more general than at any other time. He did not say that they were well founded, but they deserved the attention of the Senate. It had been the general practice to refer particular investigations into the manner in which executive duties of the Government had been performed, to special committees. He did not know why this practice should be departed from on this occasion. It was proper that this inquiry should go to gentlemen disposed to make the most thorough investigation. If gentlemen were convinced that the complaints were unfounded, they ought to permit those to make the investigation who were impressed with the opinion that an investigation was necessary, because a report from such a committee in favor of the Department would be satisfactory to every body. It was due, therefore, to those who desired the inquiry, as well as to the Postmaster-General himself, that it should go to a special committee. These reasons induced him to vote against the motion to amend.

Mr. KING said, that gentlemen seemed to treat this subject as if any member of the Senate were opposed to the inquiry.

Mr. BELL explained. He assured the gentleman from Alabama that it had not been his intention to make any such suggestion.

Mr. KING considered that the Post Office committee was composed of as honest and as honorable men as any other members of the Senate. As to their having too much to do, it was notorious that they had little or nothing to do, until after the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives had made their report. Unless some effect different from a fair exposition were intended or expected from this inquiry, he could imagine no reason for taking it out of the hands of the standing committee to which it properly belonged. Was it proposed to refer the subject to a special committee in order to impress a belief in the existence of extraordinary complaints and of abuses? He was no apologist for any department. If any head of a department had done wrong, let him be brought before a committee; let him be censured, or even punished, if punishment was proper. He did not believe that the individual now at the head of the Post Office would shrink from any investigation, if it were intimated to him that it was desired. He had administered that department with integrity, skill, and ability. His predecessor did the same. Mr. KING hoped the inquiry would be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed a hope, that gentlemen would not suppose that he wished to take this inquiry from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because of any want of confidence in them. He had no such idea. Because he had confidence in that committee, did it follow that this special and laborious investigation should be referred to them? The same argument would apply with equal force against the reference of any other proposition to a special committee. Were not other standing committees composed also of honorable men? The objection, if it were sound, would apply on all occasions. He had as great confidence as any gentleman in the judgment and ability of the Post Office Committee. Yet, on this occasion, he preferred a committee selected by the Senate itself for this special purpose. In regard to that committee having nothing to do, it was an erroneous idea. Petitions and memorials were presented every day, over and over again, and referred to that committee. They would have to examine and prepare reports on all these. The duty of the proposed special committee would be arduous and laborious. The standing committee would not have time to investigate the whole subject. Gentlemen could vote for the members of that committee as members of the special committee, if they pleased; but nothing was fairer than that the Senate should select a committee for themselves.

Mr. KING said, that the Senate was a small body. Was there a member in it who was not on some committee? If the honorable Senator had no particular objection to the gentlemen composing the Post Office Committee, and, upon his soul, he did not know who they were—why refer this resolution to other gentlemen having equally or more arduous duties to perform on other committees?

Mr. CLAYTON replied, that some of the members of the Post Office Committee had other arduous duties to perform also. The gentleman might, however, in the selection of a committee, judge for himself, as he should, in this respect.

Mr. WHITE had not expected, when he had made the motion before the Senate, as much debate as had arisen upon the subject. He had listened to it with attention; but it had not changed his original views. If the subject-matter of a resolution applied to a standing committee, the general rule was to refer it to that committee. He admitted that there were exceptions to the rule; but every object of inquiry in this resolution belonged to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. There was nothing in it that could take it out of the general rule. Under this impression, he had made the motion now before the Senate. He could not believe that the Post Office Committee were so much pressed as gentlemen supposed. They had as much leisure as any other committee. They were familiar with the business of the department. It would be injustice to them to suppose that they could desire to suppress any investigation. They would no doubt give to the subject the fullest and freest examination. If any abuse existed, let it be brought to the notice of the Senate and the nation. He thought it more proper to refer the resolution to the standing committee, than to a special committee: but he should acquiesce in whatever decision the Senate might come to on the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERS concurred with the honorable Senator in the general principle which he had laid down; but he thought that it had been misapplied on this occasion. When the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was created, did it enter the mind of the President or of the Senate that the duties enjoined by this resolution were to be committed to them? These duties were not of the nature of those which belonged to a standing committee. It results from the character and object of standing committees, that a vast variety of items were referred to them in the ordinary transaction of the business of the Senate. These were, generally, as much as they could attend to. He believed that, if a standing committee had even taken up any subject like that contemplated by the resolution, a knowledge of it had never passed beyond the walls of the room in which they had deliberated. Duties specifically belonging to a standing committee should go to it, as a matter of course; but the proposed inquiry was one which was peculiarly appropriate to a special committee. He did not mean to compliment; all the members on this floor stood on an equal footing. His objection was not to the integrity of the Post Office committee; but they had not been selected with a view to this investigation. This was a question of selection; and he should vote for the resolution as offered by his honorable friend from Delaware.

The question on the motion to amend, so as to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was taken by yeas and nays, and the vote was 18 Yeas, and 20 Nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Benton, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Grundy, Hendricks, Iredell, Kane, King, Poindexter, Sanford, Smith, of Md., Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Willey—20.

The original resolution, as offered by Mr. CLAYTON, was then adopted.

Mr. BELL then moved that a committee of five be appointed, by ballot, to take charge of the resolution.

Mr. GRUNDY inquired of the Chair what was the rule of the Senate in relation to the appointment of committees?

The President read the rule, by which it appeared that the power to appoint committees belonged to the Chair. That power, however, could be exercised by the Senate, by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRUNDY said that would not be given.

Mr. FOOT asked whether the rule of the Senate could not be altered or amended?

Mr. KING replied, that it could, by giving a day's notice.

Here the conversation ended, and the President announced the appointment of Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. HOLMES, Mr. WOODBURY, and Mr. HENDRICKS, as the committee.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. NOBLE said, he had understood that, in the report of his remarks yesterday on the resolution respecting the Post Office Department, which had appeared in the Telegraph, he had used language that had been offensive to some of his friends. He had been reported as having represented Colonel Richard M. Johnson as an agent to that Department. He had no recollection that he had made such remark. A different report of his speech had been made in the National Intelligencer. He had made allusion to some of the friends of that gentleman as having contracts with the Department. This he could not disguise. But it would have been wrong and unjust to represent Colonel Johnson as an agent of the Post Office, because he was a member of Congress, and was prohibited, by law, from accepting any office of that kind. He did not consider that it would be honorable in him to do injustice to his fellow men, whether in that House, in the other House, or out of the House, whether they differed with him in politics or not.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17.

After disposing of several private bills, and the consideration of Executive business, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 20.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment, for the trial of Judge Peck, of Missouri.

The House of Representatives, preceded by their managers, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. McDUFFIE, Judge SPENCER, Mr. STORRS, and Mr. WICKLIFFE, came into the Senate chamber in a body, and having taken the seats prepared for them,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and said, that the managers on the part of the House of Representatives were now prepared to proceed in this trial.

Mr. MEREDITH, one of the counsel for the respondent, desired that the witnesses summoned in his behalf might be called.

The Marshal accordingly called over their names. Some of them did not answer.

Mr. MEREDITH observed, that three of the material witnesses for the respondent were not present. We are, said he, notwithstanding, ready to go to trial.

Mr. McDUFFIE then rose, and opened the case for the prosecution in substance as follows:

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that, in opening this case, he should endeavor to reduce to the narrowest limits the preliminary view, which he proposed to take of the principles upon which he should invoke the judgment of this honorable court on the charge set forth in the article of impeachment against the respondent now upon his trial. It was unnecessary for him to attract the special attention of the court, by any exposition of the importance of the case. Every member of this honorable court must be aware of its great importance to the respondent himself, and to the country at large. He asked that patient attention, in the consideration of the case, which was indispensable to a correct decision upon it. He then proceeded to lay down the principles of the constitution and law upon the subject of contempts, and contended that Judge Peck had violated them, and had, in the summary punishment which he had inflicted upon Mr. Lawless, been guilty of an illegal and tyrannical usurpation of power. Whatever view the court might take of the powers of the judge, he maintained that no contempt had been committed. The common law of England was utterly unknown to the judicial tribunals of the United States. Upon what principle, he demanded, could it be contended that the English common law, as such, had any force in this country? Were it not that it had been partly adopted in some of the States by legislative enactments; had we not been educated in its principles; would it occur to any human being in this country that it had any existence here? It was utterly absurd to say that the common law was in force in the courts of the United States. He granted that, as respected many of our laws and acts of Congress, especially those which provided for the organization of our courts, they were expounded according to the principles and rules of the common law. Where our courts were called upon to decide cases, they must have rules of proceeding and action, and he agreed that for these they had wisely and properly resorted to the common law. These were wise rules of action for cases within the express jurisdiction of the courts. But, with regard to crimes and punishments, the principles of the common law had no force in our tribunals. He was aware it might be said, that it was necessary for the courts to adopt some principle which would authorize them to maintain their jurisdiction by punishing for contempts committed within and against it. But the power of punishing for contempt was a high criminal power; and, although it had been exercised by courts of chancery as well as law, it was, of all others, the most dangerous that could be enforced. He maintained that the power could not legally or constitutionally be exercised so as to disfranchise a citizen, or to deprive him of his liberty and the means of his existence. The correct principle, then, was this: the courts of the United States had no power to punish for contempt, further than their own self-preservation required. It was necessary that they should possess the power to protect themselves in the administration of justice; to prevent and punish direct outrages upon the court; to prevent the judge from being driven from the bench, the jury from being assaulted, and the regular and fair administration of justice from being impeded. This power the courts possessed independently of the laws of the United States, or the common law. The right to punish in such cases was inherent. But how far did it extend? What principle of necessity, the tyrant's plea, would justify the exercise of this power? for nothing but necessity could justify it. It could be enforced only so far as to protect the courts in the administration of justice; to prevent any obstruction in their proceedings. It must be a flagrant outrage in the face of the court to justify a summary punishment for contempt. If, in such cases, our courts had not the power to protect themselves in the discharge of their high functions, it would be in vain for them to attempt to administer justice. Certain powers, however, had been imperceptibly introduced here from the common law courts of England; our judges and lawyers had been thus imbued with certain principles, which were utterly incompatible with liberty. What was the case of the respondent? He was not in court; he was not in the actual administration of justice, when the publication of Mr. Lawless was made. He claimed the power of protecting his sacred person, like the King of England, from all scrutiny! The judgment of the court had been rendered six months before the publication. The decree had been entered. There was an end to the judicial functions of the judge as to that case. But some four or five months after judgment rendered, Judge Peck, from some motive, no doubt having reference to the public interest, thought proper to come out and publish an extra-judicial opinion in the newspapers: a labored argument, prepared after his judicial functions had ceased, to make such an impression upon the land claimants in Missouri as should correspond with his own. And it was this extra-judicial opinion which he sought to protect from all scrutiny, by the principles of the common law; upon the principle that the king could do no wrong, and that the judge was, as the representative of the king, administering his justice, equally exempt from responsibility.

Was there any thing in this case to justify the exercise of such an extraordinary power, as that assumed by the judge, to commit and suspend Mr. Lawless? Was justice likely to be impeded, because, by an extra-judicial act of the judge himself, his opinion was subjected to public discussion? Suppose the article written by Mr. Lawless to have been, what it was not, an atrocious libel, founded in falsehood, an infamous and defamatory libel, where was the evil? What injury could it have done to the administration of justice? Was it a case of emergency? No, sir. It would have been an ordinary case of libel, which could just as well have been punished, through the ordinary channel of trial by jury, in two years, as any other libel. Admit the impunity of Judge Peck from scrutiny; suppose him to have been administering the king's justice, and to have been protected from all animadversion; where then was the necessity for inflicting punishment by a mode of trial which excluded all investigation; without any trial in fact: without investigation; without the interposition of a jury? Would any man of sense contend, on these principles, that the judges of the United States had any power, any right, to punish any libel, however flagitious, on any act of the court, after it had been done as a contempt? Had the people no right to discuss the principles of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States? Had a South Carolina editor, for example, no right to examine the opinion of that court in the case of Cohen, and to produce it as evidence that the judges were the ministers of despotism? He demanded of this honorable court, whether there was any unmeasured language of reprobation, in which a citizen might not incline towards a court for pronouncing an opinion, and proclaiming principles dangerous to liberty, and to the free institutions of his country? Would the Supreme Court send the Marshal to South Carolina or Louisiana to bring such an editor before them for contempt, and to punish him by the summary process of attachment? From his knowledge of that court, and of the Chief Justice, he had no hesitation in saying that they would unanimously, and with one accord, decide that they were a court of limited powers; that they did not possess any authority on the subject of contempts, except the inherent power to protect themselves in the administration of justice, and to prevent its obstruction. To support his argument, Mr. McD. adverted to the seditious law, not for the purpose of exciting any prejudice, or reviving any party feeling, in this honorable court, but as furnishing some analogy for the illustration of the present case. That law was thoroughly understood by every public man in the country. It was settled in the public mind to be an usurpation. Every man of understanding considered it to have been unconstitutional. And yet it was a mitigation of the common law of England. It exploded the monstrous heresy, that the greater the truth the greater would be the libel. But it was deemed unconstitutional. Congress were condemned not for having passed an act which mitigated the principles of the common law of England, but because they had no authority to pass any law restricting the liberty of speech or of the press; because they had conferred on the federal courts a power to punish for contempt any man who might utter or publish what they might deem a libel. Was not this a grievance? The law had been repealed: it had become universally odious. And now, the President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, together, did not possess the power which Judge Peck, representing the King of England, and administering his justice, claimed, of punishing a citizen for contempt, in daring to question the infallibility of his opinion. Whence did he derive a power which did not belong to the united functionaries of this Government? Under the seditious law, the citizen accused of a libel was entitled to a trial by jury, and to give the truth in evidence.

By its repeal, the people of the United States had decided that the President, Senate, and House of Representatives could not subject a citizen even to trial by a jury for the most defamatory libel. But here, in this case, the judge undertakes, not by the interposition of a jury, but of his own will, to punish for a contempt imagined by himself, which nobody else would have noticed or viewed as a contempt. Without law, this honorable judge claimed a power to punish, much greater than that which was possessed by every other branch of the Government united. He claimed a power to make the law, and punish under it, at the same moment. This was the most infamous and tyrannical of the whole tissue of usurpations. We had analogies in the acts of Congress bearing on this case. By the judicial act of 1789, the federal courts have the power to punish for contempts committed during the progress of a trial of any cause depending in court. In carrying this law into effect, they might punish any act tending to impede the course of justice, any insult to the court or jury, any contempt perpetrated in the face of the court, by fine and imprisonment. The express grant of one power was the negation of another. The power conferred by this act raised a presumption that Congress had not intended to go further; that the federal courts possessed no other or greater authority in relation to contempts. He humbly conceived that the kind of punishment indicated by that act, was that by fine and imprisonment alone. If it were, it would be most extraordinary that the courts should claim the power to punish in any other way than by fine and imprisonment. Unquestionably, they did not possess any such authority. What argument, then, could justify the respondent? Although Congress had authorized only fine and imprisonment for the higher grades of contempt, the respondent claimed the power to inflict a greater punishment for the milder grades. In any view, whether we regarded the common law, the laws or usages of our own country, or of England, or the principles of the constitution, our courts and judges could not inflict a greater punishment for contempt than fine and imprisonment: they could not inflict disfranchisement: they could not deprive a man of his occupation, his inheritance, or the means of subsisting his family. Such a power was never claimed before by any tribunal in the civilized world.

It must be apparent, by this time, that the district court of Missouri had no power to punish a citizen of the United States for contempt, further than to protect the court in the actual administration of justice. Even the principles of the common law conferred no semblance of authority to punish a contempt against the majesty of a court. What was the principle assumed in regard to contempts by the courts of England? In the case of the King against Almon, which was no case at all, a mere extra-judicial opinion of Chief Justice Wilmut, found among his papers after his death, all the principles laid down in it were the principles of unmitigated judicial despotism. This ingenious and artful tissue assumed, that the judges of England, deriving their authority from the King of England, and administering the King's justice, were an emanation of his power, and that the same principle which protected the character and person of the King, as sacred, protected those of his judges in like manner. This opinion was going the whole. The judges, sitting in the seat of the King, could not be called to account for denying the writ of habeas corpus, or refusing to grant it, without making the King violate his coronation oath! This miserable tissue of sophistry and falsehood was used to justify the punishment of a fair and manly publication on the law of habeas corpus as a contempt! God forbid that any man in this country should say that the opinions of judges were not a fair subject of animadversion, or that the proceedings of this honorable body were not also open for discussion. No man, according to this doctrine, had a right to publish any thing, true or false, concerning any public functionary, disparaging him, his character, or opinions. This principle of the English courts, a district judge of the United States has had the boldness to advance to justify his judicial tyranny. Could this be law? Any publication against a private citizen was prima facie a libel: it was the private individual that ought to be protected from calumny. The same immunity did not belong to the public functionary. What might properly be punished for being said against a private citizen, it would be justifiable to say against a public functionary. There was hardly any thing, true or false, that ought not, with impunity, to be allowed to be published against a public man, rather than run the hazard of restricting the liberty of discussion. By the irreversible decision of the people of the United States upon the seditious law, it had been decided that you cannot punish any thing said against a public officer. A decision so unanimous as that was did not exist on record. He would now barely call the attention of this honorable court to one or two British authorities to satisfy them that Judge Peck had been guilty of a high misdemeanor, even if we admitted the force of the common law in this country. Some of the elementary English authors carried the doctrine of contempt further than others.

Blackstone, in whose work, unfortunately for many of us, we were educated as a text book, supported the authority of the King on all occasions, and spoke of the right of the court to punish for consequential contempts. But even he did not push the doctrine as far as this tyrannical judge had done. Hawkins broadly laid down the principle, that any words, however true or false, which might be uttered, reproachful of the judge, were immediately finable by the court; but that the better opinion was, that a man could not be punished for words said against a judge not in the actual execution of his official duties. If a man said that a judge was a numskull, and deserved to be hanged for giving such an opinion, here was contemptuous as well as reproachful language; but the man could not be punished for it. This had been laid down by a writer who pushed the King's prerogative to its utmost limits. Such a man might say to a judge, out of court, "your opinion is a fair subject of investigation: I have a right to pronounce you a fool or a scoundrel." This language would not be a proper subject of indictment. He would not pretend to compare language so contemptuous and disrespectful as this to the publication, by Mr. Lawless, of "A Citizen," for which his majesty Judge Peck had imprisoned, suspended, and disfranchised the author. His was a respectful and harmless publication. He would produce another English elementary writer. According to Holt, it is held in England that a judicial opinion is a fair subject of discussion, provided no bad or corrupt motive be ascribed to the judge. Although he would not admit that it was punishable to say to a tyrannical judge, "you are a judicial tyrant," yet, even according to the English law, as expounded by the writers to whom he had referred, Judge Peck had no right to punish Mr. Lawless, who had ascribed no wrong or corrupt motive to his opinion in the case of Souldard. The power exercised by that judge was the most arbitrary and dangerous ever exercised by any court or judge in this country. It was a pregnant proof of the danger of such an exercise of judicial power, to say, as he would declare, that the power to punish for contempt, even in cases of necessity, was a dangerous power, a despotic power, an anomaly, utterly incompatible with liberty, the essence of tyranny and despotism. It was the very illustration of tyranny, that a judge might make the law, fix the punishment, and punish, at the same time. Could any man doubt that Judge Peck had assumed the right to punish a contempt against his sacred person; that he had fixed the punishment, and enforced it too; that he had performed the functions of legislator and judge in his own case? Could any man doubt that this judge, to gratify his vindictive passions, had, by an arbitrary and summary process, deprived an American citizen of his rights, subjected him to an ignominious confinement in prison, and deprived him of the means of supporting his family? Was not such a man a judicial tyrant, whose crimes called aloud for exemplary punishment?

Mr. McDUFFIE then proceeded to call the attention of the Court to the publication of "A Citizen," which Judge Peck alleged to be a libel, punishable as a contempt; and he analyzed it paragraph by paragraph, comparing it as he went along with the opinion of the judge, on which it was a commentary, and with the answer to the article of impeachment, in order to show that it was not even a misrepresentation, much less a disrespectful contempt, of the opinion of Judge Peck. By this analytical process also, he would demonstrate that the conduct of that judge to

Mr. Lawless presented the strongest illustration of judicial despotism that had ever been exercised, from the first dawn of civil liberty to the present day. It must have required all the disordered imagination and furious passion of this judge to distort into a contemptuous libel one of the most innocent publications ever issued from the press. As God was his judge, if he did not know the respectable counsel of the respondent, he should say, from the defence of the judge, that he must have been deranged. No man in his senses could have tortured the publication of Mr. Lawless as he had done. In the case of Souldard's heirs, although the judge had decided against the claimants, he said, in his published opinion, that it was still open for the discussion of counsel. Mr. Lawless, therefore, commenced his publication, with an unbecoming humility to the court, such as no citizen ought to have manifested, by saying that he would avail himself of the permission granted by the judge, to point the public attention to some of the principal errors which he thought he had discovered in his opinion. This very apology had been seized on by this jealous tyrant, and tortured into an insult upon the court. The judge alleged that he had not said the case was open for newspaper discussion; nor had Mr. Lawless said so. But the judge seemed to suppose that Mr. Lawless had discovered a secret; that by the publication of his opinion, Judge Peck had shown so little sense of judicial decency and decorum as to invite a newspaper discussion of a case which had been decided in his court. And this was the insult which Mr. Lawless had committed! This was the congeries of ridiculous absurdities uttered by the judge; this was the defence which he had dared to make before the highest tribunal in the United States! Such an idea never could have been conceived by any man of understanding. Humbly as the judge might estimate the land claimants in Missouri, no one of them would have been so deficient in common sense as to have put the construction which he had put on the apology of Mr. Lawless. Mr. McD. then consecutively and critically examined every specification in the publication of "A Citizen," with the commentary of the judge upon it; and, in relation to the first, he remarked, among other things, that, with due deference to Mr. Lawless, he thought the only crime he had committed was a violation of grammatical accuracy; a blunder which, he believed, was common to the Irish and Scotch Irish; he had construed a want of power in a sub-delegate of Louisiana to grant land for services rendered, or to be rendered, into a prohibition from making such grants. And for this monstrous and flagitious blunder in the King's English, committed by Mr. Lawless in the presence of his honor Judge Peck; for thus wounding the vanity of the judge, clothed in a little brief authority, Mr. Lawless was charged with the suggestion of a falsehood, and sent to prison for a contempt! In the progress of his analysis, Mr. McD. endeavored to demonstrate, that many of the interpretations put by Judge Peck upon the publication of Mr. Lawless could have been conceived only by the very spirit of judicial cavilling; by none but a tyrant in the meridian of his tyranny; by nothing but the very genius of despotism in its maddest freaks. He pronounced Judge Peck himself to be the most accomplished libeller that had ever appeared in a court of justice, and declared that his whole commentary upon the publication of "A Citizen," was a tissue of libels offensive to decency. The charge of falsehood, absurdity, libel, ran through it; it was the phantom which haunted his imagination when he sent this man to prison. Frail would be the tenure by which the people would hold their liberties, if an American citizen could be punished by a judge for the coinage of his own brain; if, frantic with rage, by a species of school-boy cavilling, he might perpetrate this indignity upon an American citizen!

Mr. Lawless had a full knowledge of the facts and the laws in relation to land claims in Missouri at the time of writing and publishing the article for which he was punished. He had approached much nearer to grammatical and substantial accuracy than had been supposed by Mr. McD. yesterday. He had correctly represented the opinions of Judge Peck. The judge had, nevertheless, declared, in his answer, in relation to almost every specification in the publication of Mr. Lawless, that it was untrue. Were Mr. Lawless the judge, Judge Peck himself would be liable to be attached and punished for contempt; but God forbid that Mr. Lawless should, in that event, have the power to decide upon his own case. That gentleman had, in his publication, imputed to the judge the doctrine that the regulations of the Governor General of Louisiana had the effect of annulling the grants of lands for services. It was fortunate for Mr. Lawless that this case had occurred in 1826, before the great national question of nullification had been raised: if it had not, Mr. Lawless might have been attached and punished for charging Judge Peck with nullifying the regulations of the Governor General. The vanity of the judge had been cut, by giving his opinions without his remarks. Mr. Lawless had given the substance, stripped of the feathers. He had dared, with sacrilegious hands, to tear the opinion of the judge from his sacred context, and to give it to the public without his arguments; and for this he was to be sent to jail, disfranchised, and deprived of his rights.

Having completed his analysis of the publication of Mr. Lawless, of which no sufficient idea can be formed from this imperfect report, Mr. McD. appealed to the candor of the honorable court, to say whether that publication contained a solitary word or syllable disrespectful or contemptuous to the court or the judge. It would be difficult for them to lay their finger upon any political or other publication so perfectly respectful as that was. Was there in it a word of censure or of reproach? It was the practice in South Carolina for every lawyer to make his own statement of any exceptions which he may take to an opinion of the judges in the courts below, and to lay it before the same judges, who constituted the Court of Appeals in that State. There was not one case in one hundred of that description in which the lawyers were as correct in giving the opinion of the judges as Mr. Lawless had been in representing the opinion of Judge Peck. They were not expected to give the dress and the feathers of the judge. They were expected to give the opinion as they understood it. Mr. McD. said he had never made a statement in a bill of exceptions as correctly as that which had been made by Mr. Lawless, in his publication, of the opinion of Judge Peck. Differing, as he did, from the judge, it was natural that he should put a different construction upon his opinions; but for this no lawyer in that State had ever been sent to jail. Every man, whether in our courts or in the gladiatorial halls of legislation, was liable to have his argument misunderstood and misrepresented: but he did not wince at this, or rise up on every occasion, and say, I did not make that remark, or that argument. Was every man to be punished for misconceiving an argument or an opinion?

The Secretary having, at the request of Mr. McD., read to the court the publication of Mr. Lawless, that honorable manager appealed, with perfect confidence, to the court, to say whether a more harmless or respectful publication could have been made; whether a man, who could regard that publication as a contempt, and punish it by sending its author to jail, and depriving him of his right to follow his professional occupation, and of the means of subsisting his family, was not a judicial tyrant, calling for exemplary punishment at the hands of this august tribunal? According to the principles which he had cited from the English books, any subject of England might publish a commentary or an opinion of a judge, if he did not ascribe corrupt motives to it. It was public property, and liable to animadversion, provided that the fair limits of criticism were not transcended. This was the English law. The constitution of the United States was more free, and allowed a greater latitude. What was the criticism of Mr. Lawless? Was it upon the opinion of the court? No, sir: that judgment had been pronounced six months before. The decree had been entered. Mr. Lawless had not taken exception to it after the case had been taken out of that court. The criticism was upon the long argument of Judge Peck, published in a newspaper, after the judgment had been rendered. The case was pending before the Supreme Court of the United States; and Judge Peck might have been attached for a contempt of that court, in publishing his argument in the newspapers, upon much better grounds than those upon which he attached and punished Mr. Lawless. The opinion of Judge Peck, as published, had not been delivered in term time; it was published in vacation. Mr. Lawless had just as much right to criticise it as the Judge had to publish it; and it was entitled to no more respect than if it had been delivered on the hustings. We had heard much about judicial decency and decorum. Judge Peck had misconceived both by going into the newspapers; and his published opinion was not entitled to the decent and respectful notice which it had received from Mr. Lawless. Any citizen possessed a full, free, and clear right to investigate that opinion. He considered the judge to have been extremely censurable, in publishing his opinion while the case was pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. Whatever might be the character of the contempt imputed to Mr. Lawless, whatever might be thought of it, the judge had transcended the limits of all authority in inflicting upon him the particular punishment which he had visited upon him for the offence. Fine and imprisonment were the only punishment of a citizen authorized by the law of England or of the United States in cases of contempt. Certainly, Congress had never delegated any power to inflict a greater punishment for the highest grades of contempt. Any officer of a court, any attorney practising in a court, for malversation, fraud, peculation, unfair dealing with his clients, for any base or disgraceful act, where convicted of fraud or perjury, might be stricken from the rolls of the court, as unworthy of confidence. For these causes, in England and the United States, the courts had assumed the power of striking from their lists of practising attorneys. But Judge Peck had not pretended that Mr. Lawless had been guilty of any of these. Did not this honorable court perceive that there was no relation between the offence and the punishment of that gentleman? Because Judge Peck's dignity had been offended, because he chose to think the publication of Mr. Lawless calculated to bring ridicule and contempt upon his court, had he a right to strike him from the list of attorneys practising in his court, and to deprive him and his family of the means of subsistence? Mr. Lawless was a lawyer, a public man, in relation to the pecuniary interest of hundreds and thousands of the citizens of Missouri: they had a right to his professional services, and this tyrannical judge had said that he would deprive him of his and their rights. He had exercised a tremendous power, not called for by any public consideration, nor justified by any law, but originating in the malevolent passions of the petty judge by whom the sentence had been pronounced. Having presented to the court the facts and the grounds upon which the managers, on the part of the House of Representatives, prayed its judgment in this case, Mr. McD. would offer a few general remarks on the danger, the real, great, and alarming danger, of the precedent which would be established by this honorable court, if Judge Peck should be suffered to go unpunished for this high misdemeanor.

He had violated the liberty of the press in the most dangerous form. He had violated the right of trial by jury, by drawing to himself the power to try and punish, in a summary manner, an offence, which, if it were one, was a proper subject of ordinary indictment and trial.

Trial of Judge Peck.

[SENATE.]

And he had defended his tyrannical conduct by the allegation, that the charge of violating the liberty of the press was the stale declamation by which demagogues, slanderers, and libellers, attempted to justify themselves, and to bring the Government into contempt. He trusted that liberty, the liberty of the press, was not thus to be laughed and sneered out of the capital of the United States by a petty provincial judge. When a European monarch had been hurled from his throne for daring to violate the liberty of the press, were we to be told that the liberty of the press was only the theme of demagogues? Tyrants, alone, would so designate it. It had been justly said, that the liberties of mankind could not survive the destruction of the liberty of the press. Even Hume, the English historian, the apologist of tyrants, had declared, that no people having the liberty of the press could be enslaved. He had said, that the only difference in Government, between his time and the reign of Elizabeth, was, that, when he wrote, England enjoyed the liberty of the press; that, with this privilege, Turkey herself would be comparatively free. And yet we are told by this judge, that this was the theme of demagogues. He called upon this honorable court to look at the danger of the precipice on which they stood, if they set the precedent of acquitting this judge. Suppose he should be condemned by this tribunal; suppose he should go back to Missouri, and proclaim that he had been made the victim of party feeling, as he had said in defence before the other House, where he had grossly reflected upon that House; suppose, that when he arrived in Missouri, he should make the welkin ring with his charges against this court; would they, after the seditious law had been driven from the statute book, make themselves the legislators, and judges, and executioners, of the law, by punishing Judge Peck for his calumnies against them? Would any man think of sending for him to answer for the free investigation which he might think proper to indulge in? Would this honorable court act upon the principle which they would consecrate by the acquittal of Judge Peck? And yet such would be the tendency of his acquittal. Every editor in the United States was liable to be immured within the walls of a prison, upon the principles asserted by Judge Peck, unless this honorable court would say that it would be extremely dangerous for the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, to punish editors for the daily calumnies published upon them, as Judge Peck had punished Mr. Lawless. Should the Senate of Rome not punish a libel, and yet delegate the power to punish to its provincial proconsuls? Should it be said that a proconsul, reeking with the blood of his fellow-citizens, may exercise a power, may be trusted with this power, rather than the Senate of Rome? It was said that the King of England could do no wrong, and that the judges, deriving their authority from him, and administering his justice, were entitled to an equal protection. Judge Peck derived his power from the President and Senate. You may slander them as much as you choose; and yet you may not slander this pitiful emanation of their authority.

Mr. McD. contended that, if any public functionary ought to be held responsible to the press, which was the organ, the only true organ, of the people, it was the judges, who alone held their offices during good behavior. If you would preserve the independence of the judiciary, make them do their duty, and punish them for transgressing it. In this age, when tyrants were overwhelmed, and thrones overturned, for violating the liberty of the press, would you suffer your judges to trample upon it with impunity? He had always been in favor of the independence of the judiciary, and against the rotatory principle; but if the doctrine, that the judges were not liable to the animadversion of the public press, be established, God forbid that he should permit the independence of the judiciary to continue for a moment longer than he could help. A judge was as palpable as air, if you could not reach him through the public press. You must permit him to go on with his outrages, without complaint, until you could bring him before this august tribunal. You might bring him to account here, but no where else. Had we come to this, that we may not call a judicial tyrant by his right name; that we may not call him to account for his crimes and misdemeanors? In the worst days of Paris the cry of tyranny was allowed. "Down with the tyrant!" was echoed and re-echoed from one end of Paris to the other. But when a judge committed an outrage, we may not characterize it in the appropriate language.

It was in vain to attempt to disguise it. If this judge should be held guiltless, there could be no judicial outrage which would not be clearly justified by the precedent. It had never occurred to a majority, in the most inflammable times, to punish so harmless an article as that for which Mr. Lawless had been punished. The precedent of an acquittal in this case would justify any judge in laying down any principle to justify such an outrage. The most insidious encroachments of power would be sanctioned by precedents of this kind. It was no extravagant supposition to imagine that this Government might, at some period hereafter, be administered under the influence of party passions; that a party might get into power by intrigue and management, and that it might occur to that party, consisting of a minority, to attempt to maintain their power by muzzling or suppressing the freedom of the press. They might not pass a seditious law, but they might appoint ten thousand district and territorial judges; they might send justices of the peace into every town and parish in the Union; and each of these, upon the doctrine of Judge Peck, might drag an editor before him, punish him for contempt, and thus destroy the liberty of the press. It was impossible to tell the extent to which this principle might be carried by party judges, in party times. It must appear much better, in the view of every statesman, to suffer the most unjust libels to be published in the newspapers, and to let their poisoned arrows recoil upon themselves, than to suppress the liberty of the press. But what was the liberty of Mr. Lawless, according to the practical doctrine of Judge Peck? It was the liberty of being sent to prison, incarcerated with common felons, and deprived of the means of his subsistence, for respectfully differing in opinion with the judge.

A wise man of antiquity, upon being asked what was the best form of Government, justified the character which he had received by the answer, that that was the best in which an injury done to a single citizen was felt as an injury done to the whole community. There was not a man in the country that ought not to make the injury done to Luke E. Lawless his own. We were told that he was an Irishman. He deserved infinite credit, when ordered to prison, for the moderation which he exhibited, for not dragging the tyrant, as Virginius had dragged the tyrant Appius, from the throne. As God was his judge, he believed, that if the case of Mr. Lawless had been his; if he had been ordered to prison, he and his family, and deprived of the means of subsistence, he should have dragged him from his seat on the bench. He had his whole life lived in abhorrence of despotism, in every shape, whether in a judge, or an overseer of slaves; and he considered that this petty judge had been guilty of tyrannical conduct which would have disgraced a slave-driver.

TUESDAY, DEC. 21.

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

SENATE.]

Trial of Judge Peck.

The House of Representatives came into the Senate Chamber and took their seats.

Mr. McDUFFIE resumed the floor, and concluded his opening speech, commenced yesterday, against the respondent. [The remarks made on both days are embodied above, instead of dividing them, as delivered.]

Mr. BUCHANAN then offered the documentary evidence in behalf of the prosecution.

The Court then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 22.

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

The day was occupied in receiving the testimony of LUKE E. LAWLESS, and in examining him. Before the cross-examination was finished, the Court adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23.

At twelve o'clock the Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

The cross-examination of Mr. LAWLESS was resumed, and continued during the whole of the sitting of this day. In the course of that examination, both yesterday and to-day, a variety of points were raised, and argued with great ability by the Managers and the Counsel for the respondent, on the admissibility of certain questions propounded to the witness. The most important of these, and that the decision of which will probably protract the cross-examination at least a day or two, was the point, whether Mr. Lawless should be required to say, whether certain designated passages in the opinion of Judge Peck, in the case of Soulard's heirs, were the parts of that opinion upon which he based the assertion, made in the publication of "A CITIZEN," that Judge Peck had assumed the position, "that, by the Ordinance of 1754, a sub-delegate under the Spanish Government of Louisiana was prohibited from making a grant of lands in consideration of services rendered, or to be rendered?" The Senate, after ingenious and able arguments by Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. STORNS, in behalf of the Managers, and by Mr. WIRT, in behalf of the respondent, decided, by a vote of thirty-two to ten, that the question might be put, and must be answered. This will, it is supposed, lead to a similar examination of the witness in relation to the grounds upon which he advanced all the propositions contained in his publication on the opinion of Judge Peck, for which he was committed and suspended from practice by the judge.

The narrative part of the testimony of Mr. Lawless will afford the means of information to the general reader as to the circumstances which have led to this impeachment. It is therefore subjoined. Let it be remembered, that the heirs of Soulard filed a petition in the District Court for Missouri, of which the respondent is and was the Judge, to try the validity of their claim to ten thousand arpents of land, under a concession alleged to have been issued by Trudeau, the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Louisiana, to Antoine Soulard, the ancestor of the petitioners. Mr. Lawless was the counsel in the case.

LUKE EDWARD LAWLESS, Esq. having been called and sworn, gave a historical narrative of the proceedings, so far as related to the case of Soulard, in the District Court of the United States, for the State of Missouri, under the act of Congress of 1824, enabling the claimants to lands in Missouri and Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, and in relation to the circumstances which had led to his commitment and suspension by that court. He testified, in substance, that, in the case of Soulard's heirs against the United States, he had, as counsel for the plaintiffs, argued it on a general demurrer. It was thought by some of the profession whom he consulted, that it would be well to have his argument printed; and it was accordingly printed. Upon the exhibition to him by Mr. BUCHANAN, one of the honorable managers, of one of the printed copies of the argument, he said that it was the same. The demurrer was subsequently withdrawn; and the District Attorney filed his answer to the petition of the claimants. While taking the deposition of one of the former Lieutenant Governors of Upper Louisiana, Judge Peck mentioned that he had read, or had caused to be read to him, the argument of Mr. Lawless, a copy of which that gentleman said he had sent to him before that time. When the court again sat, Judge Peck directed an issue to try the question, whether such a concession as that under which the plaintiffs claimed the lands in question had ever been made? It was found that it had been made; such as it was set forth to be in the petition of the claimants. The cause then came on upon its merits and the proofs. Mr. Lawless again argued it very much at length. This was in the spring of 1825. The court took the case under advisement, and reserved it for future decision. He was absent, and the judge decided it in his absence. Mr. Lawless was not present when the decision was made; but Judge Peck postponed making up the record for taking an appeal until the counsel returned. When he returned, the record was made up, the appeal taken, and the appeal bond given. This was in December, 1825. In March following, about the 30th, he saw, in the Republican newspaper, published at St. Louis, an article headed, "Peck, Judge," and found it to purport to be an opinion or argument in justification of the decree of the District Court entered in the case of Soulard's heirs against the United States.

It appeared to him to contain a great many errors, in fact and in doctrine. It appeared to him to be calculated injuriously to affect the public opinion upon that and a variety of other similar claims, in which he was concerned as counsel. The article was anonymous, and he looked on it as an argument not presented by the Judge, when his opinion was delivered. It produced a great sensation, tended to depress the hopes of his clients, and to depreciate considerably the value of their property. It appeared to him rather to be an inquiry of what the law should be, than a peremptory decision of what it was. In the opening of that opinion, the Judge expressed doubts as to the law, and seemed to feel as if he were wandering through a wilderness to reach the desired object. Further discussion seemed to be invited of the points involved in that decision. Taking all these considerations into view, and believing that as a citizen, independently of his character as counsel, he had an undoubted right to point out the errors in the published opinion of the judge, and to prevent, as far as he could, the injury they were likely to produce, Mr. Lawless took up his pen, and wrote the article signed "A Citizen," which was published in the Missouri Advocate and St. Louis Enquirer, of the 8th of April, in the same year. Shortly after that the District Court sat by special adjournment. He attended, and took his place in court. Upon taking his seat, and disposing of some business, the judge pulled a newspaper out of his pocket, stated what paper it was, and asked, with apparent emotion, who was its editor, addressing himself, as Mr. Lawless thought, particularly to the District Attorney, or to the bar generally. Mr. Lawless replied, that he knew who was the editor of the paper, and that it was one Stephen W. Foreman. He believed, from his manner, that the judge had in view the article which he had written; and he was perfectly willing that it should be brought up for discussion. The judge asked Mr. Lawless if he would swear to the fact as to the editor. He said he would, and was accordingly sworn. Describing the article, Judge Peck dictated a rule upon the editor, to show cause why he had published it. The rule was served upon the editor, and Mr. Lawless volunteered as counsel for him, he being the author of the article, and considering it his duty to defend the editor. He applied to no other person to appear for him. Mr. Lawless urged the editor by no means to give up the author, using every argument that he could to satisfy him that it was his duty not to yield on such an occasion. He appeared in court the day after the order was issued, and defended the editor on all the grounds which suggested themselves to his mind; on the ground of the perfect truth of the article, and of the absence on its face of all intention to commit a contempt. In demonstrating the truth of the article, he recurred to the published opinion of the judge, to all that the article contained, and pursued the same course of argument, with a few exceptions, as far as his humble abilities would permit, which had been taken by the honorable Manager who had opened this case. He produced all the authorities which he could rake up on the occasion, to show that the publication of "A Citizen" was not a contempt. Immediately after concluding his argument, which, he thought, had occupied more than one day, he left the court; and he understood that Mr. Geyer, a gentleman of the St. Louis bar, had also afterwards stepped forward in defence of the editor.

When Mr. Lawless returned into court, he found Judge Peck about to make the rule absolute for an attachment upon the editor. Considering that the judge appeared to point at him as the author of the article, inasmuch as the rights of his clients were involved in the case, he changed his view of the course which the editor ought to pursue, and assented to the giving up of his own name as the author. Mr. Foreman was then discharged from the rule, and a rule was made on Mr. Lawless, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him, and why he should not be suspended from practice in that court for having written the article as set forth in the attachment. Mr. Geyer, Mr. Magennis, and Mr. Strother, members of the bar, appeared before Judge Peck, the next day, he believed, and argued the matter as his counsel. When they attempted to demonstrate the intrinsic truth of the article of "A Citizen," they were stopped by the judge, told that he had decided and disposed of that question, and that it was not open for further argument. They then proceeded to discuss the questions of pure law on the merits of the case. Their authorities and arguments on that point were overruled by the judge, who ordered the article to be read to him, paragraph by paragraph, by Mr. Bates, the District Attorney, and proceeded to examine and comment upon each paragraph as it was read. The manner of the judge, in treating the subject, was exceedingly vehement; he was more impassioned than he had ever seen him. In his observations, he permitted himself to use expressions which Mr. Lawless considered offensive to him as a man and a gentleman. The witness felt himself irritated by them, and perhaps his countenance exhibited evidences of that irritation. He was apprehensive that he might betray his feelings by some expression or gesture, and he thought it best to leave the court. He, therefore, asked his friend, Mr. Geyer, if he thought it would be a contempt for him to leave the court while the judge was speaking: Mr. Geyer thought no contempt could be inferred from his leaving the court. He rose up and left the court, and went to the Circuit Court for the county of St. Louis, then sitting, before which it so happened that a case, in which he was employed as leading counsel, was about to be tried. It was the case of some slaves, who had sued Peter Choteau for the recovery of their freedom. He was counsel for the defendant. While this trial was proceeding, he was informed by the deputy marshal the rule of an attachment against him had been made absolute by Judge Peck; and he was, therefore, obliged to leave the Circuit Court. When he appeared in the District Court, conducted by the deputy marshal, he was informed by Judge Peck, that he had a right to demand that interrogatories should be propounded to him, as he understood him, for the purpose of enabling him to purge himself of the alleged contempt.

To this the witness replied, that he did not require any interrogatories to be propounded to him; and, if propounded, he should not answer them. He did not recollect whether he then stated any reasons to the court for declining. He tendered exceptions to the decision of the judge, with his reasons, which the judge refused to file. An order was then made out for his commitment to prison for twenty-four hours, and for his suspension from practice in that court for eighteen months. A copy of the order was put into the hands of the deputy marshal, and the witness was conducted to the jail of the county of St. Louis, locked up in a room where common felons had been imprisoned, as he was informed and believed. Mr. Souard and Mr. Rector accompanied him, and were locked up in the room with him. After witness had been there some time, he called for the jailer, and requested him to show him the order of commitment, which he did. After he had examined it, he determined to petition the circuit court for a writ of habeas corpus, in order to apply for a release, on grounds which he thought he had discovered in the order itself. The judge of that court granted the writ, and decided to discharge him from prison, on the ground that there was no seal to the order or signature of the judge. He was accordingly discharged, and heard no more on the subject from Judge Peck. An order was also made out to suspend him from practice for eighteen months, and he was not restored until his suspension had expired by limitation. It appeared further, from the testimony of the witness, that he was a native of Ireland; that he left that country in 1810; that he went to France, and that he came to the United States in 1816. [It is said that he was an officer in the army of Napoleon at the battle of Waterloo.] He declared his intention in the Marine Court of New York, as soon as he arrived in that city, to apply for a certificate of naturalization as an American citizen; and he accordingly obtained his certificate at St. Louis, in 1822. He had been admitted to practise in Kentucky, both by Judge Johnson and Judge Barry, the present Postmaster General of the United States, and moved on with the tide of emigration to St. Louis, in Missouri.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24.

After despatching several private subjects, and spending some time in Executive business,

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

The cross-examination of Mr. LAWLESS was continued up to the hour of adjournment. It reached only to the sixth specification in the publication of "A Citizen." The searching ability displayed by Mr. WIRT on the occasion was met by unusual vigor, talent, and decision, on the part of the witness.

The Senate adjourned till eleven, and the court till twelve o'clock, on Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 27.

The Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. WIRT, the leading counsel for the respondent, resumed and concluded the cross-examination of Mr. LAWLESS.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 28.

After the transaction of some minor business,

The Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

other member of the Missouri bar, were examined, and cross-examined, as witnesses on behalf of the House of Representatives.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29.

THE PRESIDENCY.

Mr. DICKERSON rose to offer a joint resolution to amend the constitution, so as to limit the service of any individual in the Presidency to two terms. He was understood to say, in substance, that, according to the existing article of the constitution on the subject, a President was eligible, by re-election at successive terms, for life. Usage had hitherto restricted the period of presidential service to two terms. Washington had refused to be elected for a third term; and his example, which had become a kind of law, had been followed to the present time; but it was a law so weak as to render it liable to yield to the pressure of any ambitious incumbent, who might desire to continue in office. In the Federal Convention, by whom the constitution had been framed, the principle of limiting the continuance of the President in office to a single term of seven years, had been carried on more than one occasion, but it was as often evaded. Some had been in favor of more terms than one; others had supported the election of a President during good behavior. These preferred a number of terms to a single term, and had united in the adoption of the present provision. The usage of two terms had been so long continued, that he was disposed to adopt it as a part of the constitution. It had been approved by popular opinion, and a joint resolution to that effect had, some sessions ago, been almost unanimously sanctioned by a vote of the Senate. If, however, the Senate should, at this time, prefer a single term of seven, or even of six years, he should have no objection. He then submitted the following joint resolution, promising, at the proper time, to assign his reasons in its favor:

“Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution:

“That no person, who shall have been elected to the office of President of the United States a second time, shall again be eligible to that office.”

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

At twelve o'clock the Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. MEREDITH announced the absence of his friend and colleague, [Mr. WIRT,] in this case. He had been called home to Baltimore by the dangerous illness of one of his children. He felt the embarrassment of his own situation, occasioned by this unpleasant circumstance. To be deprived of the aid of his colleague at any time, or on any occasion, would to him be a cause of regret; but in a case of this magnitude, so interesting to the respondent, and so interesting to the community, to be deprived of his services was a source of deep regret. What he should, therefore, propose, with the consent of the managers on the other side, was, that they should proceed to finish the examination of the witnesses, on the part of the United States, and then that this honorable court should adjourn over to Monday next, to await the return of Mr. Wirt.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that the managers on the part of the House of Representatives would acquiesce in whatever the court might determine to be its pleasure on the occasion.

CHARLES S. HEMPSTEAD, EDWARD CHARLESS, and WHAR-

TON RECTOR, witnesses in behalf of the impeachment, were then called, sworn, examined, and cross-examined.

The certificate of naturalization of Mr. Lawless, the protest of the Spanish Lieutenant Governor of Upper Louisiana, against the regulations of Morales, and sundry other papers, were produced as evidence.

Mr. BUCHANAN then said, that the Managers for the House of Representatives here rested the cause of the United States.

Mr. MEREDITH renewed his application for a suspension of the trial until Monday.

On motion of Mr. TAZEWEEL, the court determined to adjourn over to Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

The Senate adjourned till to-morrow.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30.

The Senate was principally occupied, this day, in the consideration of Executive business.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 31.

THE PRESIDENCY.

The joint resolution to amend the constitution in relation to the Presidential term of service, submitted on Wednesday by Mr. DICKERSON, was read a second time, and referred to a select committee, consisting of Mr. DICKERSON, Mr. WHITE, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. BURNET, and Mr. KNIGHT.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and remained upwards of three hours with closed doors.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1831.

The honorable JOHN C. CALHOUN, Vice-President of the United States, appeared this day and took the Chair as President of the Senate.

After the transaction of some morning business, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

In consequence of the death of a daughter of Mr. WIRT, the leading Counsel of Judge Peck, the Court of Impeachment, on motion of Mr. TAZEWEEL, adjourned to twelve o'clock on Wednesday next.

Mr. LIVINGSTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That nothing contained in any of the rules for conducting impeachments, made on the eleventh day of May, 1830, shall be so construed as to prevent any Senator, when he shall give his vote on the question of guilty or not guilty on any article in an impeachment, from assigning his reasons for such vote.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and spent upwards of two hours on it, and then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LIVINGSTON, explaining the rules to conduct impeachments, so as to allow any Senator to assign his reasons for his vote on the question of guilty or not guilty, was taken up.

Mr. L. said that the resolution was predicated upon a doubt whether the rules adopted in May last did, or did not, allow Senators to assign their reasons for the votes they might give on the pending impeachment. He was rather indifferent than otherwise as to the fate of the resolution. Its object was to settle the doubts which existed on the subject; and that object would be attained, whether the resolution should be rejected or adopted. Both sides of the question presented difficulties. The Court consisted of forty eight members; and if every member were to express his sentiments, after the Managers and the Counsel for the respondent had been heard, a great deal of time would be consumed. On the other hand, the right to speak on the occasion was one which he considered a proper privilege; and he was, upon the whole, disposed to affirm it.

At the suggestion of Mr. FORSYTH, the resolution was laid upon the table until to-morrow.

NAVIGATION AND COMMERCE.

The bill to abolish the charge of ten dollars for passports and four dollars for clearances granted to ships and vessels bound to foreign ports, and to repeal the duties on cinnamon and other spices, was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the first section of this bill had been reported by the Committee of Finance in consequence of the representation in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that our navigating interest was in a depressed condition. The charges for passports and clearances had been imposed in 1796, when we were in want of revenue, and for one or two other reasons which the honorable Senator stated. The revenue of the Government was now abundant; and to take off these charges, which amounted to a very small annual sum, would afford some little relief to the merchants. The second section of the bill was also predicated, in part, on the report of the Secretary, in which it had been stated that nothing was, in fact, derived from the duties on spices. From some cause or other, the drawback on these articles amounted to more than the duties. More, therefore, was lost to the Government than was gained from that source. Spices had become a necessary of life, and were freely used in every family, however poor; and as the duties on them yielded nothing to the treasury, he could perceive no reason why they should not be repealed, and why the bill should not pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After the consideration of Executive business, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 5.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

At twelve o'clock, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment. The managers of the House of Representatives, and the respondent and his counsel, having taken their seats,

Mr. MEREDITH rose and opened the grounds of defence. He said that the honorable manager, who had stated the case for the impeachment, had properly adverted to its great importance, both to the respondent and the community. To the respondent personally, it was undoubtedly of very deep interest, in its character and its consequences. He was charged with the exercise of an arbitrary, oppressive, and usurped judicial power, from malicious motives, to the great disparagement of public justice, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States. If this charge were sustained by this honorable court, the respondent would be doomed to meet not only the lasting reproaches of his fellow-citizens, but the grievous consequences of removal from office, and, at the discretion of the court, sentenced to a perpetual ostracism from the confidence and honors of his country. Considerations of this kind entitled him to the most serious, calm, and dispassionate deliberation upon his case. Other considerations called for cool and candid examination. The surest safeguard of the liberties of the people was to be found in the firm and independent administration of justice; and it became them to look to the safety of that portal which the constitution had placed around the judicial authority of the country. If the doctrine on which this impeachment had been supported were sustained, questions would arise out of the case of deep and lasting importance. His duty on the occasion was an exceedingly simple one; it was within prescribed limits; and to these he should confine himself. He had to state the grounds of defence on which the respondent relied, with the evidence to support that defence. The transaction which had produced this impeachment could be told in a very few words. The respondent, as judge of the District Court of the United States in Missouri, had pronounced an opinion in a case of very great importance, and had been induced to publish that opinion in one of the newspapers of that country. It was already in proof, and would more fully be shown in evidence hereafter, that the opinion had been published not only at the request of the members of the bar, but of those persons generally who were interested in the case. One of the counsel concerned in it had thought proper afterwards to publish, anonymously, under the signature of "A Citizen," not a fair criticism upon it, but a bare enumeration of what he termed the errors of the Court, some of its principal errors in fact and in doctrine, some of the assumptions of the judge, without assigning any reasons to sustain the charge. This publication, to the mind of the respondent, appeared to be a gross and palpable misrepresentation of his opinion, calculated to bring his court into disrespect; and he proceeded to attack and punish its author for the contempt. After a patient hearing of two or three days; after giving to the counsel of the author every opportunity to defend him, and to him every opportunity to purge himself of all intentional disrespect to the court; after the peremptory refusal of Mr. Lawless to answer the interrogatories propounded to him, and his reassertion of the truth of his publication, Judge Peck had sentenced him to twenty-four hours' imprisonment, and to a suspension from practice in his court for eighteen months. For this the respondent had been charged with a high misdemeanor, and with the wilful and malicious exercise of an arbitrary and oppressive judicial power. Mr. M. then proceeded to state the facts and evidence by which the respondent would be able to establish the positions, that a contempt had been committed by Mr. Lawless; that the court possessed a legal warrant to punish him for the contempt; and that, if not, the judge was influenced, in the case, by a sense of official obligation and duty, and not by the wilful, malicious, and arbitrary motive and intention imputed to him in the article of impeachment. He gave a history and character of the land claims, and the transactions out of which this impeachment had grown; the arduous and perilous difficulties which the respondent had to encounter in the exercise of his jurisdiction over the alleged concessions claimed under the Spanish authorities, and the frauds, meditated and apprehended, against which he had to guard. He described the case of Soulard, which had led to this impeachment, as a select and test cause, and said that it required no prophetic spirit in the judge to foresee the dissatisfaction which an adverse decision would produce in all the claimants. It would extinguish their hopes, as long as the decision remained unrepealed, or the court unchecked. Accordingly, general dissatisfaction and dismay on the part of suitors did ensue. The Judge postponed the enrolment of his decree in the case, to enable Mr. Lawless and his associate counsel to put in their exceptions to it, or to furnish further argument upon it. This was declined by them. The judge published his opinion. The motives for its publication were summed up in his answer to the charge in the article of impeachment. He perceived that such publications were usual both in England and America, and saw no impropriety in the practice. On the contrary, the branch of law involved in the case was new; its grounds had not been fully argued at the bar, and it was proper that they should be fully opened for the deliberate consideration of counsel; it was right that their clients should see the reasoning of the court on the subject, and, if satisfactory, that they should be saved from any further expense. It was proper that they should see that the court had not hastily and inconsiderately assumed the principles upon which the opinion was founded, but that it had conscientiously, upon facts and arguments which it could not resist, come to its conclusion in the case. Upon these reasons, the respondent confidently relied for the justification of the publication of his opinion. Eight days after, it was followed by the publication of "A Citizen," in another newspaper. In this, the respondent saw a gross and palpable misrepresentation, calculated to bring ridicule and contempt upon the court, to provoke the resentment of the claimants towards the judge, and to break down the court by the force of public opinion. Was the respondent justified in these apprehensions? Notwithstanding the gloss put upon the subject by the comparison which the honorable manager [Mr. McDUFFIE] had instituted between the opinion of the judge and the publication of Mr. Lawless, the respondent relied upon a candid examination and comparison by this honorable court.

He would be able to show, by gentlemen familiar with the case, that he was by no means singular in attributing misrepresentation to the publication of "A Citizen." Men of intelligence, lawyers, acquainted with all the facts and doctrines of the case, looking with a single eye to see whether misrepresentation was to be found in the publication or not, would establish the fact. These same witnesses would show the effect of this misrepresentation. If Mr. Lawless's publication could be considered an accurate representation of the conclusions to which the court had come in that case, they were so preposterous, so absurd, that nothing but ignorance—an ignorance amounting to idiocy—nothing but downright corruption, could have influenced the judge. The effect of the misrepresentation had been to destroy confidence in the court; the disappointment of the claimants was converted into hostility to the judge; and so great had been the distrust and dissatisfaction, that memorials were sent to Congress, the object of which was to deprive the court of its jurisdiction over the claims, and to transfer it to another tribunal.

If, therefore, the respondent saw, or this honorable court should believe that he conscientiously thought he saw, an evil design in the author of the publication, what course would they say was left him to pursue? Painful as it was, there was but one course for him to take; and that was to guard the sacred trust committed to his charge, and to punish the contempt as he had punished it. In this, Mr. M. contended, that the respondent had been justified by immemorial usage; by the inherent power of the courts; by a power which, although sometimes questioned, had remained untouched in every political struggle that had taken place; untouched in every constitution that had been adopted in the country. It was justified by American precedents, by the best lawyers and purest patriots that ever adorned the bench. It would be shown, in due time, that the power had been exercised by all the State courts; by the highest court in the Union; by the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, in cases far more doubtful than this. The respondent was justified, in treating and punishing the publication as a contempt, not only by the statute and common law, but by the law universal, by precedent, by the decisions of all the courts in the country. But, if he were not so justified, had he been governed by the malicious intention imputed to him in this impeachment, what motive could he have had? He had not had any personal disagreement with Mr. Lawless. No previous quarrel had occurred between them. No lurking resentment existed. All their measures with each other had been of a perfectly amicable nature. Was a malicious motive to be found in the character of the respondent? It would be shown that he was mild, conciliatory, and equable in temper; respectful and patient in his deportment towards all—to the members of the bar, the subordinate officers of the court, and to suitors. Was such a motive to be inferred from the transaction itself? It would be proved, not by those who could see the transaction only in colors of resentment; not by witnesses who were hostile, or who were present in court only at intervals while the case was pending; but by calm, disinterested, and intelligent witnesses, who were present during the whole or greater part of the time, that the manner of the judge was not more vehement than it usually had been when his mind was deeply exercised on any subject; that it was as mild as any judge who had ever graced the bench; that the language he used on the occasion was addressed to the publication, and not to its author; and that, in fact, he looked beyond Mr. Lawless, to other and higher considerations, in awarding the attachment and punishment to which he had been sentenced.

ROBERT WASH, Esq. a Judge of the Supreme Court of Missouri, was then called, sworn, and examined as a witness in behalf of the respondent. At the conclusion of his testimony—

The Court adjourned over till twelve, and the Senate till eleven o'clock, to-morrow.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6.

After the transaction of some minor business, at twelve o'clock, the Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

JOHN K. WALKER, of St. Louis, and MR. PETTIS, a member of the House of Representatives, were called, sworn, and examined as witnesses, in behalf of the respondent. Then adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 7.

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

J. B. C. LUCAS, W. C. CARR, and JESSE E. LINDELL, were called, sworn, and examined in behalf of the respondent. Judge WASH was re-examined in part.

The court then adjourned to Monday.

The Senate ordered two opinions of Judge PECK to be printed, and also adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10.

After disposing of petitions, resolutions, and some private bills, the Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

MR. MEREDITH apologized for the absence of Mr. WIRT, occasioned by indisposition.

The deposition of EDWARD BATES, JOHN BENT, and SAMUEL MERRY, in behalf of the respondent, were, with the exception of certain parts expunged by agreement, and agreeably to a decision of the court, received and read as evidence. Judge CARR was again called and re-examined; and two or three other witnesses gave their testimony. The whole evidence was closed, with the exception of some papers in the General Land Office.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11.

The Senate again sat as a Court of Impeachment.

The sitting was consumed in the production and examination of documentary evidence and oral testimony in the case of Judge PECK. The honorable Mr. BENTON was called to prove the correctness of certain extracts translated by him from a Spanish ordinance into English. Colonel LAWLESS, MR. GEYER, and one or two other witnesses were re-examined. Finally, at about four o'clock, it was announced by the managers for the House and the counsel for the respondent, that the evidence was closed, and that they would proceed with the argument to-morrow.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12.

The Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

The Seneca Indians.

[SENATE.]

In consequence of the continued indisposition of Mr. WIRT, Mr. TAZEWELL moved an adjournment of the court till to-morrow, when his physicians thought he might be sufficiently restored to attend the trial.

The court accordingly adjourned.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after spending some time thereon, adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13.

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a letter from one of the physicians of Mr. WIRT, expressive of the opinion that he could not at present leave his room, without some danger of a relapse at a more important crisis in the pending trial, and that by Monday he would be entirely restored to health.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Court adjourned to meet again on Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

THE SENECA INDIANS.

The Senate resumed its legislative character, and took up the bill to provide for the payment hereafter of an annuity of six thousand dollars to the Seneca tribe of Indians.

Mr. FORSYTH said he did not recollect the particulars of this bill; but he was under the impression that the Government was under no obligation to pay the money proposed to be appropriated to these Indians. He called upon some gentleman of the committee by whom the bill had been reported, to say whether the obligation of the Government was not to invest one hundred thousand dollars for the Seneca Indians; and whether that obligation had not been performed?

Mr. DUDLEY replied, that, by the treaty with these Indians, the United States were bound to invest in the President, as trustee for them, in stock of the old Bank of the United States, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. The charter of that Bank had expired. The money was then invested in six per cent. United States' stock. That stock having been reduced, three per cent. stock was purchased by Government for the Senecas. The Government, nevertheless, thought it their duty to continue to pay them six per cent. and did until a year or two ago. Since that time, the War Department conceived that there was no law to justify the payment of more than the three per cent. upon the amount of the investment. The Indians refused to receive it. The object of this bill was to give an authority to pay the six per cent. These Indians were much in want of the money. Some of the tribe were now here waiting for it.

Mr. FORSYTH believed the statement of the member from New York to be correct, and, if so, it appeared that the obligation of the Government had been performed. Were we then bound to give these Indians six per cent. for ever? Their hundred thousand dollars, with the profits upon the sale of that sum, amounting to twelve thousand more, were secured to them. The Government might be bound to invest the money in the most profitable stock for them, but not to secure them six per cent. He considered it best to leave the matter as it stood, or to make a more profitable investment of the money, if that could be done. These Indians had been deceived; too much indulgence had heretofore been shown to them by the administrators of the War Department; and this had been a deception, leading them to suppose that they had a claim to six per cent. per annum upon the original sum invested for them.

Mr. WHITE said the bill provided for two objects. The object of the first section was to put upon a permanent footing the one hundred and twelve thousand dollars which had been invested in three per cents. for these Indians. No gentleman could doubt that it was competent for the Government to appropriate that sum permanently for their use and benefit. The object of the second section was to appropriate an additional sum sufficient to make up the difference between six thousand dollars and the three per cent. interest for 1830. Mr. Morris had purchased lands from the Seneca tribe, and had agreed to pay one hundred thousand dollars for them. That sum was to be placed in the hands of the President, as their trustee, and to be used for the purchase of stock in the old Bank of the United States, which yielded six per cent. While the charter of that bank continued, there was no difficulty on the subject. After it expired, the money was vested in three per cent. stock, which did not yield six per cent. For reasons satisfactory to them, the Government paid the deficiency annually, out of the contingent funds of the War Department, until this administration came into power. They deemed the practice improper; and the President had, therefore, presented the subject to the consideration of Congress. The simple question was, whether it would be right and better to make up the difference for one year, in preference to a misunderstanding with these Indians. He thought it would be better to make it up for 1830, and to make a similar appropriation for the present year, until the matter could be fixed on a permanent footing, than that any discontent should be permitted to exist on the part of the Indians. The investment in three per cent. stock had been made without the knowledge or consent of the Indians. They had no part in it. The Government had done it of its own accord, no doubt from the best of motives, probably because the best investment that could be made at the time. He thought the bill ought to pass.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the Indians had always expected six per cent. If the one hundred and twelve thousand dollars in three per cent. were sold at this time, they would, he believed, produce more than one hundred thousand. He could see no objection to the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH said that his object had been answered in bringing this subject before the Senate. It was admitted that the United States had received no property from these Indians. The lands had been obtained by Mr. Morris; and because the Government had been made trustees in the case, they must pay this six per cent. in perpetuity. The simple question was, whether the United States shall now bind themselves to a perpetual appropriation of upwards of two thousand six hundred dollars per annum, merely because they had assumed to become the trustees for these Indians. Mr. F. concluded by asking the Secretary of the Senate to read that part of the treaty with these Indians, under which the obligation in question had been incurred.

Mr. SANFORD inquired what were we bound in good faith to do to those Indians? We were now ourselves construing the treaty with them. What was the understanding of the Indians of this treaty? All the acts done under it had been our own acts. By these the Indians understood that they were to receive six per cent. upon the one hundred thousand dollars. This Government had thought so. The compact had been heretofore so construed by us, and so understood by the Indians. All the changes in the investments for them had been our own acts. They knew nothing of them. The present was a new construction of the compact with them, with which they had nothing to do. It had been done without their assent. He was in favor of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, in order to obtain some information on the subject, moved to lay the bill on the table till to-morrow morning.

It was accordingly so ordered.

The Storm—Vessels in Distress.

FRIDAY, JAN. 14.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all the proceedings on file in his office, relative to the location of lands in the State of Indiana, by the Commissioners appointed on the part of the State of Indiana, and the Commissioner or Agent appointed by the authority of the United States, under the act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Indiana to locate and make a road therein named;" also copies of all letters addressed to him, relating to the subject of the location of the land in question; together with the decision of the late acting Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject.

Mr. N. said he was aware that, by the rules of the Senate, it required their unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time. He hoped that such consent would be given. His object was to receive copies of all the evidence in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, public and private, which had a bearing upon the subject embraced in the resolution which he had offered. It was a duty which he owed to the people of Indiana to make the call for the evidence, upon a subject which interested them. He was satisfied that the people of that State would never yield to the decision given to the act of Congress named in the resolution, by the late acting Commissioner of the General Land Office. He expected that the Legislature of the State of Indiana, now in session, would, by memorial to Congress, shortly represent the rights of the State by fact and law, or to some other tribunal. To meet their views promptly, when they arrive, he desired all the evidence officially, to enable the Senate to act.

The resolution was then, by unanimous consent, read a second time, and adopted.

The remainder of the day was spent in disposing of other motions, and debating the bill for the relief of Peters and Pond, of Boston.

MONDAY, JAN. 17.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the resolution of that House to attend the Senate, from day to day, during the argument in the impeachment now pending against JAMES H. PECK, District Judge of Missouri.

THE STORM—VESSELS IN DISTRESS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enable the President to employ, without delay, two or more vessels, with supplies of men, provisions, and other necessities, to cruise off the coast of the United States, for the purpose of supplying and succouring vessels that may have suffered by stress of weather during the present inclement season, and appropriating fifteen thousand dollars for carrying the objects of the bill into effect.

In asking leave to introduce this bill, Mr. L. said that its object was to relieve our vessels and seamen that might be on the coast at this very inclement season. Those only who had been in vessels in that situation, could realize the suffering and distress to which they and their crews were exposed. The bill was intended to enable the President to fit out two or more ships, to supply them with men and provisions that might be needed at this trying moment.

Mr. HAYNE inquired whether the object was to authorize the President to send out armed vessels belonging to the navy, or merchant vessels, and whether any estimate of the expense had been obtained.

Mr. LIVINGSTON replied, that the President would despatch on this service any vessel that might be ready for it, whether merchantmen or others. As to the amount of the expense, he had relied on mercantile gentlemen better qualified than he was to judge.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, in substance, that he considered the bill to be unconstitutional; that, if it were based upon that article of the constitution which authorized Congress to regulate commerce, it involved a more extensive exercise of power, that of enabling the President to send vessels along the coast to pick up wrecks, than had ever been claimed, even under that clause. Before the bill could be passed by Congress, and approved by the President, the effects of the storm would be over. He doubted the power of Congress to pass the bill, and he considered that it would be very partial in its beneficial operation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he had not expected to hear the extraordinary objection which the Senator from Virginia had urged against the bill. He did not derive his constitutional authority for the bill from the clause for regulating commerce, but from the general power of the Government to protect commerce, and to manage our foreign relations. Whence did we derive the power to build light-houses, beacons, and buoys? What argument was there for employing the navy on such occasions, that did not equally authorize the employment of merchant vessels? He knew of none. So much for the constitutional objection. Now for the expediency of the measure. He did not think that it was to be ridiculed out of the Senate by the suggestion, that these vessels were to be sent to pick up wrecks. They were to be sent out to prevent wrecks; not to remedy the mischief, but to prevent it. The storm had now lasted four days. It was not over. The wind was still high. Vessels had been, probably, driven forty or fifty leagues from the coast. It might be days, and weeks, and months, before some of them could get into port. Their seamen might be frozen; their rigging stiff with snow and ice. In this situation, they would consider the relief proposed to be sent to them, as a messenger from heaven. The constitutional objection weighed nothing with him. If the measure were, as it would be, useful and humane, that was enough for him in the present instance. It was not New York only, but the Capes of Virginia, and elsewhere, from which vessels could be promptly despatched, to rescue our seamen from the fatigues, and dangers, and calamities, incident to this stormy season.

Mr. SILSBEE said that the proposed measure would not be confined to one port. Orders could be immediately sent to New York, Norfolk, and Charleston, to afford the relief from suffering and danger so well described by the Senator from Louisiana. Some small vessels, with beef, pork, and other articles, could be at once provided to meet ships in distress, and would truly be considered as angels from heaven. No one who had not experienced them, could imagine the distress to which our seafaring people were liable at this season of the year. As to the expense, more revenue would probably be saved by the measure than it would cost.

Mr. TAZEWELL said he should interpose no other objection than his vote to the bill. He had asked the honorable Senator from Louisiana, whether he found his authority for this measure in the power of Congress to regulate commerce? but he had received no new light upon the subject. The gentleman and he differed on constitutional questions from the bottom. He could not find this authority in the power to create and support a navy, nor in the power to control our foreign relations. What, sir! the power to protect our own ships to be found in the power over our foreign relations? He repeated, that, before this bill could pass into a law, the mischief would be done. The danger was not at Savannah, Charleston, or New Orleans; it would be greater along the coast of Maine than any where else. The storm raged there with the greatest violence. It was not contemplated to send any relief to that coast. The spots most exposed would derive the least benefit from the measure.

Mr. SILSBEE explained. It was Charlestown, in Massachusetts, to which he had alluded. The effects of this storm were not over. They might last thirty or forty days. Vessels within one hour's sail of port might be blown off for leagues. Many vessels would be in that situation. It was to supply such ships with men and provisions that this bill has been introduced.

Mr. HAYNE moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Commerce, and suggested that this reference would enable the Senate to afford relief in the most efficient manner. He also suggested that the Government now possessed the means to extend the most prompt aid to vessels in distress. A circular from the Treasury Department could put in immediate requisition our revenue cutters for this purpose.

After one or two additional remarks from Mr. WOODBURY, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. LIVINGSTON, the motion of Mr. HAYNE was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then moved that the bill be forthwith read a third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that this motion required the unanimous consent of the Senate before it could be adopted.

Mr. BROWN objected to it, and it could not, therefore, be received.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate then again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Judge CARR appeared at the bar, and was permitted to make some explanation on a point of his former testimony.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, a manager on the part of the House of Representatives, then rose, and addressed a very learned and able argument to the court in support of the impeachment. Having concluded at four o'clock, the court adjourned.

RELIEF VESSELS.

The Senate having resumed its legislative character,

Mr. BROWN withdrew the objection which he had made this morning to the third reading of the bill for sending relief vessels off our maritime coast; and it was then read a third time, and passed by the following vote, Mr. FORSYTH having required the yeas and nays.

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Sprague, Webster, Woodbury.—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler.—13.

Adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18.

After receiving petitions, resolutions, and reports of committees, the Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, one of the managers of the House of Representatives, commenced an argument in support of the impeachment at twelve o'clock, and concluded at a little past three. He advanced and maintained the positions that Judge Peck had no legal jurisdiction over the publication of Mr. Lawless, even supposing it to have been a contempt, for which he imprisoned and suspended him; and that, in truth, that publication was no contempt at all. Mr. W. defended the liberty of the press with energy and zeal.

Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. STORRS stated, for the information of the counsel of the respondent, who will tomorrow commence the argument in his defence, the additional authorities which they intended to produce in support of the impeachment.

The court and Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19.

After disposing of some morning business, the Senate resumed the impeachment.

Mr. MEREDITH addressed the court for three hours, in defence of the respondent. Having become exhausted in physical strength before he could conclude his speech, the court, at three o'clock, adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20.

The Senate spent the principal part of to-day as a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. MEREDITH continued, without concluding, his argument in defence of the respondent.

IMPEACHMENT EXPENSES.

The bill making provision for the payment of the witnesses, and of other expenses incurred in the trial of James H. Peck, District Judge of the United States for the District of Missouri, was taken up. [The bill allows each witness four dollars per day, and twenty cents mileage for travelling expenses.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the witnesses who had attended the trial of Judge Chase had been allowed but three dollars a day, and twelve and a half cents mileage. He wished to know the reasons which had induced the committee to increase the compensation of the witnesses and the mileage in the present case.

Mr. IREDELL replied, that when Judge Chase was tried, the pay of members of Congress was six dollars: it was now eight dollars. The committee conceived it but just to fix the compensation to the witnesses at one-half of that which was allowed members.

Mr. GRUNDY said that another consideration showed the propriety of the increase. These witnesses had come from a much greater distance than the witnesses in the case of Judge Chase. Most of them were professional men, and had, by their absence from home, lost nearly a half year's practice. He should vote for the four dollars, and would have voted for six dollars if that sum had been in the bill.

The blank in the bill was filled with the sum of twelve thousand dollars for the expenses of the trial; and, thus amended, it was engrossed, read a third time, and passed.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate then again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. MEREDITH continued his argument for the respondent until half past three o'clock, when the court and Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22.

The Senate having again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment,

Mr. MEREDITH concluded his argument at twenty minutes past one o'clock.

Mr. WIRT then rose to address the court for the respondent. He regretted that he had been the unwilling cause of so much delay in the progress of this trial, and thanked the honorable court for the humanity of the indulgence which they had extended towards him. His friend might also have consumed much more time, in the opinion of some, than was necessary; but it would be recollected that two-thirds of that time had been used in reading precedents from the books. In a case in which the respondent was so deeply concerned, it would be a dereliction of duty on the part of his counsel, if they were to relinquish any of the ground which the honorable managers had deemed material to their argument; and time had probably been saved by the reading of the books which had been produced by his colleague. It would not be necessary to read them again. He should content himself with bestowing upon them a few passing remarks when he should come to the cases which they presented. Some topics which had, he could not but presume, been introduced for effect, it would be necessary for him to notice. In doing so, he begged to be understood as treating the honorable managers with every possible respect. He knew the amiable, upright, and enlightened qualities which adorned them. Whatever they had deemed of importance, he could not be so presumptuous as to pass by unregarded. It had been stated that the House of Representatives, by a large majority, in which party had no share, had voted this impeachment. What was the object of this remark? Why was it introduced here? Could it enter into the consideration of this honorable court, whether the House of Representatives had been hasty or not; whether party had influenced them in the vote which they gave for this impeachment? Would it be decorous in the respondent, or in those who were connected with him, to impeach their proceedings? He knew too well his duty to that honorable House, to this honorable court, and to his humble self, to step so far out of his way as to question the motives for this impeachment. The House of Representatives were the grand inquest of the nation. Their article of impeachment against Judge Peck was the finding of the grand jury. Would it be proper, in a case before a petit jury, for counsel to appeal to the proceedings of the grand jury; to say that they had, by a large majority, uninfluenced by party spirit, found a bill of indictment? Would not the court, in that case, stop counsel, and say to him, sir, we have nothing to do with the grand jury, or its motives; we are to try this case upon its merits, without reference to what passed in the grand jury on the subject? The finding of the grand inquest is simply the accusation. The honorable House had not come here to sacrifice a victim whom they had fore-doomed to destruction. They had done nothing more than to declare that the offence with which the respondent had been charged, was worthy of a trial. The respondent was not there, before the honorable House, upon his trial. They had sent him here to be tried. What was the fundamental feature of a trial of that sort? It was, that the accused was presumed to be innocent until he had been found guilty. But, if the remark of which he was now complaining were to have weight, that principle would be reversed. The accused was to be presumed to be guilty until proved to be innocent. He hoped to hear no more of the majority, or the motive by which this impeachment had been instituted by the honorable House. He considered such remarks improper. The respondent stood here unknown, almost alone, a stranger from the western wilds, to breast the storm of this impeachment. He trusted to this honorable court for a fair trial, and relied upon the correctness, and innocence, and purity, of his own conduct, for an honorable acquittal. He would be tried by the simple, naked facts and principles of the case, and not by the dramatic exhibition of fancied analogies which they had witnessed. Was the respondent to be involved in the turpitude of all the wicked judges of England; in the guilt of the unsparing Jeffreys, the tumultuous Scroggs, and the tyrant Bromley? He trusted not: he hoped that he would be tried upon his own merits alone. He admonished the honorable managers, that something was continually occurring to remind us of the infirmity of human reason contending against human prejudice. This must teach charity to all. He apprehended the existence of some extraordinary prejudice which had influenced and inflamed the spirit of this prosecution. He, too, might be the victim of prejudice; of that friendship which a close intimacy had produced with the respondent. He admitted an equality of infirmity with the honorable managers. This honorable court would decide between them. To what other cause than prejudice could he impute the language in which the respondent had been held up as a judicial tyrant, a petty provincial judge, a monster, walking over the fallen bodies of the constitution and laws of his country? This picture of wickedness and horror had been sent as far as the press could range; as far as the wings of genius and eloquence could send it. Many a father in the remote parts of the country had read this account with feelings of abhorrence. With the paper in his hand, he had probably said to his son—see, what a monster is now before the Senate of the United States! If your country should ever elevate you to public station, never become such a monster as this Peck. He may no doubt have had respectable parents; he may once have been respectable himself; but see what a monster of crime, of shame, and of ignominy, he has now become! How long would it not be before this cruel error could be corrected; before it would be seen, upon the testimony of the most respectable gentlemen, that this monster was one of the most mild, patient, kind and courteous of human beings: so amiable, that, in the language of one of the witnesses, he was dear to all who knew him. He could not help ascribing the terrible picture which had been drawn of the respondent, to some unaccountable prejudice. He adverted to other topics, of which the honorable managers appeared to him to have taken a discolored and distorted view.

The respondent had been represented as an enemy to the freedom of the press; a principle sacred to all. He was represented to have scoffed at it. This judicial monster was described as having walked over the prostrate liberty of the press, and as having attempted to sneer and snarl it out of existence. Where had he said this of it? Where had he uttered one sentiment of disrespect towards the liberty of the press? Not here, certainly. But he had done so in his defence before the House of Representatives, which had been introduced as evidence here, for the purpose of establishing this charge against the respondent. Look at that defence, and see whether he has treated the liberty of the press with contempt. "It is said, that in punishing this publication as a contempt, the judge has invaded the liberty of the press." What is the liberty of the press? And in what does it consist? Does it consist in a right to vilify the tribunals of the country, and to bring them into contempt, by gross and wanton misrepresentations of their proceedings? Does it consist in a right to obstruct and corrupt the streams of justice, by poisoning the public mind with regard to causes in these tribunals, before they are heard? Is this a correct idea of the liberty of the press? If so, the defamer has a charter as free as the winds, provided he resort to the press for the propagation of his slander; and, under the prostituted sanction of the liberty of the press, hoary age and virgin innocence lie at his mercy. This is not the idea of the liberty of the press which prevails in courts of justice, or which exists in any sober or well regulated mind. The liberty of the press is among the greatest of blessings, civil and political, so long as it is directed to its proper object, that of disseminating correct and useful information among the people. But this greatest of blessings may become the greatest of curses, if it shall be permitted to burst its proper barriers. The river Mississippi is a blessing to the country through which it flows, so long as it keeps within its banks; but it becomes a scourge and a destroyer when it breaks them. "The liberty of the press has always been the favorite watchword of those who live by its licentiousness. It has been, from time immemorial, is still, and ever will be, the perpetual decanatum on the lips of all libellers. Oswald attempted to screen himself under its ægis, in the case which has been cited from the 1st Dallas. But the attempt was in vain. The court taught him the difference between the liberty of the press and the licentiousness of the press: and, in his further attempt to raise an impeachment against the judges for that sentence, the House of Delegates confirmed the wholesome lesson. If, indeed, the liberty of the press was a panoply broad enough to cover every thing done in its name, nothing in the form of a publication could ever have been punished as a contempt of court. In all the reported cases, in which those publishers have been called to answer for a contempt, wherever the defence has appeared in the report, it is the liberty of the press which is the perpetual theme. It is uniformly claimed to be the right of the citizen to question the acts of all public men, and the changes are continually rung on that great palladium of human rights and human happiness—the liberty of the press; as if human rights and human happiness could be promoted by the prostration and destruction of courts of justice, or by poisoning their streams in the fountain head. It is unnecessary to pursue this subject. The judge has never pretended that his opinions are not to be questioned. He insists, however, that they are to be questioned only according to the laws of the land. One mode of questioning them, under these laws, is by appeal to a superior court; and, after the subject-matter shall have been finally decided, another mode of questioning them is, by respectful discussion, either in the public prints or elsewhere. In the present case, the first mode of questioning the opinion, that by appeal, had been resorted to. For the second mode, that of respectful discussion, the case was not ready, because the subject-matter had not been disposed of finally; and even if it had been, it has been shown that there was no semblance of investigation in this article; no pretence of discussion of any kind. It was sheer misrepresentation; and it does not follow, that, because an opinion of a court may be respectfully discussed, it may, therefore, be misrepresented; much less, that it may be so misrepresented as not only to impair the confidence of the public in the dignity, intelligence, and purity of the tribunal, but to render both the judge and the court objects of universal contempt, scorn, and ridicule; and least of all, that, in doing this, a strong prejudice shall also be infused into the public mind with regard to causes still pending in the court." Was this [demanded Mr. WARR] a sneer at the liberty of the press? Was there here any snarl at the liberty of the press? Was the declaration, that it was the greatest of human blessings, confined to the dissemination of truth and intelligence among the people, an attempt to bring the liberty of the press into contempt? Was not the doctrine here laid down by the judge the sound doctrine concerning the liberty of the press? And would it not meet the approbation of all, except the libeller? To be useful, the liberty of the press must be restrained. The principle of restraint was impressed upon every part of creation. By restraint the planets were kept in their orbits. The earth performed its regular evolutions by the restraint of the centrifugal force operating upon it. The vine would shoot into rank luxuriance, if not under the restraint of the laws of nature, by which every thing was preserved within its proper bounds. Was not every thing on earth impressed with this principle? and was not the liberty of the press to be restrained to the performance of its rightful functions of propagating truth for just ends? It was not always those who were loudest in their clamors for the liberty of the press, who were its best friends. There be those who, when they hear those bursts of genius and eloquence upon the liberty of the press, could say, like poor Cordelia—

"Unhappy that I am, I cannot heave
My heart into my mouth: I love your Majesty
According to my bond; nor more, nor less."

He thought there had been no occasion for the remarks which had been made on this subject. Judge Peck loved the liberty of the press with as much purity as those who had been so loud in its praises. If he had, in the commencement of this trial, been subjected to a commentary so severe, what might not be expected in its sequel? It had been charged upon the respondent, that he had dared to attempt to buy off this impeachment by an intimation that he was entitled to consideration and exemption, because he had decided the case of Souldard in favor of the United States. It had been alleged that he had tried to buy off the House of Representatives by dirty acres. If he had done so, he was a vile and degraded man, and, he would add, one of the most consummate fools that ever sat upon the bench. But where had he said this? At the close of his defence, he [Judge Peck] observed, "that, in this proceeding, he was actuated by a sense of official duty. He considered it his duty to sustain the dignity and authority of the court over which he had been appointed to preside: he considered it due to the Government which he represented; due to the tribunal, and due to the suitors whose rights were committed to its protection, to punish this contempt as he did punish it. He did consider himself, and does still consider himself, as sustained, at every step, by the highest authority. He believed it, conscientiously, to be his solemn and imperious duty to make the example which he did make, more especially in relation to the country in which he holds his courts, and the nature of the claims which he was called upon to adjudicate, and which had produced this agitation. If, in so doing, he has erred, he has erred in company with judicial characters with whom any judge may be proud to associate; and he has yet to learn that such an error would be a high misdemeanor in the sense of the constitution of the United States. Judge Peck is perfectly aware of the purposes to be answered by his removal, and is, therefore, not at all surprised at the pertinacity with which it has been sought for the last four years. Whether these purposes are such as the interests of the United States call upon them to countenance, by ordering further proceedings in this case, is a question for others, not for Judge Peck. Confident he is, that, if he had been made of more pliant materials, and could have reconciled it to himself to consult his repose, rather than his sense of duty, the House would not have been troubled with this inquiry." Was this, sir, a proposition to buy off impeachment? Was this the language of a man crouching under the charge which had been alleged against him? There was no attempt, here, to screen himself by a bribe; by an appeal to the interest of the honorable House of Representatives. It was the language of a man indignantly asserting his innocence, and turning upon his accuser. It was no attempt to buy off punishment. Let candid and honorable men read and decide for themselves. There was another circumstance which he felt himself called upon to notice with unspeakable regret. He had heard of it with pain, while confined to his bed. The respondent, held up, as he had been, before these crowded galleries, and this assembled multitude, as a judicial monster; a petty provincial tyrant; thus caricatured, empaled and crucified, before this nation, with these lacerated feelings, having occasion to speak to a point of evidence, he had betrayed an emotion with his trembling hand; a tear had started from his eye. Was it wonderful that the respondent, innocent and simple-hearted as a child, with his reputation at hazard; with an aged parent, whose gray hairs he did not wish to send down to the grave with sorrow, should have thus betrayed his feelings on the occasion? Yet, an honorable manager [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had represented him as shedding feigned tears, crocodile tears, before this assembly and this nation. Did the honorable manager recollect the prosecution of Sir Walter Raleigh by Sir Edward Coke? Did he remember the spirit in which that prosecution had been conducted? Did he recollect that Sir Edward Coke had stigmatized that gallant soldier as a spider of hell? Let him ask the honorable manager which character he would rather bear with posterity—that of Sir Walter Raleigh or Sir Edward Coke? He had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the honorable manager; he well knew that unkindness and barbarity were far removed from his heart. What, then, but some unaccountable prejudice could have induced these remarks? They had gone to the world. It would be a long time before this trial would go before the world, to correct the impressions which the representations of honorable managers had made. He had, therefore, been anxious to show that the respondent was not the judicial monster that he was charged with being; that he had not violated the liberty of the press; that he had not attempted to buy off this impeachment; that he was amiable, patient, and forbearing, both as a man and a judge, and that the epithets applied to him had been the effect of prejudice, of heated and perverted imaginations, having no foundation in fact.

Mr. WIRT was proceeding to consider the merits of the case; when, at the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, the court adjourned.

The Senate having again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment,

Mr. McDUFFIE rose and said, that in consequence of a remark of Mr. WIRT yesterday, he felt himself called upon to say, in substance, that the publication of his remarks, in opening the case against Judge Peck, had been made without his authority; that the report of these remarks must have appeared evidently imperfect, though probably as perfect as, under the circumstances, it could have been; and that, if he had been consulted, he should have advised against the publication.

Mr. WIRT acceded to the correctness of these suggestions, and appeared to do so the more readily from the fact that he had seen his own remarks, made on Saturday, published this morning, without his having been consulted on the subject. He added, that he was sure that nothing had been said by the honorable manager in his opening speech, of the truth of which he had not been entirely satisfied.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 25.

The Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. WIRT occupied four hours in concluding his speech for the respondent. Wit, sarcasm, searching argument, and impressive eloquence, poured forth in streams, riveted the attention and elicited the admiration of a crowded Senate-room and crowded galleries during that long space of time. Whatever might be the fate of the respondent, said the graceful orator, in subdued and almost exhausted tones; whether convicted or acquitted, he should always be proud to take him by the hand as that noblest of God's works, AN HONEST MAN, and to call him HIS FRIEND.

The court and Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26.

After the consideration of a number of private bills, &c. the Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. STORRS rose and addressed the Court in support of the impeachment, for upwards of three hours. He maintained the position, that no free citizen could be punished by the summary process of attachment for a libel or contempt against any court in a cause not pending in that court; that such a power had never been exercised, even by the courts of England; that the charge against Judge Peck was not so much for suspending Mr. Lawless, as an attorney, from practice in his court, but for imprisoning him, and depriving him of his liberty as a citizen, without indictment and trial by jury; that libels or contempts, for causes not pending in court, were misdemeanors, which could only be punished by indictment and trial, and that the conduct of Judge Peck tended to break down all the securities and guards which the law had raised for the protection of the liberties of the American people.

Before he concluded, the court adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee appointed to investigate the present condition of the Post Office Department, offered the following resolution, observing that the committee were unanimously of the opinion, that, in order to prosecute that investigation with effect, it was necessary that they should be empowered to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That the Select Committee appointed to examine and report the present condition of the Post Office Department have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CLAYTON moved the second reading and adoption of the resolution at this time; but this motion requiring the unanimous assent of the Senate for its passage, and Mr. BENTON objecting to it, the resolution lies on the table one day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for the support of Africans captured by vessels of the United States, and brought into the United States.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate then again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. STORRS concluded his argument in support of the impeachment. Its sequel was peculiarly impressive and eloquent. One sentiment uttered by the honorable manager is especially worthy of record. He said the best support of the judiciary was to be found in the affections of the people. The people would be true to the judiciary as long as they were true to themselves. The judiciary would find protection with the people, and in their legislative halls, until they should become so debased as to be unworthy of protection. It was not by the usurpation of an unlawful and tyrannical power, nor by the exercise of an unlawful jurisdiction, that they could expect their independence to be respected or preserved; and he seemed to press this point so far as to think that the character, utility, and fate of the judicial branch of the Government depended upon the decision of this case.

The court and Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY JANUARY 28.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAYTON, and Mr. LIVINGSTON, were severally taken up and adopted.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate again resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. WIRT, with permission, explained a remark which he was understood to have made towards the conclusion of his argument in favor of the respondent.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose, and addressed the court in an able argument in support of the impeachment. He declared, that the usurpation of an authority not legally possessed by a judge, or the manifest abuse of a power really given, was a misbehavior in the sense of the constitution, for which he should be dismissed from office. He contended, that the conduct of Judge Peck, in the case of Mr. Lawless, was in express violation of the constitution and the laws of the land; that the circumstances of that case were amply sufficient to show a criminal intention on his part in the summary punishment of Mr. Lawless; that, in order to prove the criminality of his intention, it was not necessary to demonstrate an actually malicious action, or a lurking revenge; that the infliction upon Mr. Lawless of a summary and cruel punishment, for having written an article decorous in its language, was itself sufficient to prove the badness of the motive; that the consequences of the judge's actions were indicative of his intentions; that our courts had no right to punish, as for contempts, in a summary mode, libels, even in pending causes; and that, if he succeeded, as he believed he should, in establishing these positions, he should consider that he had a right to demand the judgment of the court against the respondent. The honorable manager continued to address the court for three hours and a quarter; and finding that he could not conclude his argument at this sitting, the court adjourned till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29.

DUTY ON IRON.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a memorial from the mechanics and others, workers in iron, of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for a reduction of the duties upon imported iron. It was referred to the Select Committee, to whom a former memorial on the same subject was committed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also communicated a memorial from sundry inhabitants of New Jersey, praying a drawback of the duties on iron, and other articles employed in the building of American ships.

Mr. DICKERSON moved the reference of this paper to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HAYNE suggested that it more appropriately belonged to the Committee on Commerce; and he made a motion accordingly.

The question being first taken on the reference to the Committee on Manufactures, there appeared ayes 12, noes 10.

There being no quorum voting,

Mr. WOODBURY called for the reading of the memorial; which being done,

Mr. HAYNE said he still thought the Committee of Commerce to be the proper direction for this memorial. It referred to drawbacks on various articles, and this consideration would induce him to adhere to his motion, to refer it to that committee.

Mr. DICKERSON said the first motion was on referring the memorial to the Committee on Manufactures. It deeply involved the interests of one of the most important manufactures in the country, ship building, which, though ultimately looking to the commercial, yet was as vitally interesting to the manufacturing concerns of the country.

A memorial praying for a drawback on nails, had been referred to the Committee on Commerce, although the subject would more appropriately come under the cognizance of the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BENTON said, if he comprehended the views of the gentleman from New Jersey, he was hostile to the objects of the memorial; and, therefore, the committee over which he presided was not a fit tribunal to decide on its merits. Under that belief, he [Mr. B.] would invoke to his aid a rule of the Senate, which he had successfully done on a former occasion, providing that no bill or memorial should be committed to a committee hostile to it. As far back as our legislation had commenced, it had been the wholesome practice, except in a few instances, to refer all subjects to committees deemed favorably disposed to them, on the principle "that a child should not be put out to nurse to those who would strangle or destroy it, by refusing it sufficient nourishment." Under the belief, then, that the Committee on Manufactures, over which the gentleman from New Jersey presided, was hostile to the prayer of the memorial, he hoped it would be referred to the Committee on Commerce, where it would meet with a more favorable consideration.

Mr. WOODBURY admitted the fact, that the subject of the memorial related immediately to manufactures, and to manufactures the most important to the country; but they were directly concerned with commerce, and, in the end, were vitally interesting to it. The memorial should then go to that distinct committee. The gentleman from New Jersey had made an allusion to the memorial, praying for a drawback on nails. He had and still thought that that memorial had been very properly referred to the Committee on Commerce; not that nails were not manufactures, but because the object of the memorial was for the benefit of the commercial interest. Suppose, [said Mr. W.] the memorial related to the manufacture of cannon and gunpowder, would it not be more appropriately referred to the Military Committee than the Committee on Manufactures?

Mr. DICKERSON said he could explain the reasons which induced him to wish this subject referred to the Committee on Manufactures. It was becoming the practice of late, whenever a petition was presented to the Senate praying for the repeal or reduction of duties on iron, on woollens, or almost any other article, it was immediately sent to the Committee on Commerce, thus tending to throw the weight of these interests into the hands of the merchants of the country, to the exclusion of a fair representation of the views of the manufacturers. If we take the view of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [said Mr. D.,] the Committee on Manufactures will soon be a mere nominal committee, shorn of its influence upon the action of Congress.

Mr. KING observed, that he had been under the impression that it was the object of the Congress of the United States to give to every subject presented to them by our fellow-citizens such a consideration as would induce them to believe that the investigation had been conducted with fairness and deliberation. Now, sir, said he, if we refer this memorial to the committee on Manufactures—a committee confessedly hostile to its objects, will it be believed by the memorialists that their views and arguments had met with fair, candid, and deliberate examination? By our sending it to that committee, they cannot think otherwise than that we have prejudged their case, and decided against it without giving it the slightest consideration.

Mr. K. would not enlarge on this view of the subject; he would only leave it to the gentleman from New Jersey, whether he believed that any report of the committee, over which he presided, would be favorable to the memorial, if, indeed, they reported at all. Without at this time entering into any argument, he would merely express the hope that the memorial would be referred to such a committee as would satisfy the memorialists that the Senate was disposed to give to their views a fair and candid examination.

Mr. FOOT said he was somewhat surprised to hear it contended that this subject belonged exclusively to the Committee on Commerce. The memorial prayed for a drawback upon various articles, classed among the manufactures of the country. The practice of both Houses of Congress seemed, in any event, to forbid its being sent to the Committee on Commerce. If it were not referred to the Committee on Manufactures, it surely should rather go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WOODBURY said he wished to state, in illustration, one or two facts that had occurred to him, in consequence of the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey. The memorial on the subject of a drawback on nails manufactured from imported iron, had first been referred to the Committee on Finance, and that committee had been discharged from its further consideration, and it had been sent to the Committee on Commerce; so that all the memorials on the subject of drawbacks were now before the last named committee. The first application for a reduction of the duties on salt came from the agricultural interest of the country, and the subject had been referred to the Committee on Agriculture, who, years since, reported the first bill for a reduction of the duties on that article. How was it at this session of Congress? A bill to reduce the duty on a peculiar kind of blankets, manufactured for the use of the Indians, had been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; because the measure had been introduced for the purpose of relieving that branch of our trade from the burthens under which it labored, although, from the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey, the Committee on Manufactures would have been the most proper reference. This memorial, then, which looked solely to the relieving of our commerce from its present state of depression, ought, with equal justice, to be sent to that committee which had the subject under its peculiar care.

Mr. SILSBEE said he conceived the Committee on Commerce most competent to decide upon the subject in question, and he hoped it would be submitted to that committee.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that the application of the memorialists was for the purpose of relieving the shipping interest of the United States from embarrassments of such a character as threatened its existence. It was now, he said, proposed to refer the memorial to the Committee on Manufactures, over which the gentleman from New Jersey presided, who was confessedly hostile to all its objects. Now, he would ask, would not such a reference be consigning it to the tomb of all the Capulets? Report after report had been made by that committee, all showing the utmost hostility to the interests whose protection was prayed for by the memorial, and yet the chairman of that committee wished it to be consigned to his care, for the purpose of crushing it at a blow. He would ask if it was right, reasonable, or proper, that this memorial should be consigned to a committee who had already predetermined to destroy it? The views of the gentleman in relation to iron manufactures and iron mines were well known; and, if the commerce of the country depended on him, God save the commerce! Mr. H. concluded by asking for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. DICKERSON said he had entertained no idea that this memorial was to be sent to a committee who could make a final decision upon it. It was a new construction to the powers of committees. If the Senate should not concur in the report of a committee, they were not bound to accept it. A committee surely had no power to crush any thing—to conceal any thing—to destroy any thing. Mr. D. said, he deemed it proper that the views of all parties should be fairly developed. He had no doubt the Committee on Commerce was fully competent to pass upon the memorial, but he conceived that there were other interests more directly involved in it. For his own part, he felt no ambition to have charge of this matter. Mr. D. said he thanked the gentleman who last addressed the Senate for the allusion that delicacy should have prevented him from asking that this subject should be referred to the committee of which he had the honor of being chairman. Such a delicacy he might have felt many years ago; but that time had long since gone by. His delicacy must now yield to his duty.

Mr. BENTON read the rule of proceedings on the subject, and argued that no bill or memorial should be referred to a committee hostile to its objects.

Mr. KNIGHT said he would not have addressed the Senate on this subject, had it not been for the remark of an honorable Senator, [Mr. HAYNE,] that the Committee on Manufactures had pre-judged the question proposed to be referred to it. This, as one of the members of the committee, he felt bound to deny. He contended that all the efforts of that committee had tended to the promotion of commerce as well as other interests. He was in favor of the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Manufactures, whom he believed would make a favorable report upon the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, if this was a mere question to consider the expediency of allowing a drawback on imported articles used in ship building, he should incline to the opinion of his colleague, that the most proper reference would be to the Committee on Commerce. He should incline to think, also, that, in judging of the propriety of the reference of a subject to any particular committee, the Senate ought to be influenced more by the purpose for which the committee had been created than by the opinions of its members. This memorial [Mr. W. added] came from a State not much interested in ship building, and treated of matters unconnected with the subject of drawback. It had something to say in relation to internal improvements, and something to say with regard to the constitutional propriety of laying protecting duties on imported articles. Now, as he (Mr. W.) wished to give to these other topics embraced in the memorial some little consideration, and as he had no desire to hear from the Committee on Commerce a report on the subject of internal improvements and the American system, he would move to lay it on the table.

The memorial was then laid on the table: yeas, 19—nays, 17.

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The Senate then again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. BUCHANAN concluded his argument in support of the impeachment. He took the further position, that the publication of Mr. Lawless, under the signature of "A Citizen," could not, in a trial upon an indictment for libel, be established to be libellous, according to the constitution and laws of the land; that the paper was, on its face, perfectly harmless in itself; and that, so far as it went, it was not an unfair representation of the opinion of Judge Peck. The honorable manager critically and legally analyzed the nine last specifications in the publication, to establish these points. He then proceeded to sum up and descant upon the testimony produced in the case before the Court of Impeachment, in order to show the arbitrary and cruel conduct of Judge Peck; and, in a peroration, marked by its ardent eloquence, he declared, that if this man escaped, the declaration of a distinguished politician of this country, that the power of impeachment was but the scarecrow of the constitution, would be fully verified; that when this trial commenced, he recoiled with horror from the idea of limiting, and rendering precarious and dependent, the tenure of the judicial office, but that the acquittal of the respondent would reconcile him to that evil, as one less than a hopeless and remediless submission to judicial usurpation and tyranny, at least so far as respected the inferior courts. God forbid that the limitation should ever be extended to the Supreme Court! Mercy to the respondent would be cruelty to the American people. In the name, therefore, of the people of the United States, whose liberties he had violated—in the name of the judiciary, whose character he had injured and tarnished—he respectfully asked of this honorable court the conviction of the respondent.

The argument being concluded on both sides, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the court then resolved to meet again at 12 o'clock on Monday morning next, in order to proceed further in the consideration of this impeachment.

Trial of Judge Peck.--Bank of the United States.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, JAN. 31.

The Senate again resolved itself into a Court of Impeachment; and

The House of Representatives, with their managers, and the counsel for the respondent, having come into court, Mr. TAZEWELL moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That this court will now pronounce judgment upon James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

Mr. TAZEWELL observed, that if there were one member of the court unprepared for a decision on this impeachment at this time, or preferred any other mode of proceeding to pronounce judgment, he would cheerfully withdraw the resolution.

No objection having been made, the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The names of the Senators were then called over by the Secretary.

The Secretary of the Senate, under the direction of the VICE-PRESIDENT, read the article of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

The VICE-PRESIDENT rose and said--

SENATORS: You have heard the article of impeachment read: you have heard the evidence and the arguments for and against the respondent: when your names are called, you will rise from your seats, and distinctly pronounce whether he is guilty or not guilty, as charged by the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT then, in an audible voice, put the following question to each of the Senators in alphabetical order:

Mr. Senator -----: What say you: Is James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, guilty or not guilty of the high misdemeanor charged in the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

Each Senator rose from his seat, as this question was propounded to him, and answered as follows:

GUILTY.--Messrs. Barnard, Brown, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, Poindexter, Robbins, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Troup, Tyler, Woodbury.--21.

NOT GUILTY.--Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chase, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Webster, White, Ruggles.--22.

Mr. BENTON and Mr. ROBINSON were excused from voting. Mr. BIBB, Mr. CHAMBERS, and Mr. ROWAN were absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT again rose, and observed--

SENATORS: Twenty-one Senators having voted that the respondent is guilty, and twenty-two that he is not guilty; and two-thirds of the Senate not having voted for his conviction, it becomes the duty of the Chair to pronounce, that James H. Peck, the Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, stands acquitted of the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT then directed the Marshal to adjourn the Court of Impeachment; and it was accordingly adjourned sine die.

TUESDAY, FEB. 1.

The whole of this day's sitting was consumed in the reception of petitions and resolutions, and with closed doors on Executive business.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 2.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BENTON, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, rose to ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charter of the Bank of the United States ought not to be renewed.

Mr. BENTON commenced his speech in support of the application for the leave he was about to ask, with a justification of himself for bringing forward the question of renewal at this time, when the charter had still five years to run; and bottomed his vindication chiefly on the right he possessed, and the necessity he was under to answer certain reports of one of the committees of the Senate, made in opposition to certain resolutions relative to the bank, which he had submitted to the Senate at former sessions, and which reports he had not had an opportunity of answering. He said it had been his fortune, or chance, some three years ago, to submit a resolution in relation to the undrawn balances of public money in the hands of the bank, and to accompany it with some poor remarks of unfavorable implication to the future existence of that institution. My resolution [said Mr. B.] was referred to the Committee on Finance, who made a report decidedly adverse to all my views, and eminently favorable to the bank, both as a present and future institution. This report came in on the 13th of May, just fourteen days before the conclusion of a six months' session, when all was hurry and precipitation to terminate the business on hand, and when there was not the least chance to engage the attention of the Senate in the consideration of any new subject. The report was, therefore, laid upon the table unanswered, but was printed by order of the Senate, and that in extra numbers, and widely diffused over the country by means of the newspaper press. At the commencement of the next session, it being irregular to call for the consideration of the past report, I was under the necessity to begin anew, and accordingly submitted my resolution a second time, and that quite early in the session; say on the first day of January. It was my wish and request that this resolution might be discussed in the Senate, but the sentiment of the majority was different, and a second reference of it was made to the Finance Committee. A second report of the same purport with the first was a matter of course; but what did not seem to me to be a matter of course was this; that this second report should not come in until the 20th day of February, just fourteen days again before the end of the session, for it was then the short session, and the Senate as much pinched as before for time to finish the business on hand. No answer could be made to it, but the report was printed, with the former report appended to it; and thus, united like the Siamese twins, and with the apparent, but not real sanction of the Senate, they went forth together to make the tour of the Union in the columns of the newspaper press. Thus, I was a second time out of court; a second time non-suited for want of a replication, when there was no time to file one. I had intended to begin de novo, and for the third time, at the opening of the ensuing session; but, happily, was anticipated and prevented by the annual message of the new President, [General Jackson,] which brought this question of renewing the bank charter directly before Congress. A reference of this part of the message was made, of course, to the Finance Committee: the committee, of course, again reported, and with increased ardor, in favor of the bank. Unhappily this third report, which was an amplification and reiteration of the two former, did not come in until the session was four months advanced, and when the time of the Senate had become engrossed, and its attention absorbed, by the numerous and important subjects which had accumulated upon the calendar. Printing in extra numbers, general circulation through the newspaper press, and no answer, was the catastrophe of this third reference to the Finance Committee. Thus was I non-suited for the third time. The fourth session has now come round; the same subject is again before the same committee on the reference of the part of the President's second annual message which relates to the bank; and, doubtless, a fourth report of the same import with the three preceding ones, may be expected. But when? is the question. And, as I cannot answer that question, and the session is now two-thirds advanced, and as I have no disposition to be cut off for the fourth time, I have thought proper to create an occasion to deliver my own sentiments, by asking leave to introduce a joint resolution, adverse to the tenor of all the reports, and to give my reasons against them, while supporting my application for the leave demanded; a course of proceeding which is just to myself, and unjust to no one, since all are at liberty to answer me. These are my personal reasons for this step, and a part of my answer to the objection that I have begun too soon. The conduct of the bank, and its friends, constitutes the second branch of my justification. It is certainly not "too soon" for them, judging by their conduct, to engage in the question of renewing the bank charter. In and out of Congress, they all seem to be of one accord on this point. Three reports of committees in the Senate, and one from a committee of the House of Representatives, have been made in favor of the renewal; and all these reports, instead of being laid away for future use—instead of being stuck in pigeon holes, and labeled for future attention, as things coming forth prematurely, and not wanted for present service—have, on the contrary, been universally received by the bank and its friends, in one great tempest of applause; greeted with every species of acclamation; reprinted in most of the papers, and every effort made to give the widest diffusion, and the highest effect, to the arguments they contain. In addition to this, and at the present session, within a few days past, three thousand copies of the exposition of the affairs of the Bank have been printed by order of the two Houses, a thing never before done, and now intended to blazon the merits of the bank. [Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, here expressed some dissent to this statement; but Mr. B. affirmed its correctness in substance if not to the letter, and continued.] This does not look as if the bank advocates thought it was too soon to discuss the question of renewing the charter; and, upon this exhibition of their sentiments, I shall rest the assertion and the proof, that they do not think so. The third branch of my justification rests upon a sense of public duty; upon a sense of what is just and advantageous to the people in general, and to the debtors and stockholders of the bank in particular. The renewal of the charter is a question which concerns the people at large; and if they are to have any hand in the decision of this question—if they are even to know what is done before it is done, it is high time that they and their Representatives in Congress should understand each other's mind upon it. The charter has but five years to run; and if renewed at all, will probably be at some short period, say two or three years, before the time is out, and at any time sooner that a chance can be seen to gallop the renewal through Congress. The people, therefore, have no time to lose, if they mean to have any hand in the decision of this great question. To the bank itself, it must be advantageous, at least, if not desirable, to know its fate at once, that it may avoid, (if there is to be no renewal,) the trouble and expense of multiplying branches upon the eve of dissolution, and the risk and inconvenience of extending loans beyond the term of its existence. To the debtors upon mortgages, and indefinite accommodations, it must be also advantageous, if not desirable, to be notified in advance of the end of their indulgences: so that, to every interest, public and private, political and pecuniary, general and particular, full discussion, and seasonable decision, is just and proper.

I hold myself justified, Mr. President, upon the reasons given, for proceeding in my present application; but, as example is sometimes more authoritative than reason, I will take the liberty to produce one, which is as high in point of authority as it is appropriate in point of application, and which happens to fit the case before the Senate as completely as if it had been made for it. I speak of what has lately been done in the Parliament of Great Britain. It so happens, that the charter of the Bank of England is to expire, upon its own limitation, nearly about the same time with the charter of the Bank of the United States, namely, in the year 1833; and as far back as 1824, no less than nine years before its expiration, the question of its renewal was debated, and that with great freedom, in the British House of Commons. I will read some extracts from that debate, as the fairest way of presenting the example to the Senate, and the most effectual mode of securing to myself the advantage of the sentiments expressed by British statesmen.

[THE EXTRACTS.]

Sir Henry Parnell.—“The House should no longer delay to turn its attention to the expediency of renewing the charter of the Bank of England. Heretofore, it had been the regular custom to renew the charter several years before the existing charter had expired. The last renewal was made when the existing charter had eleven years to run: the present charter had nine years only to continue, and he felt very anxious to prevent the making of any agreement between the Government and the bank for a renewal, without a full examination of the policy of again conferring upon the bank of England any exclusive privilege. The practice had been for Government to make a secret arrangement with the Bank; to submit it immediately to the proprietors of the bank for their approbation, and to call upon the House the next day to confirm it, without affording any opportunity of fair deliberation. So much information had been obtained upon the banking trade, and upon the nature of currency in the last fifteen years, that it was particularly necessary to enter upon a full investigation of the policy of renewing the bank charter before any negotiation should be entered upon between the Government and the bank; and he trusted the Government would not commence any such negotiation until the sense of Parliament had been taken on this important subject.”

“Mr. Hume said it was of very great importance that his majesty's ministers should take immediate steps to free themselves from the trammels in which they had long been held by the bank. As the interest of money was now nearly on a level with what it was when the bank lent a large sum to Government, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not listen to any application for a renewal of the bank charter, but would pay off every shilling that had been borrowed from the bank.

* * * * * Let the country gentlemen recollect that the bank was now acting as pawn-broker on a large scale, and lending money on estates, a system entirely contrary to the original intention of that institution. * * * * * He hoped, before the expiration of the charter, that a regular inquiry would be made into the whole subject.”

Mr. Edward Ellice. “It (the Bank of England) is a great monopolizing body, enjoying privileges which belonged to no other corporation, and no other class of his majesty's subjects. * * * * * He hoped that the exclusive charter would never again be granted; and that the conduct of the bank during the last ten or twelve years would make Government very cautious how they entertained any such propositions. The right honorable Chancellor of the Exchequer [Mr. Robinson] had protested against the idea of straining any point to the prejudice of the bank; he thought, however, that the bank had very little to complain of, when their stock, after all their past profits, was at 238."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer "depreciated the discussion, as leading to no practical result."

Mr. Alexander Baring "objected to it as premature and unnecessary."

Sir William Pulteney (in another debate.) "The prejudices in favor of the present bank have proceeded from the long habit of considering it as a sort of pillar which nothing can shake. * * * * * The bank has been supported, and is still supported, by the fear and terror of which, by means of its monopoly, it has had the power to inspire. It is well known, that there is hardly an extensive trader, a manufacturer, or a banker, either in London, or at a distance from it, to whom the bank could not do a serious injury, and could often bring on even insolvency. * * * * *

I consider the power given by the monopoly to be of the nature of all other despotic power, which corrupts the despot as much as it corrupts the slave. * * * * * It is in the nature of man, that a monopoly must necessarily be ill-conducted. * * * * * Whatever language the [private] bankers may feel themselves obliged to hold, yet no one can believe that they have any satisfaction in being, and continuing, under a dominion which has proved so grievous and so disastrous. * * * * *

I can never believe that the merchants and bankers of this country will prove unwilling to emancipate themselves, if they can do it without risking the resentment of the bank. No man in France was heard to complain, openly, of the Bastille while it existed. The merchants and bankers of this country have the blood of Englishmen, and will be happy to relieve themselves from a situation of perpetual terror, if they could do it consistently with a due regard to their own interest."

Here is authority added to reason—the force of a great example added to the weight of unanswerable reasons, in favor of early discussion; so that, I trust, I have effectually put aside that old and convenient objection to the "time," that most flexible and accommodating objection, which applies to all seasons, and all subjects, and is just as available for cutting off a late debate, because it is too late, as it is for stifling an early one, because it is too early.

But, it is said that the debate will injure the stockholders; that it depreciates the value of their property, and that it is wrong to sport with the vested rights of individuals. This complaint, supposing it to come from the stockholders themselves, is both absurd and ungrateful. It is absurd, because the stockholders, at least so many of them as are not foreigners, must have known when they accepted a charter of limited duration, that the approach of its expiration would renew the debate upon the propriety of its existence; that every citizen had a right, and every public man was under an obligation, to declare his sentiments freely; that there was nothing in the charter, numerous as its peculiar privileges were, to exempt the bank from that freedom of speech and writing, which extends to all our public affairs; and that the charter was not to be renewed here, as the Bank of England charter had formerly been renewed, by a private arrangement among its friends, suddenly produced in Congress, and galloped through without the knowledge of the country. The American part of the stockholders (for I would not reply to the complaints of the foreigners) must have known all this; and known it when they accepted the charter. They accepted it, subject to this known consequence; and, therefore, the complaint about injuring their property is absurd. That it is ungrateful, must be apparent to all who will reflect upon the great privileges which these stockholders will have enjoyed for twenty years, and the large profits they have already derived from their charter. They have been dividing seven per cent. per annum, unless when prevented by their own mismanagement; and have laid up a real estate of three millions of dollars for future division; and the money which has done these handsome things, instead of being diminished or impaired in the process, is still worth largely upwards of one hundred cents to the dollar: say, one hundred and twenty-five cents. For the peculiar privileges which enabled them to make these profits, the stockholders ought to be grateful; but, like all persons who have been highly favored with undue benefits, they mistake a privilege for a right—a favor for a duty—and resent, as an attack upon their property, a refusal to prolong their undue advantages. There is no ground for these complaints, but for thanks and benedictions rather, for permitting the bank to live out its numbered days! That institution has forfeited its charter. It may be shut up at any hour. It lives from day to day by the indulgence of those whom it daily attacks; and, if any one is ignorant of this fact, let him look at the case of the Bank of the United States against Owens and others, decided in the Supreme Court, and reported in the 2d Peters.

[Here Mr. B. read a part of this case, showing that it was a case of usury at the rate of forty-six per cent. and that Mr. Sergeant, counsel for the bank, resisted the decision of the Supreme Court, upon the ground that it would expose the charter of the bank to forfeiture; and that the decision was, nevertheless, given upon that ground; so that the bank, being convicted of taking usury, in violation of its charter, was liable to be deprived of its charter, at any time that a scire facias should issue against it.]

Mr. B. resumed. Before I proceed to the consideration of the resolution, I wish to be indulged in adverting to a rule or principle of parliamentary practice, which it is only necessary to read now in order to avoid the possibility of any necessity for recurring to it hereafter. It is the rule which forbids any member to be present—which, in fact, requires him to withdraw—during the discussion of any question in which his private interest may be concerned; and authorizes the expurgation from the Journal of any vote which may have been given under the predicament of an interested motive. I demand that the Secretary of the Senate may read the rule to which I allude.

[The Secretary read the following rule:]

"Where the private interests of a member are concerned in a bill or question, he is to withdraw. And where such an interest has appeared, his voice has been disallowed, even after a division. In a case so contrary, not only to the laws of decency, but to the fundamental principles of the social compact, which denies to any man to be a judge in his own cause, it is for the honor of the House that this rule, of immemorial observance, should be strictly adhered to."

First: Mr. President, I object to the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, because I look upon the bank as an institution too great and powerful to be tolerated in a Government of free and equal laws. Its power is that of a purse; a power more potent than that of the sword; and this power it possesses to a degree and extent that will enable this bank to draw to itself too much of the political power of this Union; and too much of the individual property of the citizens of these States. The money power of the bank is both direct and indirect.

[The VICE PRESIDENT here intimated to Mr. B. that he was out of order, and had not a right to go into the merits of the bank upon the motion upon which he had made. Mr. B. begged pardon of the Vice President, and respectfully insisted that he was in order, and had a right to proceed. He said he was proceeding upon the parliamentary rule of asking leave to bring in a joint resolution, and, in doing which, he had a right to state his reasons, which reasons constituted his speech; that the motion was debateable, and the whole Senate might answer him. The VICE PRESIDENT then directed Mr. B. to proceed.]

Mr. B. resumed. The direct power of the bank is now prodigious, and, in the event of the renewal of the charter, must speedily become boundless and uncontrollable. The bank is now authorized to own effects, lands inclusive, to the amount of fifty-five millions of dollars, and to issue notes to the amount of thirty-five millions more. This makes ninety millions; and, in addition to this vast sum, there is an opening for an unlimited increase: for, there is a dispensation in the charter to issue as many more notes as Congress, by law, may permit. This opens the door to boundless emissions; for what can be more unbounded than the will and pleasure of successive Congresses? The indirect power of the bank cannot be stated in figures; but it can be shown to be immense. In the first place, it has the keeping of the public moneys, now amounting to twenty-six millions per annum, (the Post Office Department included,) and the gratuitous use of the undrawn balances, large enough to constitute, in themselves, the capital of a great State bank. In the next place, its promissory notes are receivable, by law, in purchase of all property owned by the United States, and in payment of all debts due them; and this may increase its power to the amount of the annual revenue, by creating a demand for its notes to that amount. In the third place, it wears the name of the United States, and has the Federal Government for a partner; and this name, and this partnership, identifies the credit of the bank with the credit of the Union. In the fourth place, it is armed with authority to disparage and discredit the notes of other banks, by excluding them from all payments to the United States; and this, added to all its other powers, direct and indirect, makes this institution the uncontrollable monarch of the moneyed system of the Union. To whom is all this power granted? To a company of private individuals, many of them foreigners, and the mass of them residing in a remote and narrow corner of the Union, unconnected by any sympathy with the fertile regions of the Great Valley, in which the natural power of this Union—the power of numbers—will be found to reside long before the renewed term of a second charter would expire. By whom is all this power to be exercised? By a directory of seven, (it may be,) governed by a majority, of four, (it may be;) and none of these elected by the people, or responsible to them. Where is it to be exercised? At a single city, distant a thousand miles from some of the States, receiving the produce of none of them (except one;) no interest in the welfare of any of them (except one;) no commerce with the people; with branches in every State; and every branch subject to the secret and absolute orders of the supreme central head: thus constituting a system of centralism, hostile to the federative principle of our Union, encroaching upon the wealth and power of the States, and organized upon a principle to give the highest effect to the greatest power. This mass of power, thus concentrated, thus ramified, and thus directed, must necessarily become, under a prolonged existence, the absolute monopolist of American money, the sole manufacturer of paper currency, and the sole authority (for authority it will be) to which the Federal Government, the State Governments, the great cities, corporate bodies, merchants, traders, and every private citizen, must, of necessity apply, for every loan which their exigencies may demand. "The rich ruleth the poor, and the borrower is the servant of the lender." Such are the words of holy writ; and if the authority of the Bible admitted of corroboration, the history of the world is at hand to give it. But I will not cite the history of the world, but one eminent example only, and that of a nature so high and commanding, as to include all others; and so near and recent, as to be directly applicable to our own situation. I speak of what happened in Great Britain, in the year 1795, when the Bank of England, by a brief and unceremonious letter to Mr. Pitt, such as a miser would write to a prodigal in a pinch, gave the proof of what a great moneyed power could do, and would do, to promote its own interest, in a crisis of national alarm and difficulty. I will read the letter. It is exceedingly short; for after the compliments are omitted, there are but three lines of it. It is, in fact, about as long as a sentence of execution, leaving out the prayer of the judge. It runs thus:

"It is the wish of the Court of Directors that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would settle his arrangements of finances for the present year, in such manner as not to depend upon any further assistance from them, beyond what is already agreed for."

Such were the words of this memorable note, sufficiently explicit and intelligible; but to appreciate it fully, we must know what was the condition of Great Britain at that time? Remember it was the year 1795, and the beginning of that year, than which a more portentous one never opened upon the British empire. The war with the French republic had been raging for two years; Spain had just declared war against Great Britain; Ireland was bursting into rebellion; the fleet in the North Sea was in open mutiny; and a cry for the reform of abuses, and the reduction of taxes, resounded through the land. It was a season of alarm and consternation, and of imminent actual danger to Great Britain; and this was the moment which the Bank selected to notify the minister that no more loans were to be expected! What was the effect of this notification? It was to paralyze the Government, and to subdue the minister to the purposes of the bank. From that day forth Mr. Pitt became the minister of the bank; and, before two years were out, he had succeeded in bringing all the departments of Government, King, Lords, and Commons, and the Privy Council, to his own slavish condition. He stopped the specie payments of the bank, and made its notes the lawful currency of the land. In 1797 he obtained an order in council for this purpose; in the same year an act of Parliament to confirm the order for a month, and afterwards a series of acts to continue it for twenty years. This was the reign of the bank. For twenty years it was a dominant power in England, and, during that disastrous period, the public debt was increased about £400,000,000 sterling, equal nearly to two thousand millions of dollars, and that by paper loans from a bank which, according to its own declarations, had not a shilling to lend at the commencement of the period! I omit the rest. I say nothing of the general subjugation of the country banks, the rise in the price of food, the decline in wages, the increase of crimes and taxes, the multiplication of lords and beggars, and the frightful demoralization of society. I omit all this. I only seize the prominent figure in the picture, that of a Government arrested in the midst of war and danger by the veto of a moneyed corporation; and only permitted to go on upon condition of assuming the odium of stopping specie payments, and sustaining the promissory notes of an insolvent bank, as the lawful currency of the land. This single figure suffices to fix the character of the times; for when the Government becomes the "servant of the lender," the people themselves become its slaves. Cannot the Bank of the United States, if re-chartered, act in the same way? It certainly can, and just as certainly will, when time and opportunity shall serve, and interest may prompt. It is to no purpose that gentlemen may come forward, and vaunt the character of the United States' Bank, and proclaim it too just and merciful to oppress the State. I must be permitted to repudiate both the pledge and the praise. The security is insufficient, and the encomium belongs to Constantinople. There were enough such in the British Parliament the year before, nay, the day before the bank stopped; yet their pledges and praises neither prevented the stoppage, nor made good the damage that ensued. There were gentlemen in our Congress to pledge themselves in 1810 for the then expiring bank, of which the one now existing is a second and deteriorated edition; and if their securityship had been accepted, and the old bank re-chartered, we should have seen this Government greeted with a note, about August, 1814—about the time the British were burning this capitol—of the same tenor with the one received by the younger Pitt in the year 1795; for, it is incontestable, that that bank was owned by men who would have glorified in arresting the Government, and the war itself, for want of money. Happily, the wisdom and patriotism of Jefferson, under the providence of God, prevented that infamy and ruin, by preventing the renewal of the old bank charter.

Secondly. I object to the continuance of this bank, because its tendencies are dangerous and pernicious to the Government and the people.

What are the tendencies of a great moneyed power, connected with the Government, and controlling its fiscal operations? Are they not dangerous to every interest, public and private—political as well as pecuniary? I say they are; and briefly enumerate the heads of each mischief.

1. Such a bank tends to subjugate the Government, as I have already shown in the history of what happened to the British minister in the year 1795.

2. It tends to collusions between the Government and the bank in the terms of the loans, as has been fully experienced in England in those frauds upon the people, and insults upon the understanding, called three per cent. loans, in which the Government, for about £50 borrowed, became liable to pay £100.

3. It tends to create public debt, by facilitating public loans, and substituting unlimited supplies of paper, for limited supplies of coin. The British debt is born of the Bank of England. That bank was chartered in 1694, and was nothing more nor less in the beginning than an act of Parliament for the incorporation of a company of subscribers to a Government loan. The loan was £1,200,000; the interest £80,000; and the expenses of management £4,000. And this is the birth and origin, the germ and nucleus of that debt, which is now £900,000,000, (the unfunded items included) which bears an interest of £30,000,000, and costs £260,000 for annual management.

4. It tends to beget and prolong unnecessary wars, by furnishing the means of carrying them on without recurrence to the people. England is the ready example for this calamity. Her wars for the restoration of the Capet Bourbons were kept up by loans and subsidies created out of bank paper. The people of England had no interest in these wars, which cost them about £600,000,000 of debt in twenty-five years, in addition to the supplies raised within the year. The Kings she put back upon the French throne were not able to sit on it. Twice she put them on; twice they tumbled off in the mud; and all that now remains of so much sacrifice of life and money is, the debt, which is eternal, the taxes, which are intolerable, the pensions and titles of some warriors, and the keeping of the Capet Bourbons, who are returned upon their hands.

5. It tends to aggravate the inequality of fortunes; to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer; to multiply nabobs and paupers; and to deepen and widen the gulf which separates Dives from Lazarus. A great moneyed power is favorable to great capitalists; for it is the principle of money to favor money. It is unfavorable to small capitalists; for it is the principle of money to eschew the needy and unfortunate. It is injurious to the laboring classes; because they receive no favors, and have the price of the property they wish to acquire raised to the paper maximum, while wages remain at the silver minimum.

6. It tends to make and to break fortunes, by the flux and reflux of paper. Profuse issues, and sudden contractions, perform this operation, which can be repeated, like planetary and pestilential visitations, in every cycle of so many years; at every periodical return, transferring millions from the actual possessors of property to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. The last operation of this kind performed by the Bank of England, about five years ago, was described by Mr. Alexander Baring, in the House of Commons, in terms which are entitled to the knowledge and remembrance of American citizens. I will read his description, which is brief but impressive. After describing the profuse issues of 1823-24, he painted the re-action in the following terms:

"They, therefore, all at once, gave a sudden jerk to the horse on whose neck they had before suffered the reins to hang loose. They contracted their issues to a considerable extent. The change was at once felt throughout the country. A few days before that, no one knew what to do with his money: now, no one knew where to get it. * *

* * * * The London bankers found it necessary to follow the same course towards their country correspondents, and these again towards their customers, and each individual towards his debtor. The consequence was obvious, in the late panic. Every one, desirous to obtain what was due to him, ran to his banker, or to any other on whom he had a claim; and even those who had no immediate use for their money, took it back, and let it lie unemployed in their pockets, thinking it unsafe in others' hands. The effect of this alarm was, that houses which were weak went immediately. Then went second rate houses; and, lastly, houses which were solvent went, because their securities were unavailable. The daily calls to which each individual was subject put it out of his power to assist his neighbor. Men were known to seek for assistance, and, that, too, without finding it, who, on examination of their affairs, were proved to be worth 200,000 pounds,—men, too, who held themselves so secure, that, if asked six months before whether they could contemplate such an event, they would have said it would be impossible; unless the sky should fall, or some other event equally improbable should occur."

This is what was done in England five years ago; it is what may be done here in every five years to come, if the bank charter is renewed. Sole dispenser of money, it cannot omit the oldest and most obvious means of amassing wealth by the flux and reflux of paper. The game will be in its own hands, and the only answer to be given is that to which I have alluded: "The Sultan is too just and merciful to abuse his power."

Thirdly. I object to the renewal of the charter, on account of the exclusive privileges, and anti-republican monopoly, which it gives to the stockholders. It gives, and that by an act of Congress, to a company of individuals, the exclusive legal privileges:

1. To carry on the trade of banking upon the revenue and credit, and in the name, of the United States of America.

2. To pay the revenues of the Union in their own promissory notes.

SENATE.]

Bank of the United States.

3. To hold the moneys of the United States in deposit, without making compensation for the undrawn balances.

4. To discredit and disparage the notes of other banks, by excluding them from the collection of the federal revenue.

5. To hold real estate, receive rents, and retain a body of tenantry.

6. To deal in pawns, merchandise, and bills of exchange.

7. To establish branches in the States without their consent.

8. To be exempt from liability on the failure of the bank.

9. To have the United States for a partner.

10. To have foreigners for partners.

11. To be exempt from the regular administration of justice for the violations of their charter.

12. To have all these exclusive privileges secured to them as a monopoly, in a pledge of the public faith not to grant the like privileges to any other company.

These are the privileges, and this the monopoly, of the bank. Now, let us examine them, and ascertain their effect and bearing. Let us contemplate the magnitude of the power which they create; and ascertain the compatibility of this power with the safety of this republican Government, and the rights and interests of its free and equal constituents.

1. The name, the credit, and the revenues of the United States, are given up to the use of this company, and constitute in themselves an immense capital to bank upon.—The name of the United States, like that of the King, is a tower of strength; and this strong tower is now an out-work to defend the citadel of a moneyed corporation. The credit of the Union is incalculable; and, of this credit, as going with the name, and being in partnership with the United States, the same corporation now has possession. The revenues of the Union are twenty-six millions of dollars, including the Post Office; and all this is so much capital in the hands of the bank, because the revenue is received by it, and is payable in its promissory notes.

2. To pay the revenues of the United States in their own notes, until Congress, by law, shall otherwise direct.—This is a part of the charter, incredible and extraordinary as it may appear. The promissory notes of the bank are to be received in payment of every thing the United States may have to sell—in discharge of every debt due to her, until Congress, by law, shall otherwise direct; so that, if this bank, like its prototype in England, should stop payment, its promissory notes would still be receivable at every custom house, land office, post office, and by every collector of public moneys, throughout the Union, until Congress shall meet, pass a repealing law, and promulgate the repeal. Other banks depend upon their credit for the receivability of their notes; but this favored institution has law on its side, and a chartered right to compel the reception of its paper by the Federal Government. The immediate consequence of this extraordinary privilege is, that the United States becomes virtually bound to stand security for the bank, as much so as if she had signed a bond to that effect; and must stand forward to sustain the institution in all emergencies, in order to save her own revenue. This is what has already happened, some ten years ago, in the early progress of the bank, and when the immense aid given it by the Federal Government enabled it to survive the crisis of its own overwhelming mismanagement.

3. To hold the moneys of the United States in deposit, without making compensation for the use of the undrawn balances.—This is a right which I deny; but, as the bank claims it, and what is more material, enjoys it; and as the people of the United States have suffered to a vast extent in consequence of this claim and enjoyment, I shall not hesitate to set it down to the account of the bank. Let us then examine the value of this privilege, and its effect upon the interest of the community: and, in the first place, let us have a full and accurate view of the amount of these undrawn balances, from the establishment of the bank to the present day. Here it is! Look! Read!

See, Mr. President, what masses of money, and always on hand. The paper is covered all over with millions: and yet, for all these vast sums, no interest is allowed; no compensation is made to the United States. The Bank of England, for the undrawn balances of the public money, has made an equitable compensation to the British Government; namely, a permanent loan of half a million sterling, and a temporary loan of three millions for twenty years, without interest. Yet, when I moved for a like compensation to the United States, the proposition was utterly rejected by the Finance Committee, and treated as an attempt to violate the charter of the bank. At the same time it is incontestable, that the United States have been borrowing these undrawn balances from the bank, and paying an interest upon their own money. I think we can identify one of these loans. Let us try. In May, 1824, Congress authorized a loan of five millions of dollars to pay the awards under the treaty with Spain, commonly called the Florida treaty. The Bank of the United States took that loan, and paid the money for the United States in January and March, 1825. In looking over the statement of undrawn balances, it will be seen that they amounted to near four millions at the end of the first, and six millions at the end of the second quarter of that year. The inference is irresistible, and I leave every Senator to make it; only adding, that we have paid $1,469,375 in interest upon that loan, either to the bank or its transferees. This is a strong case, but I have a stronger one. It is known to every body that the United States subscribed seven millions to the capital stock of the bank, for which she gave her stock note, bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum. I have a statement from the Register of the Treasury, from which it appears that, up to the 30th day of June last, the United States had paid four millions seven hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars in interest upon that note; when it is proved by the statement of balances exhibited, that the United States, for the whole period in which that interest was accruing, had the half, or the whole, and once the double, of these seven millions in the hands of the bank. This is a stronger case than that of the five million loan, but it is not the strongest. The strongest case is this: In the year 1817, when the bank went into operation, the United States owed, among other debts, a sum of about fourteen millions and three-quarters, bearing an interest of three per cent. In the same year, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were authorized by an act of Congress to purchase that stock at sixty-five per cent., which was then its market price. Under this authority, the amount of about one million and a half was purchased; the remainder, amounting to about thirteen millions and a quarter, has continued unpurchased to this day; and, after costing the United States about six millions in interest since 1817, the stock has risen about four millions in value; that is to say, from sixty-five to nearly ninety-five. Now, here is a clear loss of ten millions of dollars to the United States. In 1817 she could have paid off thirteen millions and a quarter of debt, with eight millions and a half of dollars; now, after paying six millions of interest, it would require twelve millions and a half to pay off the same debt. By referring to the statement of undrawn balances, it will be seen that the United States had, during the whole year 1817, an average sum of above ten millions of dollars in the hands of the bank, being a million and a half more than enough to have bought in the whole of the three per cent. stock. The question, therefore, naturally comes up, why was it not applied to the redemption of these thirteen millions and a quarter, according to the authority contained in the act of Congress of that year? Certainly the bank needed the money; for it was just getting into operation, and was as hard run to escape bankruptcy about that time, as any bank that ever was saved from the brink of destruction. This is the largest injury which we have sustained, on account of accommodating the bank with the gratuitous use of these vast deposits. But, to show myself impartial, I will now state the smallest case of injury that has come within my knowledge: It is the case of the bonus of fifteen hundred thousand dollars which the bank was to pay to the United States, in three equal instalments, for the purchase of its charter. Nominally, this bonus has been paid, but out of what moneys? Certainly out of our own; for the statement shows our money was there, and further, shows that it is still there; for, on the 30th day of June last, which is the latest return, there was still $2,550,664 in the hands of the bank, which is above $750,000 more than the amount of the bonus.

Bank of the United States.

One word more upon the subject of these balances. It is now two years since I made an effort to repeal the 4th section of the Sinking Fund act of 1817; a section which was intended to limit the amount of surplus money which might be kept in the treasury, to two millions of dollars; but, by the power of construction, was made to authorize the keeping of two millions in addition to the surplus. I wished to repeal this section, which had thus been construed into the reverse of its intention, and to revive the first section of the Sinking Fund act of 1790, which directed the whole of the surplus on hand to be applied, at the end of each year, to the payment of the public debt. My argument was this: that there was no necessity to keep any surplus; that the revenue, coming in as fast as it went out, was like a perennial fountain, which you might drain to the last drop, and not exhaust; for the place of the last drop would be supplied the instant it was out. And I supported this reasoning by a reference to the annual treasury reports, which always exhibit a surplus of four or five millions; and which were equally in the treasury the whole year round, as on the last day of every year. This was the argument, which, in fact, availed nothing; but now I have mathematical proof of the truth of my position. Look at this statement of balances; look for the year 1819, and you will find but three hundred thousand dollars on hand for that year; look still lower for 1821, and you will find this balance but one hundred and eighty-two thousand dollars. And what was the consequence? Did the Government stop? Did the wheels of the state chariot cease to turn round in those years for want of treasury oil? Not at all. Every thing went on as well as before; the operations of the treasury were as perfect and regular in those two years of insignificant balances, as in 1817 and 1818, when five and ten millions were on hand. This is proof; this is demonstration: it is the indubitable evidence of the senses which concludes argument, and dispels uncertainty; and, as my proposal for the repeal of the 4th section of the Sinking Fund act of 1817 was enacted into a law at the last session of Congress, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, a vigilant and exemplary officer, I trust that the repeal will be acted upon, and that the bank platter will be wiped as clean of federal money in 1831, as it was in 1821. Such clean-taking from that dish, will allow two or three millions more to go to the reduction of the public debt; and there can be no danger in taking the last dollar, as reason and experience both prove. But, to quiet every apprehension on this point, to silence the last suggestion of a possibility of any temporary deficit, I recur to a provision contained in two different clauses in the bank charter, copied from an amendment in the charter of the Bank of England, and expressly made, at the instance of the ministry, to meet the contingency of a temporary deficiency in the annual revenue. The English provision is this: that the Government may borrow of the bank half a million sterling, at any time, without a special act of Parliament to authorize it. The provision in our charter is the same, with the single substitution of dollars for pounds. It is, in words and intention, a standing authority to borrow that limited sum, for the obvious purpose of preventing a constant keeping of a sum of money in hand as a reserve, to meet contingencies which hardly ever occur. This contingent authority to effect a small loan, has often been used in England—in the United States, never; possibly, because there has been no occasion for it; probably, because the clause was copied mechanically from the English charter, and without the perception of its practical bearing. Be this as it may, it is certainly a wise and prudent provision, such as all Governments should, at all times, be clothed with.

If any Senator thinks that I have exaggerated the injury suffered by the United States, on account of the uncompensated masses of public money in the hands of the bank, I am now going to convince him that he is wrong. I am going to prove to him that I have understated the case; that I have purposely kept back a large part of it; and that justice requires a further development. The fact is, that there are two different deposits of public money in the bank; one in the name of the Treasurer of the United States, the others in the name of disbursing officers. The annual average of the former has been about three and a half millions of dollars, and of this I have said not a word. But the essential character of both deposits is the same; they are both the property of the United States; both permanent; both available as so much capital to the bank; and both uncompensated. Here is the statement of the monthly amount of these secondary deposits, as I find them on the bank returns; and to it I appeal for the verification of what I allege:

January,	$1,543,618	$1,393,805	$853,691
February,	1,888,764	1,434,800	1,562,841
March,	2,185,930	2,250,113	1,544,969
April,	1,489,934	1,638,146	1,632,841
May,	1,428,025	1,637,519	1,323,661
June,	1,532,258	2,301,787	1,346,206
July,	1,264,758	1,678,274	1,129,990
August,	1,375,492	2,032,684	875,459
September,	1,585,401	2,593,606	1,346,206
October,	2,042,345	1,733,621	1,334,681
November,	1,558,873	1,643,717	1,194,682
December,	1,576,997	2,112,097	1,616,656

I have not ascertained the average of these deposits since 1817, but presume it may equal the amount of that bonus of one million five hundred thousand dollars for which we sold the charter, and which the Finance Committee of the Senate compliments the bank for paying in three, instead of seventeen, annual instalments; and shows how much interest they lost by doing so. Certainly, this was a disadvantage to the bank. It would have been better for it to have dribbled out to us one hundred thousand dollars, instead of five hundred thousand dollars of our own money, at a time. But there are three considerations which should prevent her from complaining: first, that it was the bargain to pay in three years; secondly, that we furnished the money; thirdly, that we kept up the amount in her hand. Finally, these monthly returns show that the overdrawings, for permitting which the bank has been so much lauded, were overdrawings in name, not in fact; the amount of the money being only transferred to another deposit, and the money itself remaining in the hands of the bank.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that there is something ominous to the bank in this contest for compensation on the undrawn balances. It is the very way in which the struggle began in the British Parliament which has ended in the overthrow of the Bank of England. It is the way in which the struggle is beginning here. My resolutions of two and three years ago are the causes of the speech which you now hear; and, as I have reason to believe, some others more worthy of your hearing, which will come at the proper time. The question of compensation for balances is now mixing itself up here, as in England, with the question of renewing the charter; and the two, acting together, will fall with combined weight upon the public mind, and certainly eventuate here as they did there.

4. To discredit and disparage the notes of all other banks, by excluding them from the collection of the federal revenue.—This results from the collection—no, not the collection, but the receipt of the revenue having been committed to the bank, and along with it the virtual execution of the joint resolution of 1816, to regulate the collection of the federal revenue. The execution of that resolution was intended to be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury—a disinterested arbiter between rival banks; but it may be considered as virtually devolved upon the Bank of the United States, and powerfully increases the capacity of that institution to destroy, or subjugate, all other banks. The notes of the State banks excluded from revenue payments, are discredited and disparaged, and fall into the hands of brokers at all places where they are not issued and payable. They cease to insulate at all the points to which the exclusion extends. I am informed that the notes of the banks south of the Potomac and Ohio, even those of the lower Mississippi, are generally refused at the United States' Branch Bank in St. Louis, and, in consequence, are expelled from circulation in Missouri and Illinois, and the neighboring districts. This exclusion of the Southern notes from the northwest quarter of the Union, is injurious to both parties, as our travellers and emigrants chiefly come from the South, and the whole of our trade goes there to find a cash market. The exclusion, as I am told, (for I have not looked into the matter myself,) is general, and extends to the banks in Virginia, the two Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. If this be the fact, the joint resolution of 1816 is violated: for, under the terms of that resolution, there are several banks in each of the States mentioned whose notes are receivable in the collection of federal revenue; that is to say, specie paying banks whose notes are payable, and paid, in specie, on demand. Yet, in consequence of exclusion from the United States' Branch Bank, they are excluded from all the land offices, eleven in number, which deposite in that branch; and, being excluded from the land offices, they cease to be current money among the people. If a traveller, or emigrant, brings these notes to the country, or receives them in remittance; if a trader accepts them in exchange for produce, they are "shaved" out of their hands, and sent out of the country. This is a pecuniary injury done to the Northwest; it may be more—it may be a political injury also; for it contributes to break the communication between the two quarters of the Union, and encourages the idea that nothing good can come from the South—not even money! This power to disparage the notes of all other banks, is a power to injure them; and, added to all the other privileges of the Bank of the United States, is a power to destroy them! If any one doubts this assertion, let him read the answers of the President of the bank to the questions put to him by the Chairman of the Finance Committee. These answers are appended to the committee's report of the last session in favor of the bank, and expressly declare the capacity of the federal bank to destroy the State banks. The worthy Chairman [Mr. SMITH, of Md.] puts this question: "Has the bank at any time oppressed any of the State banks?" The President, [Mr. BIDDLE,] answers, as the whole world would answer to a question of oppression, that it never had; and this response was as much as the interrogatory required. But it did not content the President of the bank; he chose to go further, and to do honor to the institution over which he presided, by showing that it was as just and generous as it was rich and powerful. He, therefore, adds the following words, for which, as a seeker after evidence, to show the alarming and dangerous character of the bank, I return him my unfeigned and pardonable thanks: "There are very few banks which might not have been destroyed by an exertion of the power of the bank."

This is enough! proof enough! not for me alone, but for all who are unwilling to see a moneyed domination set up—a moneyed oligarchy established in this land, and the entire Union subjected to its sovereign will. The power to destroy all other banks is admitted and declared; the inclination to do so is known to all rational beings to reside with the power! Policy may restrain the destroying faculties for the present; but they exist; and will come forth when interest prompts and policy permits. They have been exercised; and the general prostration of the Southern and Western banks attests the fact. They will be exercised, (the charter being renewed,) and the remaining State banks will be swept with the besom of destruction. Not that all will have their signs knocked down, and their doors closed up. Far worse than that to many of them. Subjugation, in preference to destruction, will be the fate of many. Every planet must have its satellites; every tyranny must have its instruments; every knight is followed by his squire; even the king of beasts, the royal quadruped, whose roar subdues the forest, must have a small, subservient animal to spring his prey. Just so of this imperial bank, when installed anew in its formidable and lasting power. The State banks, spared by the sword, will be passed under the yoke. They will become subordinate parts in the great machine. Their place, in the scale of subordination will be one degree below the rank of the legitimate branches; their business, to perform the work which it would be too disreputable for the legitimate branches to perform. This will be the fate of the State banks which are allowed to keep up their signs, and to set open their doors; and thus the entire moneyed power of the Union would fall into the hands of one single institution, whose inexorable and invisible mandates, emanating from a centre, would pervade the Union, giving or withholding money according to its own sovereign will and absolute pleasure. To a favored State, to an individual, or a class of individuals, favored by the central power, the golden stream of Pactolus would flow direct. To all such the munificent mandates of the High Directory would come, as the fabled god made his terrestrial visit of love and desire, enveloped in a shower of gold. But to others—to those not favored—and to those hated—the mandates of this same directory would be as “the planetary plague which hangs its poison in the sick air:” death to them! death to all who minister to their wants! What a state of things! What a condition for a confederacy of States! What grounds for alarm and terrible apprehension, when, in a confederacy of such vast extent, so many independent States, so many rival commercial cities, so much sectional jealousy, such violent political parties, such fierce contests for power, there should be but one moneyed tribunal before which all the rival and contending elements must appear! but one single dispenser of money, to which every citizen, every trader, every merchant, every manufacturer, every planter, every corporation, every city, every State, and the Federal Government itself, must apply, in every emergency, for the most indispensable loan! and this, in the face of the fact, that, in every contest for human rights, the great moneyed institutions of the world have uniformly been found on the side of kings and nobles, against the lives and liberties of the people.

5. To hold real estate, receive rents, and retain a body of tenantry.—This privilege is hostile to the nature of our republican Government, and inconsistent with the nature and design of a banking institution. Republics want freeholders, not landlords and tenants; and, except the corporators in this bank, and in the British East India Company, there is not an incorporated body of landlords in any country upon the face of the earth whose laws emanate from a legislative body. Banks are instituted to promote trade and industry, and to aid the Government and its citizens with loans of money. The whole argument in favor of banking—every argument in favor of this bank—rests upon that idea. No one, when this charter was granted, presumed to speak in favor of incorporating a society of landlords, especially foreign landlords, to buy lands, build houses, rent tenements, and retain tenantry. Loans of money was the object in view, and the purchase of real estate is incompatible with that object. Instead of remaining bankers, the corporators may turn land speculators: instead of having money to lend, they may turn you out tenants to vote. To an application for a loan, they may answer, and answer truly, that they have no money on hand; and the reason may be, that they have laid it out in land. This seems to be the case at present. A committee of the Legislature of Pennsylvania has just applied for a loan; the President of the bank, nothing loth to make a loan to that great State, for twenty years longer than the charter has to exist, expresses his regret that he cannot lend but a limited and inadequate sum. The funds of the institution, he says, will not permit it to advance more than eight millions of dollars. And why? because it has invested three millions in real estate! To this power to hold real estate, is superadded the means to acquire it. The bank is now the greatest moneyed power in the Union; in the event of the renewal of its charter, it will soon be the sole one. Sole dispenser of money, it will soon be the chief owner of property. To unlimited means of acquisition, would be united perpetuity of tenure; for a corporation never dies, and is free from the operation of the laws which govern the descent and distribution of real estate in the hands of individuals. The limitations in the charter are vain and illusory. They insult the understanding, and mock the credulity of foolish believers. The bank is first limited to such acquisitions of real estate as are necessary to its own accommodation; then comes a proviso to undo the limitation, so far as it concerns purchases upon its own mortgages and executions! This is the limitation upon the capacity of such an institution to acquire real estate. As if it had any thing to do but to make loans upon mortgages, and push executions upon judgments! Having all the money, it would be the sole lender; mortgages being the road to loans, all borrowers must travel that road. When birds enough are in the net, the fowler draws his string, and the heads are wrung off. So when mortgages enough are taken, the loans are called in; discounts cease; curtailments are made; failures to pay ensue; writs issue; judgments and executions follow; all the mortgaged premises are for sale at once; and the attorney of the bank appears at the elbow of the marshal, sole bidder, and sole purchaser.

What is the legal effect of this vast capacity to acquire, and this legal power to retain, real estate? Is it not the creation of a new species of mortmain? And of a kind more odious and dangerous than that mortmain of the church which it baffled the English Parliament so many ages to abolish. The mortmain of the church was a power in an ecclesiastical corporation to hold real estate, independent of the laws of distribution and descent: the mortmain of the bank is a power in a lay corporation to do the same thing. The evil of the two tenures is identical; the difference between the two corporations is no more than the difference between parsons and money changers; the capacity to do mischief incomparably the greatest on the part of the lay corporators. The church could only operate upon the few who were thinking of the other world; the bank, upon all who are immersed in the business or the pleasures of this. The means of the church were nothing but prayers; the means of the bank is money! The church received what it could beg from dying sinners; the bank may extort what it pleases from the whole living generation of the just and unjust. Such is the parallel between the mortmain of the two corporations. They both end in monopoly of estates, and perpetuity of succession; and the bank is the greatest monopolizer of the two. Monopolies and perpetual succession are the bane of republics. Our ancestors took care to provide against them, by abolishing entails and primogeniture. Even the glebes of the church, lean and few as they were in most of the States, fell under the republican principle of limited tenures. All the States abolished the anti-republican tenures; but Congress re-establishes them, and in a manner more dangerous and offensive than before the revolution. They are now given, not generally, but to few; not to natives only, but to foreigners also; for foreigners are large owners of this bank. And thus, the principles of the revolution sink before the privileges of an incorporated company. The laws of the States fall before the mandates of a central directory in Philadelphia. Foreigners become the landlords of free born Americans; and the young and flourishing towns of the United States are verging to the fate of the family boroughs which belong to the great aristocracy of England.

Let no one say the bank will not avail itself of its capacity to amass real estate. The fact is, it has already done so. I know towns, yea, cities, and could name them, if it might not seem invidious from this elevated theatre to make a public reference to their misfortunes, in which this bank already appears as a dominant and engrossing proprietor. I have been in places where the answers to inquiries for the owners of the most valuable tenements, would remind you of the answers given by the Egyptians to similar questions from the French officers, on their march to Cairo. You recollect, no doubt, sir, the dialogue to which I allude: "Who owns that palace?" "The Mameluke;" "Who this country house?" "The Mameluke;" "These gardens?" "The Mameluke;" "That field covered with rice?" "The Mameluke."—And thus have I been answered, in the towns and cities referred to, with the single exception of the name of the Bank of the United States substituted for that of the military scourge of Egypt. If this is done under the first charter, what may not be expected under the second? If this is done while the bank is on its best behavior, what may she not do when freed from all restraint and delivered up to the boundless cupidity and remorseless exactions of a moneyed corporation?

6. To deal in pawns, merchandise, and bills of exchange.—I hope the Senate will not require me to read dry passages from the charter to prove what I say. I know I speak a thing nearly incredible when I allege that this bank, in addition to all its other attributes, is an incorporated company of pawnbrokers! The allegation staggers belief, but a reference to the charter will dispel incredulity. The charter, in the first part, forbids a traffic in merchandise; in the after part, permits it. For truly this instrument seems to have been framed upon the principles of contraries; one principle making limitations, and the other following after with provisos to undo them. Thus is it with lands, as I have just shown; thus is it with merchandise, as I now show. The bank is forbidden to deal in merchandise—proviso, unless in the case of goods pledged for money lent, and not redeemed to the day; and, proviso, again, unless for goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. With the help of these two provisos, it is clear that the limitation is undone; it is clear that the bank is at liberty to act the pawnbroker and merchant, to any extent that it pleases. It may say to all the merchants who want loans, Pledge your stores, gentlemen! They must do it, or do worse; and, if any accident prevents redemption on the day, the pawn is forfeited, and the bank takes possession. On the other hand, it may lay out its rents for goods; it may sell its real estate, now worth three millions of dollars, for goods. Thus the bank is an incorporated company of pawnbrokers and merchants, as well as an incorporation of landlords and land-speculators; and this derogatory privilege, like the others, is copied from the old Bank of England charter of 1694. Bills of exchange are also subjected to the traffic of this bank. It is a traffic unconnected with the trade of banking, dangerous for a great bank to hold, and now operating most injuriously in the South and West. It is the process which drains these quarters of the Union of their gold and silver, and stifles the growth of a fair commerce in the products of the country. The merchants, to make remittances, buy bills of exchange from the branch banks, instead of buying produce from the farmers. The bills are paid for in gold and silver; and, eventually, the gold and silver are sent to the mother bank, or to the branches in the Eastern cities, either to meet these bills, or to replenish their coffers, and to furnish vast loans to favorite States or individuals. The bills sell cheap, say a fraction of one per cent.; they are, therefore, a good remittance to the merchant. To the bank the operation is doubly good; for even the half of one per cent. on bills of exchange is a great profit to the institution which monopolizes that business, while the collection and delivery to the branches of all the hard money in the country is a still more considerable advantage. Under this system, the best of the Western banks—I do not speak of those which had no foundations, and sunk under the weight of neighborhood opinion—but those which deserved favor and confidence, sunk ten years ago. Under this system, the entire West is now undergoing a silent, general, and invisible drain of its hard money; and, if not quickly arrested, these States will soon be, so far as the precious metals are concerned, no more than the empty skin of an immolated victim.

7. To establish branches in the different States without their consent, and in defiance of their resistance.—No one can deny the degrading and injurious tendency of this privilege. It derogates from the sovereignty of a State; tramples upon her laws; injures her revenue and commerce; lays open her Government to the attacks of centralism; impairs the property of her citizens; and fastens a vampire on her bosom to suck out her gold and silver. 1. It derogates from her sovereignty, because the central institution may impose its intrusive branches upon the State without her consent, and in defiance of her resistance. This has already been done. The State of Alabama, but four years ago, by a resolve of her Legislature, remonstrated against the intrusion of a branch upon her. She protested against the favor. Was the will of the State respected? On the contrary, was not a branch instantaneously forced upon her, as if, by the suddenness of the action, to make a striking and conspicuous display of the omnipotence of the bank, and the nullity of the State? 2. It tramples upon her laws; because, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, the bank and all its branches are wholly independent of State legislation; and it tramples on them again, because it authorizes foreigners to hold lands and tenements in every State, contrary to the laws of many of them; and because it admits of the mortmain tenure, which is condemned by all the republican States in the Union. 3. It injures her revenue, because the bank stock, under the decision of the Supreme Court, is not liable to taxation. And thus, foreigners, and non-resident Americans, who monopolize the money of the State, who hold its best lands and town lots, who meddle in its elections, and suck out its gold and silver, and perform no military duty, are exempted from paying taxes, in proportion to their wealth, for the support of the State whose laws they trample upon, and whose benefits they usurp. 4. It subjects the State to the dangerous manoeuvres and intrigues of centralism, by means of the tenants, debtors, bank officers, and bank money, which the central directory retain in the State, and may embody and direct against it in its elections, and in its legislative and judicial proceedings. 5. It tends to impair the property of the citizens, and, in some instances, that of the States, by destroying the State banks in which they have invested their money. 6. It is injurious to the commerce of the States, (I speak of the Western States,) by substituting a trade in bills of exchange, for a trade in the products of the country. 7. It fastens a vampire on the bosom of the State, to suck away its gold and silver, and to co-operate with the course of trade, of federal legislation, and of exchange, in draining the South and West of all their hard money. The Southern States, with their thirty millions of annual exports in cotton, rice, and tobacco, and the Western States, with their twelve millions of provisions and tobacco exported from New Orleans, and five millions consumed in the South, and on the lower Mississippi,—that is to say, with three-fifths of the marketable productions of the Union, are not able to sustain thirty specie paying banks; while the minority of the States north of the Potomac, without any of the great staples for export, have above four hundred of such banks. These States, without rice, without cotton, without tobacco, without sugar, and with less flour and provisions, to export, are saturated with gold and silver, while the Southern and Western States, with all the real sources of wealth, are in a state of the utmost destitution. For this calamitous reversal of the natural order of things, the Bank of the United States stands forth pre-eminently culpable. Yes, it is pre-eminently culpable! and a statement in the National Intelligencer of this morning, (a paper which would overstate no fact to the prejudice of the bank,) cites and proclaims the fact which proves this culpability. It dwells, and exults, on the quantity of gold and silver in the vaults of the United States' Bank. It declares that institution to be "overburdened" with gold and silver; and well may it be so overburdened, since it has lifted the load entirely from the South and West. It calls these metals "a drug" in the hands of the bank; that is to say, an article for which no purchaser can be found. Let this "drug," like the treasures of the dethroned Dey of Algiers, be released from the dominion of its keeper; let a part go back to the South and West, and the bank will no longer complain of repletion, nor they of depletion.

8. Exemption of the stockholders from individual liability on the failure of the bank. This privilege derogates from the common law, is contrary to the principle of partnerships, and injurious to the rights of the community. It is a peculiar privilege granted by law to these corporators, and exempting them from liability, except in their corporate capacity, and to the amount of the assets of the corporation. Unhappily, these assets are never assez, that is to say, enough, when occasion comes for recurring to them. When a bank fails, its assets are always less than its debts; so that responsibility fails the instant that liability accrues. Let no one say that the Bank of the United States is too great to fail. One greater than it, and its prototype, has failed, and that in our own day, and for twenty years at a time: the Bank of England failed in 1797, and the Bank of the United States was on the point of failing in 1819. The same cause, namely, stockjobbing and overtrading, carried both to the brink of destruction; the same means saved both, namely, the name, the credit, and the helping hand of the Governments which protected them. Yes, the Bank of the United States may fail; and its stockholders live in splendor upon the princely estates acquired with its notes, while the industrious classes, who hold these notes, will be unable to receive a shilling for them. This is unjust. It is a vice in the charter. The true principle in banking requires each stockholder to be liable to the amount of his shares; and subjects him to the summary action of every holder on the failure of the institution, till he has paid up the amount of his subscription. This is the true principle. It has prevailed in Scotland for the last century, and no such thing as a broken bank has been known there in all that time.

9. To have the United States for a partner. Sir, there is one consequence, one result of all partnerships between a Government and individuals, which should of itself, and in a mere mercantile point of view, condemn this association on the part of the Federal Government. It is the principle which puts the strong partner forward to bear the burthen whenever the concern is in danger. The weaker members flock to the strong partner at the approach of the storm, and the necessity of venturing more to save what he has already staked, leaves him no alternative. He becomes the Atlas of the firm, and bears all upon his own shoulders. This is the principle: what is the fact? Why, that the United States has already been compelled to sustain the federal bank; to prop it with her revenues and its credit in the trials and crisis of its early administration. I pass over other instances of the damage suffered by the United States on account of this partnership; the immense standing deposits for which we receive no compensation; the loan of five millions of our own money, for which we have paid a million and a half in interest; the five per cent. stock note, on which we have paid our partners four million seven hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars in interest; the loss of ten millions on the three per cent. stock, and the ridiculous catastrophe of the miserable bonus, which has been paid to us with a fraction of our own money: I pass over all this, and come to the point of a direct loss, as a partner, in the dividends upon the stock itself. Upon this naked point of profit and loss, to be decided by a rule in arithmetic, we have sustained a direct and heavy loss. The stock held by the United States, as every body knows, was subscribed, not paid. It was a stock note, deposited for seven millions of dollars, bearing an interest of five per cent. The inducement to this subscription was the seductive conception that, by paying five per cent. on its note, the United States would clear four or five per cent. in getting a dividend of eight or ten. This was the inducement; now for the realization of this fine conception. Let us see it. Here it is: an official return from the Register of the Treasury of interest paid, and of dividends received. The account stands thus:

Interest paid by the United States,	$4,725,000
Dividends received by the United States,	4,629,426

Loss to the United States,	95,574
----------------------------	--------

Disadvantageous as this partnership must be to the United States in a moneyed point of view, there is a far more grave and serious aspect under which to view it. It is the political aspect, resulting from the union between the bank and the Government. This union has been tried in England, and has been found there to be just as disastrous a conjunction as the union of church and State. It is the conjunction of the lender and the borrower, and holy writ has told us which of these categories will be master of the other. But suppose they agree to drop rivalry, and unite their resources. Suppose they combine, and make a push for political power: how great is the mischief which they may not accomplish! But, on this head, I wish to use the language of one of the brightest patriots of Great Britain; one who has shown himself, in these modern days, to be the worthy successor of those old iron barons whose patriotism commanded the unpurchaseable eulogium of the elder Pitt. I speak of Sir William Pulteney, and his speech against the Bank of England, in 1797.

THE SPEECH—Extract.—"I have said enough to show that Government has been rendered dependent on the bank, and more particularly so in the time of war; and though the bank has not yet fallen into the hands of ambitious men, yet it is evident that it might, in such hands, assume a power sufficient to control and overawe, not only the ministers, but king, lords, and commons. * * * * * As the bank has thus become dangerous to Government, it might, on the other hand, by uniting with an ambitious minister, become the means of establishing a fourth estate, sufficient to involve this nation in irretrievable slavery, and ought, therefore, to be dreaded as much as a certain East India bill was justly dreaded, at a period not very remote. I will not say that the present minister, (the younger Pitt,) by endeavoring, at this crisis, to take the Bank of England under his protection, can have any view to make use, hereafter, of that engine to perpetuate his own power, and to enable him to domineer over our constitution: if that could be supposed, it would only show that men can entertain a very different train of ideas, when endeavoring to overset a rival, from what occurs to them when intending to support and fix themselves. My object is to secure the country against all risk either from the bank as opposed to Government, or as the engine of ambitious men."

Bank of the United States.

And this is my object also. I wish to secure the Union from all chance of harm from this bank. I wish to provide against its friendship, as well as its enmity—against all danger from its hug, as well as from its blow. I wish to provide against all risk, and every hazard; for, if this risk and hazard were too great to be encountered by King, Lords, and Commons, in Great Britain, they must certainly be too great to be encountered by the people of the United States, who are but commons alone.

10. To have foreigners for partners.—This, Mr. President, will be a strange story to be told in the West. The downright and upright people of that unsophisticated region believe that words mean what they signify, and that “the Bank of the United States” is the Bank of the United States. How great then must be their astonishment to learn that this belief is a false conception, and that this bank (its whole name to the contrary notwithstanding,) is just as much the bank of foreigners as it is of the Federal Government. Here I would like to have the proof—a list of the names and nations, to establish this almost incredible fact. But I have no access except to public documents, and from one of these I learn as much as will answer the present pinch. It is the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the House of Representatives, for the last session of Congress. That report admits that foreigners own seven millions of the stock of this bank; and every body knows that the Federal Government owns seven millions also.

Thus it is proved that foreigners are as deeply interested in this bank as the United States itself. In the event of a renewal of the charter they will be much more deeply interested than at present; for a prospect of a rise in the stock to two hundred and fifty, and the unsettled state of things in Europe, will induce them to make great investments. It is to no purpose to say that the foreign stockholders cannot be voters or directors. The answer to that suggestion is this: the foreigners have the money; they pay down the cash, and want no accommodations; they are lenders, not borrowers; and in a great moneyed institution such stockholders must have the greatest influence. The name of this bank is a deception upon the public. It is not the bank of the Federal Government, as its name would import, nor of the States which compose this Union; but chiefly of private individuals, foreigners as well as natives, denizens, and naturalized subjects. They own twenty-eight millions of the stock, the Federal Government but seven millions, and these seven are precisely balanced by the stock of the aliens. The Federal Government and the aliens are equal, owning one-fifth each; and there would be as much truth in calling it the English Bank as the Bank of the United States. Now mark a few of the privileges which this charter gives to these foreigners. To be landholders, in defiance of the State laws, which forbid aliens to hold land; to be landlords by incorporation, and to hold American citizens for tenants; to hold lands in mortmain; to be pawnbrokers and merchants by incorporation; to pay the revenue of the United States in their own notes; in short, to do every thing which I have endeavored to point out in the long and hideous list of exclusive privileges granted to this bank. If I have shown it to be dangerous for the United States to be in partnership with its own citizens, how much stronger is not the argument against a partnership with foreigners? What a prospect for loans when at war with a foreign Power, and the subjects of that Power large owners of the bank here, from which alone, or from banks liable to be destroyed by it, we can obtain money to carry on the war! What a state of things, if, in the division of political parties, one of these parties and the foreigners, coalescing, should have the exclusive control of all the money in the Union, and, in addition to the money, should have bodies of debtors, tenants, and bank officers stationed in all the States, with a supreme and irresponsible system of centralism to direct the whole! Dangers from such contingencies are too great and obvious to be insisted upon. They strike the common sense of all mankind, and were powerful considerations for the old whig republicans for the non-renewal of the charter of 1791. Mr. Jefferson and the whig republicans staked their political existence on the non-renewal of that charter. They succeeded; and, by succeeding, prevented the country from being laid at the mercy of British and ultra-federalists for funds to carry on the last war. It is said the United States lost forty millions by using depreciated currency during the last war. That, probably, is a mistake of one-half. But be it so! For what are forty millions compared to the loss of the war itself—compared to the ruin and infamy of having the Government arrested for want of money—stopped and paralyzed by the reception of such a note as the younger Pitt received from the Bank of England in 1795?

11. Exemption from due course of law for violations of its charter.—This is a privilege which affects the administration of justice, and stands without example in the annals of republican legislation. In the case of all other delinquents, whether persons or corporations, the laws take their course against those who offend them. It is the right of every citizen to set the laws in motion against every offender; and it is the constitution of the law, when set in motion, to work through, like a machine, regardless of powers and principalities, and cutting down the guilty which may stand in its way. Not so in the case of this bank. In its behalf, there are barriers erected between the citizen and his oppressor, between the wrong and the remedy, between the law and the offender. Instead of a right to sue out a scire facias or a quo warranto, the injured citizen, with an humble petition in his hand, must repair to the President of the United States, or to Congress, and crave their leave to do so. If leave is denied, (and denied it will be whenever the bank has a peculiar friend in the President, or a majority of such friends in Congress, the convenient pretext being always at hand that the general welfare requires the bank to be sustained,) he can proceed no further. The machinery of the law cannot be set in motion, and the great offender laughs from behind his barrier at the impotent resentment of its helpless victim. Thus the bank, for the plainest violations of its charter, and the greatest oppressions of the citizen, may escape the pursuit of justice. Thus the administration of justice is subject to be strangled in its birth for the shelter and protection of this bank. But this is not all. Another and most alarming mischief results from the same extraordinary privilege. It gives the bank a direct interest in the Presidential and Congressional elections: it gives it need for friends in Congress and in the Presidential chair. Its fate, its very existence, may often depend upon the friendship of the President and Congress; and, in such cases, it is not in human nature to avoid using the immense means in the hands of the bank to influence the elections of these officers. Take the existing fact—the case to which I alluded at the commencement of this speech. There is a case made out, ripe with judicial evidence, and big with the fate of the bank. It is a case of usury at the rate of forty-six per cent., in violation of the charter, which only admits an interest of six. The facts were admitted, in the court below, by the bank's demurrer; the law was decided, in the court above, by the supreme judges. The admission concludes the facts; the decision concludes the law. The forfeiture of the charter is established; the forfeiture is incurred; the application of the forfeiture alone is wanting to put an end to the institution. An impartial President or Congress might let the laws take their course; those of a different temper might interpose their veto. What a crisis for the bank! It beholds the sword of Damocles suspended over its head! What an interest in keeping those away who might suffer the hair to be cut!

12. To have all these unjust privileges secured to the corporators as a monopoly, by a pledge of the public faith to charter no other bank.—This is the most hideous feature in the whole mass of deformity. If these banks are beneficial institutions, why not several? one, at least, and each independent of the other, to each great section of the Union? If malignant, why create one? The restriction constitutes the monopoly, and renders more invidious what was sufficiently hateful in itself. It is, indeed, a double monopoly, legislative as well as banking; for the Congress of 1816 monopolized the power to grant these monopolies. It has tied up the hands of its successors; and if this can be done on one subject, and for twenty years, why not upon all subjects, and for all time? Here is the form of words which operate this double engrossment of our rights: “No other bank shall be established by any future law of Congress during the continuance of the corporation hereby enacted, for which the faith of Congress is hereby pledged;” with a proviso for the District of Columbia. And that no incident might be wanting to complete the title of this charter, to the utter reprobation of whig republicans, this compound monopoly, and the very form of words in which it is conceived, is copied from the charter of the Bank of England!—not the charter of William and Mary, as granted in 1694, (for the Bill of Rights was then fresh in the memories of Englishmen,) but the charter as amended, and that for money, in the memorable reign of Queen Anne, when a tory Queen, a tory Ministry, and a tory Parliament, and the apostle of toryism, in the person of Dr. Sacheverell, with his sermons of divine right, passive obedience, and non-resistance, were riding and ruling over the prostrate liberties of England! This is the precious period, and these the noble authors, from which the idea was borrowed, and the very form of words copied, which now figure in the charter of the Bank of the United States, constituting that double monopoly, which restricts at once the powers of Congress and the rights of the citizens.

These, Mr. President, are the chief of the exclusive privileges which constitute the monopoly of the Bank of the United States. I have spoken of them, not as they deserved, but as my abilities have permitted. I have shown you that they are not only evil in themselves, but copied from an evil example. I now wish to show you that the Government from which we have made this copy has condemned the original; and, after showing this fact, I think I shall be able to appeal, with sensible effect, to all liberal minds, to follow the enlightened example of Great Britain in getting rid of a dangerous and invidious institution, after having followed her pernicious example in assuming it. For this purpose, I will have recourse to proof, and will read from British state papers of 1826. I will read extracts from the correspondence between Earl Liverpool, first Lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Robinson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on one side, and the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England on the other; the subject being the renewal, or rather non-renewal, of the charter of the Bank of England.

Communications from the First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England.—Extracts.

“The failures which have occurred in England, unaccompanied as they have been by the same occurrences in Scotland, tend to prove that there must have been an unsound and delusive system of banking in one part of Great Britain, and a solid and substantial one in the other. * * * In Scotland, there are not more than thirty banks, (three chartered,) and these banks have stood firm amidst all the convulsions in the money market in England, and amidst all the distresses to which the manufacturing and agricultural interests in Scotland, as well as in England, have occasionally been subject. Banks of this description must necessarily be conducted upon the generally understood and approved principles of banking. * * * The Bank of England may, perhaps, propose, as they did upon a former occasion, the extension of the term of their exclusive privilege, as to the metropolis and its neighborhood, beyond the year 1833, as the price of this concession, [immediate surrender of exclusive privileges.] It would be very much to be regretted that they should require any such condition. * * * It is obvious, from what passed before, that Parliament will never agree to it. * * * Such privileges are out of fashion; and what expectation can the bank, under present circumstances, entertain that theirs will be renewed?”—Jan. 13.

Answer of the Court of Directors.—Extract.

“Under the uncertainty in which the Court of Directors find themselves with respect to the death of the bank, and the effect which they may have on the interests of the bank, this court cannot feel themselves justified in recommending to the proprietors to give up the privilege which they now enjoy, sanctioned and confirmed as it is by the solemn acts of the Legislature.”—Jan. 20.

Second communication from the Ministers.—Extract.

“The First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer have considered the answer of the bank of the 20th instant. They cannot but regret that the Court of Directors should have declined to recommend to the Court of Proprietors the consideration of the paper delivered by the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Governor and Deputy Governor on the 13th instant. The statement contained in that paper appears to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer so full and explicit on all the points to which it related, that they have nothing further to add, although they would have been, and still are, ready to answer, as far as possible, any specific questions which might be put, for the purpose of removing the uncertainty in which the Court of Directors state themselves to be with respect to the details of the plan suggested in that paper.”—Jan. 23.

Second answer of the Bank.—Extract.

“The Committee of Treasury [bank] having taken into consideration the paper received from the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, dated January 23d, and finding that His Majesty’s ministers persevere in their desire to propose to restrict immediately the exclusive privilege of the bank, as to the number of partners engaged in banking to a certain distance from the metropolis, and also continue to be of opinion that Parliament would not consent to renew the privilege at the expiration of the period of their present charter; finding, also, that the proposal by the bank of establishing branch banks is deemed by His Majesty’s ministers inadequate to the wants of the country, are of opinion that it would be desirable for this corporation to propose, as a basis, the act of 6th of George the Fourth, which states the conditions on which the Bank of Ireland relinquished its exclusive privileges; this corporation waiving the question of a prolongation of time, although the committee [of the bank] cannot agree in the opinion of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they are not making a considerable sacrifice, advertising especially to the Bank of Ireland remaining in possession of that privilege five years longer than the Bank of England.”—Jan. 25.

Here, Mr. President, is the end of all the exclusive privileges and odious monopoly of the Bank of England. That ancient and powerful institution, so long the haughty tyrant of the moneyed world—so long the subsidizer of Kings and ministers—so long the fruitful mother of national debt and useless wars—so long the prolific manufactory of nabobs and paupers—so long the dread dictator of its own terms to Parliament—now droops the conquered wing, lowers its proud crest, and quails under the blows of its late despised assailants. It first puts on a courageous air, and takes a stand upon privileges sanctioned by time, and confirmed by solemn acts. Seeing that the ministers could have no more to say to men who would talk of privileges in the nineteenth century, and being reminded that Parliament was inexorable, the bully suddenly degenerates into the craven, and, from showing fight, calls for quarter. The directors condescend to beg for the smallest remnant of their former power, for five years only; for the city of London even; and offer to send branches into all quarters. Denied at every point, the subdued tyrant acquiesces in his fate, announces his submission to the spirit and intelligence of the age; and quietly sinks down into the humble, but safe and useful, condition of a Scottish provincial bank.

And here it is profitable to pause; to look back, and see by what means this ancient and powerful institution—this Babylon of the banking world—was so suddenly and so totally prostrated. Who did it? And with what weapons? Sir, it was done by that power which is now regulating the affairs of the civilized world. It was done by the power of public opinion, invoked by the working members of the British Parliament. It was done by Sir Henry Parnell, who led the attack upon the Wellington ministry on the night of the 15th of November; by Sir William Pulteney, Mr. Grenfell, Mr. Hume, Mr. Edward Ellice, and others, the working members of the House of Commons, such as had, a few years before, overthrown the gigantic oppressions of the salt tax. These are the men who have overthrown the Bank of England. They began the attack in 1824, under the discouraging cry of too soon, too soon—for the charter had then nine years to run! and ended with showing that they had begun just soon enough. They began with the ministers in their front, on the side of the bank, and ended with having them on their own side, and making them co-operators in the attack, and the instruments and inflictors of the fatal and final blow. But let us do justice to these ministers. Though wrong in the beginning, they were right in the end; though monarchists, they behaved like republicans. They were not Polignacs. They yielded to the intelligence of the age; they yielded to the spirit which proscribes monopolies and privileges, and in their correspondence with the bank directors, spoke truth and reason, and asserted liberal principles, with a point and power which quickly put an end to dangerous and obsolete pretensions. They told the bank the mortifying truths, that its system was unsolid and delusive—that its privileges and monopoly were out of fashion—that they could not be prolonged for five years even—nor suffered to exist in London alone; and, what was still more cutting, that the banks of Scotland, which had no monopoly, no privilege, no connexion with the Government, which paid interest on deposits, and whose stockholders were responsible to the amount of their shares—were the solid and substantial banks, which alone the public interest could hereafter recognise. They did their business, when they undertook it, like true men; and, in the single phrase, out of fashion, achieved the most powerful combination of solid argument, and contemptuous sarcasm, that ever was compressed into two words. It is a phrase of electrical power over the senses and passions. It throws back the mind to the reigns of the Tudors and Stuarts—the termagant Elizabeth and the pedagogue James—and rouses within us all the shame and rage we have been accustomed to feel at the view of the scandalous sales of privileges and monopolies which were the disgrace and oppression of these wretched times. Out of fashion! Yes; even in England, the land of their early birth, and late protection. And shall they remain in fashion here? Shall republicanism continue to wear, in America, the antique costume which the doughty champions of antiquated fashion have been compelled to doff in England? Shall English lords and ladies continue to find, in the Bank of the United States, the unjust and odious privileges which they can no longer find in the Bank of England? Shall the copy survive here after the original has been destroyed there? Shall the young whelp triumph in America, after the old lion has been throttled and strangled in England? No! never! The thing is impossible! The Bank of the United States dies, as the Bank of England dies, in all its odious points, upon the limitation of its charter; and the only circumstance of regret is, that the generous deliverance is to take effect two years earlier in the British monarchy than in the American republic.

One word, Mr. President, upon an incidental topic. It is shown that the stock of the Bank of the United States has fallen five per cent. in consequence of the opinions disclosed in the President's messages; and, thereupon, a complaint is preferred against the President for depreciating the property of innocent and unoffending people. I made a remark upon this complaint in the beginning of my speech, and now have a word more to bestow upon it. I wish to contrast this conduct of the American stockholders with that of the Bank of England stockholders, in a similar, and to them, much more disastrous, case. The Bank of England stockholders also, have had a decline in the price of stock; not of five dollars, but of thirty-five pounds, in the share. Bank of England stock, in consequence of Earl Liverpool's communication, and of the debates in Parliament, has fallen from 238 to 203; equal to a loss of $165 in every share. This is something more than $5. Yet I have never heard that Earl Liverpool, or any member of Parliament, has been called to account for producing this depreciation. It would seem that the liberty of speech, and the rights of discussion, in Great Britain, extended to the affairs of the Bank of England; and that ministers and legislators were safe in handling it like any other subject.

Fourthly, I object, Mr. President, to the renewal of the bank charter, because this bank is an institution too costly and expensive for the American people to keep up.

Let no one cavil at this head of objection, under the belief that the Bank of the United States supports itself, like the hibernal bear, by sucking its own paws; or that it derives its revenues, as a spider spins its web, from the recesses of its own abdomen. Such a belief would be essentially erroneous, and highly unbecoming the intelligence of the nineteenth century. The fact is, that the bank lives upon the people! that all its expenses are made out of the people; all its profits derived from, and all its losses re-imbursed by, them. This is the naked truth; by consequence every shilling held, or issued, by the bank, over and above the capital stock, is a tax upon the people; and, as such, I shall look into the amount of the levy, and prove it to be too great for the people to bear any longer.

In the first place, we have the direct expenses of the bank, the actual cost of its annual administration. These expenses are returned at $372,000 for the year 1830; and, assuming that sum for an average, the total cost of the administration for twenty years will be about seven and a half millions of dollars. The enormity of this sum must strike every mind; but, to judge it accurately, let us compare it to the expenses of some known establishment. Let us take the civil list of the Federal Government in the first term of President Washington's administration. Resorting to this standard, I find the expenditure of this branch of the Government to be: for 1792, $381,000; for '93, $358,000; for '94, $441,000; for '95, $361,000; presenting an annual average of $385,000; which is but a trifle over the bank expenditure for 1830. Now, what were the heads of expenditure included in the civil list at the period referred to? They were the salaries of the President and Vice President; the salaries of all the Secretaries, their clerks and messengers, and the purchase of the paraphernalia of all their offices; compensation to both Houses of Congress, and the discharge of every attendant expense; salaries to all the federal judges, their marshals and district attorneys, and the cost of their court rooms; the expense of missions abroad, and of territorial governments at home. These were the items of the civil list; comprehending the whole expenditure of the administration for all objects, except the army; there being at that time no navy. The administration of the bank, therefore, actually involves an expenditure, rivalling that of the Federal Government in 1792, '93, '94 and '95; omitting the single item of the army, which was then on a war establishment. The next item of bank tax, is that of the profits, in the shape of annual dividends. These profits are now seven per cent; but have been less; and at one time, owing to an explosion produced by stock jobbing, were nothing. Assuming six per cent. for the average of twenty years, and the aggregate will be $42,000,000. In the third place, the contingent fund, reserved to cover losses, is near 5,000,000 dollars. Fourthly, the real estate, including banking houses, is above 4,000,000 dollars. Fifthly, bonus, reimbursed to the bank, is 1,500,000 dollars. Sixthly, the interest on the public deposits, which the bank was receiving from the United States or individuals, while the United States were paying interest on the same amount to the bank or to others, was six millions of dollars on the standing deposit of about five millions. The aggregate is sixty-six millions of dollars; to say nothing of the profit on the stock itself, which is now twenty-six per cent., equal to $9,000,000 addition to the original capital. The annual average of this aggregate levy of sixty six millions, is above three millions and a quarter of dollars; being very nearly as much as the whole expenditure of the Federal Government in the second year of Mr. Jefferson's administration, which was but 3,737,000 dollars, the army included, and the navy also, which had then sprung into existence. Will Senators reflect upon the largeness of this levy, and consider how much it adds to the multiplied burdens of our complicated system of taxation? I say complicated: for, under our duplicate form of government, every citizen is many times taxed, and by various authorities. First, his State tax, then his county tax, then his corporation tax, (if he live in a city,) then his federal tax, and, since 1816, his bank tax. The amount of each is considerable, of the whole, is excessive; of the bank tax, in addition to the others, intolerable. The direct tax of 1798, which contributed so much to the overthrow of the men then at the head of affairs, was an inconsiderable burden compared to this bank levy. Not so much as one million was ever paid in any one year under the direct tax; while the annual levy of the bank tax is three millions and a quarter. The one is as truly a tax as the other, and as certainly paid by the people; and, as the reduction of taxes is now the policy of the country, I present this contribution to the federal bank, as the fit and eminent item to head and grace the list of abolition. I say, to head and grace the list! For it is a tax not only great in itself, and levied to support a most dangerous and invidious institution, but doubly and peculiarly oppressive upon the people, because no part of it is ever refunded to them in the shape of beneficent expenditure. In the case of every other tax, in all the contributions levied for the purposes of Government, there is some alleviation of the burden—some restitution of the abducted treasure—some return to the people—some re-infusion of strength into their ranks—in the customary reimbursement of the revenue. The Government usually pays it back, or a portion of it, for salaries, services, and supplies. But, in the case of the bank tax, there is nothing of this reimbursement. The bank refunds nothing; but all the money it makes out of the people is gone from them forever. It goes into a corner of the Union, and remains there: it goes into private hands, and becomes individual property. The stockholders divide it among themselves. Twice, in every year, they make the division of these modern spolia opima—these dearest spoils—not of the enemy's general killed in battle, but of American citizens fleeced at home. This is a grievous aggravation of the amount of the tax. It is the aggravation which renders taxation insupportable. It is "absenteeism" in a new and legalized form. It is the whole mischief of that system of absenteeism, which drains off the wealth of Ireland to fertilize England, France, and Italy, leaving Ireland itself the most distressed and exhausted country in Europe, instead of remaining, as God created it, one of the richest and most flourishing. Eternal drawing out, and no bringing back, is a process which no people, or country, can endure. It is a process which would exhaust the resources of nature herself. The earth would be deprived of its moisture, and changed into a desert, if the exhalations of the day did not return in dews at night. The vast ocean itself, with all its deep and boundless waters, would be sucked up and dried away, if the vapors drawn up by the sun did not form into clouds, and descend in rain and snow. So will any people be exhausted of their wealth, no matter how great that wealth may be, whose miserable destiny shall subject them to a system of taxation which is forever levying, and never refunding: a system whose cry is that of the horse-leech, more! more! more!—whose voice is that of the grave, give! give! give!—whose attribute is that of the grave also, never to render back!—and, such precisely is the system of taxation to which the people of these States are now subjected by the federal bank.

Of the three great divisions, Mr. President, into which this question divides itself, I have touched but one. I have left untouched the constitutional difficulty, and the former mismanagement of the bank. I have handled the question as if the constitutional authority for the bank was express, and as if its whole administration had been free from reproach. I have looked to the nature of the institution alone; and, finding in its very nature insurmountable objections to its existence, I have come to the conclusion that the public good requires the institution to cease. I believe it to be an institution of too much power; of tendencies too dangerous; of privileges too odious; of expense too enormous, to be safely tolerated under any Government of free and equal laws. My mind is made up that the present charter ought to be allowed to expire on its own limitation; and, that no other, or subsequent one, should ever after be granted. This is my opinion; I may add, my belief; for I have the consolation to believe that the event will not deceive my hopes.

I am willing to see the charter expire, without providing any substitute for the present bank. I am willing to see the currency of the Federal Government left to the hard money mentioned and intended in the constitution; I am willing to have a hard money Government, as that of France has been since the time of assignats and mandats. Every species of paper might be left to the State authorities, unrecognized by the Federal Government, and only touched by it for its own convenience when equivalent to gold and silver. Such a currency filled France with the precious metals, when England, with her overgrown bank, was a prey to all the evils of unconvertible paper. It furnished money enough for the imperial Government when the population of the empire was three times more numerous, and the expenses of Government twelve times greater, than the population and expenses of the United States; and, when France possessed no mines of gold or silver, and was destitute of the exports which command the specie of other countries. The United States possess gold mines, now yielding half a million per annum, with every prospect of equalling those of Peru. But this is not the best dependence. We have what is superior to mines, namely, the exports which command the money of the world; that is to say, the food which sustains life, and the raw materials which sustain manufactures. Gold and silver is the best currency for a republic; it suits the men of middle property and the working people best; and if I was going to establish a working man's party, it should be on the basis of hard money; a hard money party against a paper party.

I would prefer to see the charter expire without any substitute; but I am willing to vote for the substitute recommended by the President, stripped as it is of all power to make loans and discounts. Divested of that power, it loses the essential feature, and had as well lose the name, of a bank. It becomes an office in the treasury, limited to the issue of a species of exchequer bills, differing from the English bills of that name in the vital particular of a prompt and universal convertibility into coin. Such bills would be in fact, as well as in name, the promissory notes of the United States of America. They would be payable at every land office, custom-house, and post office, and by every collector of public moneys, in the Union. Payable every where, they would be at par every where. Equal to gold and silver on the spot, they would be superior to it for travelling and remittances. This is not opinion, but history. Our own country, this Federal Government, has proved it; and that on a scale sufficiently large to test its operation, and recent enough to be remembered by every citizen. I allude to the Mississippi scrip, issued from the Treasury some fifteen years ago. This scrip was no way equal to the proposed exchequer bills: for its reception was limited to a single branch of the revenue, namely, lands, and to a small part of them; and the quantity of scrip, five millions of dollars, was excessive, compared to the fund for its redemption; yet, as soon as the land offices of Alabama and Mississippi opened, the scrip was at par, and currently exchanged for gold and silver, dollar for dollar. Such, and better, would be the proposed bills. To the amount of the revenues, they would be founded on silver. This amount, after the payment of the public debt, (post office included,) may be about fifteen millions of dollars. They would supply the place of the United States' notes as they retired; and, issuing from the Treasury only in payments, or exchange for hard money, all room for favoritism, or undue influence, would be completely cut off. If the Federal Government is to recognise any paper, let it be this. Let it be its own.

I have said that the charter of the Bank of the United States cannot be renewed. And in saying this, I wish to be considered, not as a heedless denunciator, supplying the place of argument by empty menace, but as a Senator, considering well what he says, after having attentively surveyed his subject. I repeat, then, that the charter cannot be renewed! And, in coming to the conclusion of this peremptory opinion, I acknowledge no necessity to look beyond the walls of this Capitol—bright as may be the consolation which rises on the vision from the other end of the avenue!—I confine my view to the halls of Congress, and joyfully exclaim, it is no longer the year 1816! Fifteen years have gone by; times have changed; and former arguments have lost their application. We were then fresh from war, loaded with debt, and with all the embarrassments which follow in the train of war. We are now settled down in peace and tranquillity, with all the blessings attendant upon quiet and repose. There is no longer a single consideration urged in favor of chartering the bank in 1816, which can have the least weight or application, in favor of rechartering it now. This is my assertion! a bold one it may be; but no less true than bold. Let us see! What were the arguments of 1816? Why, first, "to pay the public creditors." I answer this is no longer any thing: for before 1836, that function will cease: there will be no more creditors to pay. 2. "To transfer the public moneys." That will be nothing: for after the payment of the public debt, we shall have no moneys to transfer. The twelve millions of dollars, which are now transferred annually to the Northeast, to pay the public creditors, will then remain in the pockets of the people, and the reduced expenditures of the Government will be made where the money is collected. The army and the navy, after the extinction of the debt, will be the chief objects of expenditure; and they will require the money, either on the frontiers, convenient to the land office, or on the seaboard, convenient to the custom-houses. Thus will transfers of revenue become unnecessary. 3. "To make loans to the Federal Government." That is nothing: for the Federal Government will want no loans in time of peace, not even out of its own deposits; and the prospect of war is rather too distant at present to make new loans on that account. 4. "To pay the pensioners." That is something now, I admit, when the pensioners are still fifteen thousand, and the payments exceed a million per annum. But what will it be after 1836? When the hand of death, and the scythe of time, shall have committed five years more of ravages in their senile ranks. The mass of these herocidal monuments are the men of the Revolution. They are far advanced upon that allegorical bridge so beautifully described in the vision of Mirza. They have passed the seventy arches which are sound and entire, and are now treading upon the broken ones, where the bridge is full of holes, and the clouds and darkness setting in. At every step some one stumbles and falls through, and is lost in the ocean beneath. In a few steps more the last will be gone. Surely it cannot be necessary to keep up for twenty years, the vast establishment of the federal bank to pay the brief stipends of these fleeting shadows. Their country can do it—can pay the pensions as well as give them—and do it for the little time that remains, with no other regret than that the grateful task is to cease so soon. 5. "To regulate the currency." I answer, the joint resolution of 1816 will do that, and will effect the regulation without destroying on one hand, and without raising up a new power, above regulation, on the other. Besides, there is some mistake in this phrase currency. The word in the constitution is coin. It is the value of coin which Congress is to regulate; and to include bank notes under that term, is to assume a power, not of construction—for no construction can be wild and boundless enough to construe coin, that is to say, metallic money, melted, cast, and stamped, into paper notes printed and written—but it is to assume a power of life and death over the constitution; a power to dethrone and murder one of its true and lawful words, and to set up a bastard pretender in its place. I invoke the spirit of America upon the daring attempt! 6. "To equalize exchanges, and sell bills of exchange for the half of one per cent." This is a broker's argument, very fit and proper to determine a question of brokerage; but very insufficient to determine a question of great national policy, of State rights, of constitutional difficulty, of grievous taxation, and of public and private subjugation to the beck and nod of a great moneyed oligarchy. 7. "A bonus of a million and a half of dollars." This, Mr. President, is Esau's view of the subject; a very seductive view to an improvident young man, who is willing to give up the remainder of his life to chains and poverty, provided he can be so-laced for the present with a momentary and insignificant gratification. But what is it to the United States!—to the United States of 1836! without a shilling of debt, and mainly occupied with the reduction of taxes! Still this bonus is the only consideration that can now be offered, and surely it is the last one that ought to be accepted. We do not want the money; and, if we did, the recourse to a bonus would be the most execrable form in which we could raise it. What is a bonus? Why, in monarchies, it is a price paid to the King for the privilege of extorting money out of his subjects; with us, it is a price paid to ourselves for the privilege of extorting money out of ourselves. The more of it the worse; for it all has to be paid back to the extortioners, with a great interest upon it. It is related by the English historian, Clarendon, who cannot be suspected of overstating any fact to the prejudice of the Stuart Kings, that for £1,500 advanced to Charles the First in bonuses, not less than £200,000 were extorted from his subjects: being at the rate of £133 taken from the subject for £1 advanced to the King. What the Bank of the United States will have made out of the people of the United States, in twenty years, in return for its bonus of $1,500,000, (which, I must repeat, has been advanced to us out of our own money,) has been shown to be about sixty-six millions of dollars. What it would make in the next twenty years, when secure possession of the renewed charter should free the institution from every restraint, and leave it at full liberty to pursue the money, goods, and lands of the people in every direction, cannot be ascertained. Enough can be ascertained, however, to show that it must be infinitely beyond what it has been. There are some data upon which some partial and imperfect calculations can be made, and let us essay them. In the first place, the rise of the stock, which cannot be less than that of the Bank of England, in its flourishing days, (probably more, as all Europe is now seeking investments here,) may reach 250 per cent., or 150 above par. This, upon a capital of 35 millions, would give a profit of $42,500,000; a very pretty sum to be cleared by operation of law!—to be added to the fortunes of some individuals, aliens as well as citizens, by the mere passage of an act of Congress! In the next place, the regular dividends, assuming them to equal those of the Bank of England in its meridian, would be ten per cent. per annum. This would give $3,500,000 for the annual dividend; and $70,000,000 for the aggregate of twenty years. In the third place, the direct expenses of the institution, now less than $400,000 per annum, would, under the new and magnificent expansion which the operations of the bank would take, probably exceed half a million per annum; say $10,000,000 for the whole term. Putting these three items together, which is as far as data in hand will enable us to calculate, and we have $122,500,000 of profits made out of the people, equal to a tax of $6,000,000 per annum. How much more may follow is wholly unascertainable, and would depend upon the moderation, the justice, the clemency, the mercy and forbearance of the supreme central directory, who, sitting on their tripods, and shaking their tridents over the moneyed ocean, are able to raise, and repress, the golden waves at pleasure; who, being chief purchasers of real estate, may take in towns and cities, and the whole country round, at one fell swoop; who, being sole lenders of money, may take usury, not only at 46, but at 460 per cent.; who, being masters of all other banks, and of the Federal Government itself, may compel these tributary establishments to ransom their servile existences with the heavy, and repeated, exactions of Algerine cupidity. The gains of such an institution defy calculation. There is no example on earth to which to compare it. The bank of England, in its proudest days, would afford but an inadequate and imperfect exemplar; for the power of that bank was counterpoised, and its exactions limited, by the wealth of the landed aristocracy, and the princely revenues of great merchants and private bankers. But with us, there would be no counterpoise, no limit, no boundary, to the extent of exactions. All would depend upon the will of the supreme central directory. The nearest approach to the value of this terrific stock, which my reading has suggested, would be found in the history of the famous South Sea Company of the last century, whose shares rose in leaps from 100 to 500, and from 500 to 1,000 per cent.; but, with this immeasurable and lamentable difference that that was a bubble! this, a reality! And who would be the owners of this imperial stock? Widows and orphans, think you? as ostentatiously set forth in the report of last session? No, sir! a few great capitalists; aliens, denizens, naturalized subjects, and some native citizens, already the richest of the land, and who would avail themselves of their intelligences, and their means, to buy out the small stockholders on the eve of the renewal. These would be the owners. And where would all this power and money centre? In the great cities to the northeast, which have been for forty years, and that by force of federal legislation, the lion's den of Southern and Western money—that den into which all the tracks point inwards; from which the returning track of a solitary dollar has never yet been seen. And, this is the institution for which a renewed existence is sought—for which the votes of the people's representatives are claimed! But, no! Impossible! It cannot be! The bank is done. The arguments of 1816 will no longer apply. Times have changed; and the policy of the Republic changes with the times. The war made the bank; peace will unmake it. The baleful planet of fire, and blood, and every human woe, did bring that pestilence upon us; the benignant star of peace shall chase it away. Having concluded—

Mr. WEBSTER demanded the yeas and nays on the question to grant leave for the introduction of the resolution; and the vote being taken, was decided, without further debate, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Sanford, Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Sprague, Webster, Willey—23.

So the Senate refused leave for the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that, in the select committee appointed to examine into the condition of the Post Office Department, a serious difference of opinion existed in relation to the description of testimony to be brought before them; and that he, for one, was unwilling that the opinions of part of that committee should prevail, without the concurrence of the Senate. He, therefore, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the 15th day of December last, to inquire into the condition of the Post Office Department, are not authorized to call before them the persons who have been dismissed from office, for the purpose of ascertaining the reasons or causes of their removal.

Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

The resolution of Mr. GRUNDY, on the subject of certain witnesses proposed to be examined in relation to the causes of their removal from the Post Office Department, was taken up, and again, in consequence of the absence of the honorable Senator, laid on the table.

INDIAN ANNUITY.

On motion of Mr. DUDLEY, the bill from the House granting an annuity of $6,000 to the Seneca tribe of Indians was taken up, together with the amendments of Mr. SMITH, of Md., and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., said, that, when this bill was laid on the table, some days ago, he had addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, asking information on the subject, and, in consequence, he had received an answer from the Secretary, enclosing a letter from a Mr. Nourse, one of the clerks in the Register's Office, addressed to him, containing all the facts that were necessary for a proper understanding of the matter. There would be some little confusion, Mr. S. said, in the accounts between the Indians and the United States, in passing the bill in its original shape, as it came from the House, inasmuch as it would be giving an annuity of $6,000 without any equivalent for it. He had, therefore, introduced the amendment to transfer the stock, which was now held for the use of the Indians, to the United States, inasmuch as they required nothing more than the annuity, and the United States would be justly entitled to the stock for guarantying it to them. Upon the tribe's becoming extinct, the stock would, of course, revert to the United States; and it would therefore be better to transfer it at once than pursue the course originally pointed out in the bill. It would be simplifying what was complex; the subject would be put an end to; and the Indians and the Government would be relieved from any further difficulties in relation to it.

Mr. FORSYTH said he could not perceive the necessity of any legislation upon this subject. It is now, said Mr. F., well understood that the Government of the United States has never received any benefit from the Seneca tribe of Indians, for which this claim is made. The President of the United States has been made their trustee—has assumed a guardianship, in which the Congress of the United States has no concern; and all he has to do with it is to see that the stock entrusted to him is vested in the best possible manner, and that they duly receive the amount accruing from it. There was a time when these Indians received more than six thousand dollars per annum for their hundred thousand dollars worth of stock; that is, when their fund was invested in Bank of the United States' stock, when they received seven per cent. When their stock produced more than six thousand dollars, the whole amount was paid to them; but, since that stock had been less productive, since it had been invested in three per cents, all that had been done had tended to impose on the United States a pecuniary burthen. The terms of the contract were not, that the President of the United States should see that the fund always yielded six per cent. per annum; but that he should make the best disposition of it in his power; and this, it was admitted, had been done. There was then no further obligation on him, or on the Government. But it seemed the United States were considered as bound to these Indians, because the President of the United States had become the trustee of funds paid by the Holland Land Company for lands sold by the Indians to that Company.

This matter had already cost the Government a very considerable amount over and above the product of the stock, and now the question arises, are we bound to do more, after doing all we have already gratuitously performed? But it is said the Indians have been given to understand that the full amount of six thousand dollars should be paid to them. Who gave them to understand this? Who had a right to do so? And yet it was on such loose declarations that the whole merits of this claim seemed to rest. It is contended that the Government is bound to realize to these Indians any expectations they may have been induced to entertain. It is true, it is said that the late President of the United States, when the subject was before him, had given them these assurances. This, however, did not establish the justice of the demand. He could see no sort of obligation on the part of the Government to pay them more than the amount produced by their stock. The original arrangement (which, by the way, he considered a very foolish one, though it was made by the authority of Congress,) was to create the President of the United States a trustee or guardian for the safe keeping of this fund of one hundred thousand dollars, which they had undoubted right to—it was theirs; and it remained between them and their trustee, the President of the United States, to settle the disposition of it. The same authority that constituted him a trustee, and enabled him to invest or transfer that stock, would also authorize him to sell it, and make such disposal of it as might be deemed expedient.

But there is another view of this subject, said Mr. F. The letter from the War Department, just now submitted to us by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] informs us that the Holland Land Company, looking forward to the extinguishment of this tribe, contemplated, on the consummation of that event, setting up a claim to this $100,000 of stock. They say it then belongs to them. Suppose, after our making this compulsory contract with the Senecas to pay them $6,000 annually, the Holland Land Company should establish their claim to the reversion of this $100,000; in what light would the proposed measure be viewed, if adopted?

Mr. F. concluded by repeating, he saw no sort of necessity for further legislation upon this subject. If the Indians were willing to take the product of their stock, as it is, in the three per cents., let them, in Heaven's name, have it. The matter, according to his views, laid just where it should lay, and he hoped it might remain so. He, therefore, moved an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. SANFORD said the gentleman from Georgia supposed that there was no obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to do justice to the Seneca Indians; that the fund belonging to them had been placed in the hands of the President, as trustee, in his individual, and not in his official, capacity. Pray, sir, said Mr. S., how comes it, then, that this subject has been brought before us by the President himself? Is it not to be found in his message of the last session, in which he says he cannot do justice to these Indians without the intervention of Congress? If the gentleman would please to refer to the message of the President, and the report of the Secretary of war, he would find that those officers of the Government deemed it a matter in which the United States was concerned.

The gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the trusteeship of the President imposed no obligation on the Government. The President, as the official organ of the Government, became the voluntary trustee. The Indians sold their lands to Robert Morris, with the consent and approbation of the Government, and the Government voluntarily assumed the office of trustee for the safe investment of the purchase money. It was well known that it never was the practice of the Government to suffer any treaty to be held with the Indians without becoming a party to it; and, in the treaty held for the sale of these lands, the agent of the Government attended and sanctioned the whole proceedings. The gentleman from Georgia remarked, that the President might sell the stock, pay the Indians their $100,000, and get rid of the business. Mr. S. did not know, but he believed the Indians would be as glad to get their $100,000, and get rid of the business, as the gentleman from Georgia; that is, if they were to have no income, they would rather have their money. But this could not be done without legislation. The President had presented the subject to the consideration of Congress; and, even if the Indians were to be paid back their money, the action of Congress would be necessary. But it had been urged that various changes had been made; the money had first been invested in stock of the Bank of the United States, then in six per cents., and lastly in three per cents. Suppose we refuse to pay the Indians, because of these changes; would that be just? Who made those changes? Not the Indians, but ourselves. The investments were made by the trustee, according to his best judgment, without the knowledge or consent of the Indians; and they were always contented as long as they received what they considered a sufficient interest on their money. Mr. S. then urged that the amendment was unnecessary; he hoped it would not be persisted in, inasmuch as it would again change the relations between the United States and the Indians without their consent.

After some further arguments in favor of the bill, and against the amendment, Mr. S. concluded, by expressing his hope that the Senate would do full justice to the Seneca Indians, and not leave them in a situation to receive only two or three thousand dollars interest on their capital, when they had always been taught to believe themselves fairly entitled to an interest of six thousand dollars.

Mr. FORSYTH said, perhaps he did not understand this subject so well as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SANFORD,] but he must repeat, that he did not yet see a necessity for any legislation on this subject. The stock is invested at the discretion of the President, as the trustee of the Indians. He is bound to render them an account of it, and is ready to do so. He has the power to sell out the stock, and return them their money, if they wish it. This would, probably, be the most simple and equitable method that could be adopted. At all events, said Mr. F., we have nothing to do with it. He condemned the foolish plan by which the President was involved in such guardianships. It was imposing upon him duties and responsibilities which did not rightfully pertain to his station. The gentleman from New York supposes that there was an obligation on the part of the United States to guaranty that the stock yield perpetually the annual sum of six thousand dollars. Where did the gentleman get that idea? He, Mr. F., could find nothing of it in the documents belonging to the case. If the original contract was that the Indians should receive six per cent., why did they for so many years get seven per cent.? On the reasoning of the gentleman, the Government was as much bound to give seven as six per cent. But the honorable gentleman says the subject has been brought to the notice of Congress by the President himself! Well, sir, in so doing, the President has but done his duty. He found, on coming into office, that his predecessor had been paying out of the coffers of the treasury $6,000, instead of $3,190, without the shadow of authority; and finding that the Indians expected a continuance of a practice he could not sanction, he very properly brought the affair before Congress. Does any one, said Mr. F., question the correctness of the course pursued by the President in this matter? No one did. It had been admitted on all hands to be perfectly correct. Well, sir, shall we, by legislation, sanction a proceeding which the President condemns? It is not pretended that the Government is in any way bound, except by the guardianship of the fund so thoughtlessly undertaken. But, at that time, these Indians were the wards of the United States; that wardship has ceased, and they are now, with the exception of those going to Green Bay, under the guardianship of the State of New York. Mr. F. was for leaving the matter as it stood. If the Indians were dissatisfied, it was not the fault of the Government. The same authority that vested the stock in the President's hands, could authorize him to sell it. It would now bring one hundred and four thousand dollars. If they preferred the money to the stock, let them have it. He did not know whether this would be proper, but, for his own part, he would willingly vote for an appropriation for the purchase of the stock. If they wish to sell, the Government has as much a right to buy as any other individual.

Mr. BIBB said, he conceived this to be a most just and equitable claim. It accrued under the superintendence of the Government, by its agents, in the purchase of the Indian lands. Massachusetts, New York, and the General Government, were severely anxious for the extinguishment of the Indian title to these lands. A treaty was entered into, and the lands were sold to Robert Morris for one hundred thousand dollars, which was invested in the stock of the old Bank of the United States. The whole matter was reported to Congress, and approved of by that body. By the terms of the treaty itself, the guardianship of this money was invested in the political personage denominated by the constitution, the President of the United States. The arrangement did not contemplate entrusting the money to a Washington and Adams, or to any other individual. It was, therefore, an act of the Government, and an officer of that Government was made, ex officio, the repository of the fund in question. And are we, the Government of the United States, to lead these poor savages astray? Shall we take advantage of their ignorance, simply because we have them in our power? Now, if there is a principle on earth, said Mr. B., that I hold more sacred than another, it is that the Government should act with magnanimity, justice, and equity, towards these savages. The Government make treaties with them, in their own form; they write them down, in their own way; and shall we write articles of agreement with them in our own language, and interpret them to suit our own purposes? God forbid! This stock, to be sure, was first invested in the stock of the Bank of the United States; but what did they know of the nature of the Bank of the United States? They supposed that, by the terms of their treaty, they had secured to themselves, and their tribe, a permanent fund of six thousand dollars per annum. But how are their expectations realized? I call it an act of the Government, said Mr. B., as it undoubtedly is. The President is the agent, ex officio, and the fund is vested, in good faith, in the hands of the Government. Inasmuch as they have done all this, shall we not preserve our faith towards them? What do they know of five or six per cent. stocks? It is utterly beyond their comprehension. Mr. B. said he looked upon it as a mere matter of equity, that the Government should be willing to abide by the rules which she metes out to others. It was no more than just that she should allow the same rate of interest for debts due from her, as she demands from those indebted to her. From public debtors she exacts an interest of six per cent., and I know of no better rule to be applied to the present case. Mr. B. also disapproved of the attempt on the part of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] to decrease the amount to be paid to the Indians, as this seemed to be the purport of his amendment. He contended that the Government had already received this money. It was already paid into the treasury, and he trusted that a majority of the Senate would come to the just conclusion of guarantying to the Senecas a permanent annuity of six per cent. on their stock, or six thousand dollars per annum, and thus preserve that justice, good faith, and scrupulous integrity towards them, which it was so essential to the national honor should be preserved.

Mr. WHITE observed, that he did not think it made much difference to the parties, whether the bill passed as it came from the House of Representatives, or as amended by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] He, for his part, would prefer the original bill, inasmuch as it would, if it passed here with the amendment, be embarrassed, by having to undergo the revision of the other House. It had been stated that, when the treaty was held with the Seneca Indians for the sale of their lands, the agent of the United States was present, and sanctioned the agreement by which the President became the trustee for the disposition of the purchase money. This, he believed, was correct. The Indians being about to sell, and wishing to make some permanent arrangement by which the sum to be paid them should be safely invested, agreed that the President of the United States, not as an individual, but describing him in his official character, should, as their trustee, invest this money in stock of the Bank of the United States, to be held for their use, the interest on which to be annually paid them. This was done; and as long as the bank continued in operation, there was no difficulty whatever. The Indians annually received their interest, and were perfectly satisfied. But when the charter of the bank expired, the President, without consulting them, but believing he was doing that which was the most conducive to their interests, vested their funds in United States' six per cents. This investment created no difficulty, for the Indians still annually received an interest which they conceived equivalent to the value of their capital. On the paying off, however, of the six per cents, the President, with the like good motives, again invested this Indian fund in United States' three per cents, which not yielding the six thousand dollars per annum they had been accustomed to receive, they became dissatisfied. Then it was that they were assured by the President that they should lose nothing by this last investment; but that the difference between the interest on the three per cents, and the six thousand dollars, would be made up to them by the Government. On this assurance the Indians were satisfied; and they continued to receive their six thousand dollars until the present administration came into office, when the President not conceiving himself authorized to pay more than the bare interest on the stock, and the Indians refusing to receive that sum, the subject was presented to the consideration of Congress. Under these circumstances, Mr. W. thought it would be expedient, as well as just, to grant the Indians' demands. It would be hard, he said, by refusing to pass the bill, to disturb the understanding they had so long held of the matter. They had always looked upon the transaction, by which the trusteeship was created, to be the transaction of the United States, and would feel themselves hardly dealt with if the Government, at this late period, took a different view of the subject. Whether the arrangement, when made, had been right or wrong, Mr. W. conceived that the United States were now placed in such a situation, that it became a moral obligation on them to fulfil the expectations of the Indians. As to any ultimate claim which the New Holland Company might make upon this fund, after the tribe became extinct, Mr. W. knew nothing of it. If this company should be found to be justly entitled to the money, they would receive it; if not, it would, of course, remain the property of the United States. After some further remarks, Mr. W. concluded, by expressing himself highly in favor of the objects of the bill, which he hoped would pass without the amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH said he had already consumed more of the time of the Senate on this subject, than he meant to have devoted to it. But, after what had been said, particularly by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURN,] in relation to a violation of the public faith, he felt bound to reply. It seemed to him that gentlemen took an incorrect view of the whole transaction. He could see no hardships in the matter. It was a mere question, whether we were to go on paying to these Indians an annuity, for which we receive no equivalent. We have received no bonds from them. The Government, if you please, acted as guardian for them, to prevent their being defrauded in their contract with Robert Morris. This was the simple state of the case, and it was impossible to read the original contract without so understanding it. The Government had not only paid to them all that it was bound to pay, but it had paid thirteen thousand dollars more than it was bound to pay. The only question, then, now is, shall we continue thus to pay them, and overpay them? Because a President of the United States had chosen to create a hope in the breasts of the Indians, that they should continue to receive a certain sum, was that a reason for the appropriation? Mr. F. said, suppose such a claim as this were set up by white people, instead of red ones, would any one contend that they should receive one cent over the amount produced by their stock? No, sir, such a claim would not be sustained for a moment.

If any gentleman here, said Mr. F., can show the slightest obligation on the part of the Government to pay the Senecas one extra dollar, he would be content. But it is contended that they should receive the produce of their fund. So they should, but no more. But we are bound to pay them an interest of six per cent., says one. If we were debtors, the argument might hold good; but the Government are represented, from the same source, in the light of trustees. If the stock does not produce as much as they wish, the remedy must be found elsewhere than supplying the deficiency from the public coffers. One President has gone on thus to fulfil their expectations, and shall we continue to do so against all law, and every color of law? The amount of money was surely of no consequence whatever; he could heartily wish these poor creatures had it; but he could not vote it to them at the expense of principle, and violation of the constitution.

The question was then taken on indefinitely postponing the bill, and lost without a division.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to amend the bill by inserting a provision that the stock held for the benefit of the Indians be transferred to the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the effect of the amendment was simply this: that the three per cent. stock, now held for the benefit of the Indians, should become the property of the United States; while we bind ourselves, said he, to pay to them, in perpetuity, the annual sum of six thousand dollars. It was precisely on the principle of a tontine. The stock would be transferred to the United States, and the Indians would receive annually their six thousand dollars. They never could get more. The President, Mr. S. thought, had done right in laying the subject before Congress. Mr. S. could not conceive how the former President of the United States could feel himself authorized to give six thousand dollars per annum in lieu of three thousand one hundred and eighty dollars, the interest on the stock; but he did not care about the money; he believed it had been done with a benevolent motive, and he was glad that the Indians got the money. He wished to get rid of the business at once; and he believed that, if his amendment prevailed, it would be the most advantageous arrangement, both for the United States and the Indians.

Mr. WHITE said, from documents which he had examined, it appeared that, when this tribe of Indians became extinct, a claim would be set up by the Holland Land Company to this sum of one hundred thousand dollars; and the disposal which we are now about to make of that stock, as contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] might not prove acceptable to that company, should their claim prove a valid one. Mr. W. thought the amendment would only embarrass the subject. Should the Seneca nation become extinct, we then have the stock in our hands, ready for such disposal as justice may demand. He conceived the Government to be placed somewhat in the situation of a trustee who had violated his trust, and was compelled to render an account, with legal interest. He thought it was far better that we should pay the Indians much more than their actual due, than that we should wrong them out of one cent. From these considerations, he preferred the bill in its present shape.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he certainly could not vote for the bill in its original shape, though, if the amendment prevailed, it would meet with his hearty concurrence. With respect to any claim the Holland Company might hereafter make, it made not one doit of difference as to the present legislation of Congress. If that company came forward with any claim after the extinction of the tribe, its validity must be decided on by the Supreme Court; and, if decided in their favor, it mattered not whether they were paid in stock or money.

Mr. SMITH said, he believed the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] did not essentially vary the nature of the bill; but, as it had passed the other House in its present shape, he did not wish to see it retarded or embarrassed. He asked, what is this three per cent. stock? A debt that we owe. To whom? To ourselves. It is created with one hand, and paid with the other. He considered the amendment of no manner of importance; and he repeated the hope that it would not be made to embarrass the bill in its progress through the necessary stages of legislation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied, that it was a matter of great importance. It was important, if the United States granted these Indians a perpetual annuity, that they should get something for it. If we give them, said he, the perpetuity of six thousand dollars, and the stock is transferred to us, we get something for it; otherwise, we get nothing.

The question was then taken on the first amendment, and it was rejected without a division.

The question was then taken on the second, a verbal amendment, "that the annuity shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated," and carried.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Bibb, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Troup, White, Willey, and Woodbury—33.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Forsyth, Iredell, King, Poin-dexter, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, and Tyler—9.

The remainder of this day's sitting was consumed in Executive business.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MCKINLEY, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution relative to the pay of members of Congress, passed by the House of Representatives, reported: "That the resolution does not appear to be designed to regulate the compensation of members of Congress, but to create such penalties for neglect of duty as will ensure their attendance in the respective Houses, and to compel an amendment of the rules of each House so as to effect this object. All legislative powers granted by the constitution, are vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives; and each House is separately clothed with ample power to preserve its dignity and integrity, and to regulate its own conduct. By the fifth section of the constitution, it is declared that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide. Thus is the power of compelling the attendance of absent members conferred separately and exclusively on each House, and ought not, as the committee believe, to be exercised jointly by both. Nor is it believed to be necessary to resort to the joint power of the two Houses, to make or amend the rules by which this object is to be attained: because, in the same section of the constitution, power is given to each House to determine the rules of its own proceedings, punish its own members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. Whenever, therefore, it shall be deemed necessary by either House to exert the extraordinary power proposed in the resolution, it is under no necessity to resort to the other for aid to carry it into effect; and it is proper that it should be so: for it may be necessary and proper for one House to exercise this power, when it is wholly unnecessary in the other. The committee, not being informed of any necessity for its exercise by the Senate at present, and believing that when that necessity shall arise, it ought not to be exercised jointly with the other House, recommend that the resolution be rejected."

The report was ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GRUNDY called up the resolution which he had submitted the day before yesterday, declaring the sense of the Senate, that the committee appointed to examine the present condition of the Post Office Department, were not authorized to call before them as witnesses the persons who had been removed from office by that Department, for the purpose of testifying as to the causes of their removal.

Mr. G. said he should not have troubled the Senate on this subject, if a real difficulty and serious difference of opinion had not arisen in the committee. He quoted the journal of the proceedings of the committee, from which it appeared that Mr. Abraham Bradley had been called before them; that Mr. HOLMES had proposed to interrogate him as to the causes of his removal from the office of Assistant Postmaster General; that, Mr. GRUNDY had objected to the question; and that on taking the vote of the committee, whether it should be answered or not, Mr. CLAYTON and Mr. HOLMES voted in the affirmative, and Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. WOODBURY in the negative: Mr. HENDRICKS, wishing further time for consideration, did not vote; and the committee adjourned. Mr. G. remarked, that, upon being informed by the Senator who had not voted in the committee, that he should vote differently from him, [Mr. GRUNDY], he felt it his duty to appeal to the Senate for its decision. He had stated to the committee that he would not submit to the course proposed by the gentleman from Maine, should a majority of the committee so determine, without first having the direction of the Senate. Therefore, having the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS], he had no alternative but either to submit to what he considered a very incorrect and unprecedented course of proceeding, or to offer the resolution under consideration. If the Senate should decide against him, he could not say he would proceed cheerfully in discharge of the duty enjoined, but he would perform it diligently and faithfully. He also quoted from the journal of the committee other debated questions, which, from the votes on them, showed a great want of harmony in their proceedings. He considered the inquiry now under discussion as beyond the province of the Senate or the committee. This body had, at the last session, expressed its opinion on the power of the Executive to make removals, without assigning to the Senate the causes of them. He supposed the question had been settled. The cases then presented, were of a character more plausibly requiring the causes to be assigned. The right to demand the causes was alleged to be, that as the Senate was united with the Executive in the exercise of the appointing power, it should inquire into the reasons why an officer, whose appointment it had confirmed, had been displaced, in favor of the person whose nomination was then under consideration. This argument was overruled by the Senate's decision. And even this pretext, however plausible, does not exist in favor of the present inquiry.

If an examination is to be made into causes of removal, he conceived that more accurate information could be obtained from the person removing, than from the individual removed. Cases might exist, in which delicacy towards the individual removed would prevent his acquiring a knowledge of the causes that produced his removal. He did not believe this mode of proceeding calculated to secure justice in the result. The committee is to call before it the very men who have been exasperated at the head of this department on account of their dismissal, and, in the absence of that officer, they are to make their ex parte statements; and, without the advantage of a cross-examination, the committee is to make a report, decisive of the conduct and character of the Postmaster General; and the depositions thus taken are to furnish materials for partisan newspapers. He did not wish, as a Senator, to be thus employed.

It is true, the committee had sent an inquiry to the Postmaster General on this subject; this was contrary to his judgment. His opinion was, that the Senate possessed no constitutional power to make such inquiry. The Chief Magistrate and the heads of departments, by the constitution and laws, have the power conferred on them to appoint and remove the subordinate officers of the Executive branch of the Government. It is a matter confided to their discretion. If this discretionary power should be corruptly exercised, it would be the duty of the House of Representatives, the grand inquest of the nation, to institute an inquiry, collect the evidence, and bring the offender, by impeachment, before the Senate, in its judicial capacity. It would be unbecoming this body to be searching after impeachable matter, which, when obtained, could not be acted on until the House of Representatives should take up the subject, and prefer articles of impeachment. Besides, this kind of investigation would disqualify Senators from acting impartially, should a case be presented for a judicial trial. It would be impossible to prevent the minds of Senators from being influenced by these previous investigations. He also considered it undignified for this body, or its committee, to call on the Executive for the causes of removal, because, if obedience to the call should be refused, there is no constitutional power in this body to enforce it; and he viewed it unbecoming in the Senate to make a demand without the power to coerce a compliance.

He had said thus much on the general principle, without any special reference to this particular case. He had no apprehension that any portion of the conduct of the Postmaster General, if the whole were examined, would be found to merit censure. He considered this whole course of proceeding highly improper, and therefore asked the Senate to arrest it by the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON, (another member of the committee,) observed, he was not aware, until the resolution was submitted, that such a course as it proposed was contemplated; and he could not but express his surprise that it should have been resorted to without the knowledge of the committee, especially as they had not yet come to any decision on the subject-matter of the resolution. He considered the proposition objectionable, because it had the effect to elicit a partial history of the proceedings of the committee, before any regular report of those proceedings could be submitted to the Senate. But he was most surprised by it, because it was calculated to give the public very erroneous impressions respecting the conduct and great object of the inquiry. This resolution declared that the committee were not authorized to call before them the persons who have been dismissed from office, for the purpose of ascertaining the causes of their removal. From its tenor any gentleman would infer, that no member of the committee would have offered it, unless a disposition had been evinced by them to call before them a great number, if not all, of the persons who had been removed from office by Mr. Barry, numerous as the cases were, to sift out the causes of such removals. But nothing of this kind had ever been contemplated by the committee. He would take the opportunity, though he regretted to find himself compelled to do so at this time, to give a brief statement of the facts as they had really occurred in the committee, in justice to those who were entrusted with the inquiry. He should do this with reluctance, because it would have been far better to have suffered them to have spoken for themselves through a report, as to all their proceedings; but as the gentleman who had taken on himself to introduce the matter, had voluntarily disclosed a partial history of these transactions, and had reprobated the course pursued by some of his colleagues in strong language, he should feel it his duty, in the course of his remarks, to place those transactions before the Senate in a proper light, to illustrate the true state of the question pending before the committee, and to show whose conduct, in the language of that gentleman, was "either becoming," or "calculated to make improper impressions."

In his opinion, the proposition contained in the resolution was to repeal the power delegated to the committee by the former resolution, under which they were organized. But the gentleman who offered it, from some of his remarks, seemed to contend that its object was only to explain and construe that power. In its terms, the resolution was only declaratory—in substance, its design was, and its effects would be, to repeal an existing power, to smother inquiry, and baffle investigation. If it declared what was erroneous in this respect, as he should attempt to show before he sat down, the Senate could not adopt it.

It would seem, from this proposition, that great stress had been laid by the committee on the causes of the removals, to which it referred. The resolution seemed to carry with it the idea that this had been a principal, if not the sole object of the investigation. Insinuations of this character had been dropped elsewhere, by those who knew best, and felt most deeply, how much a scrutiny into the causes of these removals was to be dreaded. But this was not the only important object which he had in view, when he introduced the original resolution to appoint the committee. In explanation of his own object in submitting that resolution, he observed, that its aim and end were to inquire into the fiscal concerns of the department, and to ascertain, if possible, the true cause of their decline. He had seen that, under the administration of the predecessor of the present Postmaster General, the finances of the department were in a most flourishing condition; that by the report of the Committee on Retrenchment, in the other House, in 1828, it appeared that, under his able superintendence, its funds had been brought up from an annual deficit of 58,000 dollars, to yield a clear revenue of 100,312 dollars, after defraying all the expenses of mail transportation, and all the incidental expenses of the department. The department produced, at the period of that report, an excess of revenue more than sufficient to defray all the burdens arising from clerk hire, the salaries of its officers, and its contingent expenses; although, according to established usage, appropriations for those purposes were annually made from the treasury. The department then bore its own weight, paid its own way, and never made a demand on the treasury, to enable it to establish new post routes, when the exigencies of the country demanded them. This was what the people expected, and had a right to demand from it; and, until the present administration came into power, they had never been disappointed in their expectations under any Postmaster General.

Indeed, the predecessors of the present incumbent had actually paid into the treasury of this nation upwards of one million one hundred thousand dollars; and, in reply to an interrogatory put to him by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in the other House, at the last session, Mr. Barry himself admitted that "there had not, at any time, been drawn, by the department, any money from the treasury, which it had deposited there. All the expenses of transportation, and others incident to the department, had been defrayed by its own resources, without any appropriation, at any time, to meet them, from the treasury." At the commencement of the present session, it might be seen that its concerns were in a very different situation. By the reports of the head of the department, it appeared that, from the 1st July, 1828, to the 1st July, 1829, there had been an excess of expenditure, beyond the revenue, of $74,714, and an additional excess of expenditure, beyond the revenue for the ensuing year, of $82,124. The expenditures of the year ending the 1st of July, 1830, exceeded even those of the preceding year, by the enormous sum of 150,674 dollars. The available funds of the department, in the first fifteen months of the present administration, suffered an abstraction of 114,000 dollars. The sums drawn from the treasury to pay the salaries of officers, and the contingent expenses, also exceeded any ever drawn before. In 1824, the whole amount of appropriations for these purposes was 38,350 dollars. In 1830, it was 61,290 dollars; and the appropriation demanded for the present year is the same. It was, therefore, evident, that if the department had not leaned on the treasury for support, it would already have nearly exhausted its available funds, accumulated during preceding administrations, and amounting, as the Postmaster General had stated them, on the 1st of July, 1829, to 230,000 dollars. And, without considering the appropriations from the treasury, it must be evident to every man who reflected on this subject, that unless some change should be made in the administration of its affairs, this department would soon reach the period of its insolvency. Such were the considerations which had induced him to propose the inquiry. There were others, as little connected with the subject of removals as these, which had impelled him to submit the proposition. He had seen, that, during the last session of Congress, a Senator from Ohio [Mr. BUNNET] had introduced a resolution, calling for information in relation to the mail contracts. There were, at that time, allegations of gross abuses in regard to these contracts, which had since swelled into direct charges of corruption, in preferring higher to lower bidders, and granting extra allowances to political favorites. The resolution of the Senator of Ohio, after having remained on the table several days, was amended, as was supposed, at the suggestion of the Postmaster General himself, (if wrong in this supposition, he wished to be corrected,) and was adopted in the shape in which it appeared on the journal of the last session. The amendments might there be traced in italics; and the first of these was one postponing the information required, "till an early period of the next session." In this shape, that resolution was adopted. That next session had arrived, yet had no answer whatever been given to this call. Nearly a year had passed away, yet, neither respect for the Senate, nor a sense of duty, had yet produced a line of reply. Was the labor great? If so, was not the time allowed sufficient to enable the department, with the aid of the new clerks employed there, to answer it fully?

It was with a view to gain such information as this, and to learn the actual causes of the decline in the fiscal concerns of this department, that the investigation was commenced. Rumor had assigned, as one of these causes, the removal, for opinion's sake, of hundreds of experienced and faithful postmasters, and other officers of the department, and the substitution of ignorant and brawling partisans, who had exhibited no other proof of capacity than their having voted for the present Chief Magistrate. The resolution gave the committee full latitude of inquiry to ascertain this or any other cause of abuse. It directed them to inquire and report "in what manner the laws regulating the department were administered." The Postmaster General exercised the right to remove an officer by virtue of some law, or he had no right to remove. How he had administered this law, then, it was the duty of the committee to examine and report. Would the gentleman from Tennessee, who said we had no such power under the resolution, tell us why this clause did not absolutely enjoin this inquiry as a duty upon us? Another part of it directed the committee "to examine and report the entire management of the Post Office Department." Was the matter of removing a thousand officers no part of the management of the department? It appeared rather that this had been the chief business of the department. Another clause of the resolution directed the committee to examine and report whether further and what legal provisions were necessary to secure the proper administration of its affairs. It would be recollected that, in 1826, the celebrated committee on Executive patronage, in this body, reported a bill making provision to prevent this very abuse of removals in the Post Office, and actually transferring the whole power of appointment and removal from the Postmaster General to the President and Senate. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY,] who was a member of the present committee, had also been a member of that committee, and probably approved of the principles of the report, and would now vindicate the measure of making legal provision on the subject. If there could exist a period when such legal provision was necessary, it now existed; and the power to make inquiry into the propriety of such a measure, clearly delegated by the resolution, necessarily involved the power and the duty to inquire whether the removals had been improperly made.

Such were the spirit and the letter of the commission under which the inquiry commenced. The committee met, and propounded, after considerable deliberation, nine interrogatories to the Postmaster General, which were delivered to him on the 24th of December last, and to which he had as yet given no answer. On the 17th of January, three other interrogatories were proposed by them, and sent to him. Among the last, was one inquiry: "What postmasters have been removed since you came into office, and for what causes? Please to give their names, places of residence at the time of removal, and the causes of their removal, classifying the cause for brevity's sake." This interrogatory, as originally proposed in committee by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES,] inquired the causes of the removal of each of the discarded postmasters, but was amended by the votes of the Senators from Tennessee, New Hampshire, and Indiana, who shaped the interrogatory as it was actually sent to the Postmaster General. Thus, this officer was left at liberty to state the causes of removal generally, or to state them particularly in such cases as he might select; and this he might do in as strong language as he pleased, to bear him out in making these removals. And would any man, with a feeling of justice in his bosom, after giving the Postmaster General this latitude to accuse and blacken the victims of his proscription, refuse to them the right of stating the causes of their removal, if they should choose to do so? The files of the department might be filled with groundless accusations against them, which posterity might bring to light when they might be laid in their graves. Might they not now, if they could learn the nature of those charges, be permitted to refute them, and to place that refutation on the same record that should present the imputations against them? Yet the gentleman from Tennessee complained; that to allow them to testify would be to admit ex parte evidence.

After these interrogatories had been delivered to the chief of this department, another, relating to a single point, had been sent to him by order of the committee on the 28th of January; and, as nothing had yet been received from him, a request had been added, to know of him within what time an answer might be expected. Two communications were then received from him in reply to the last letter of the committee; the one acknowledging the receipt of their letters of the 17th and 28th of January, stating that the department was laboriously employed in answering the inquiries, and would reply when it was ready; the other answering the last interrogatory of the committee. The receipt of the most important communication, that of the 24th December, had not yet been acknowledged. In the mean time, specific charges of corruption and fraud, in certain mail contracts, having been distinctly preferred to the committee, with offers, on the part of respectable individuals, to sustain the charges on oath, it had been unanimously agreed to apply for power to send for persons and papers. The power was granted by the Senate. But when the committee met, the gentleman from Tennessee objected to its exercise in the very case which had caused them to ask for the power, insisting that inquiry ought first to be made of the Postmaster General, whether he was not in possession of sufficient affidavits and correspondence to make out the case against himself, and that it would be time enough to send for the persons when it should be found that the charges could not be established by a reference to his own records. In this ingenious view of the subject, that gentleman was supported by the Senators from New Hampshire and Indiana, a majority of the committee. He did not hesitate to say, that, from that moment, he, as well as the Senator from Maine, considered that the great object of the investigation was substantially defeated. An effort, however, was made to examine Abraham Bradley, the late First Assistant Postmaster General. He was sent for, and attended the committee. Mr. C. then read from the journals of the committee—"Mr. Woodbury objected to this witness being sworn, unless Mr. Holmes would first state his object in desiring to have him examined. Mr. Holmes asked the witness how long he had been Assistant Postmaster General, and what were the duties assigned him in the department? Mr. Holmes objected to giving any further explanation of the object of his question, than the question itself conveyed; and insisted on his right to have the witness examined. It was then decided that the witness should be sworn, and answer this question, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Hendricks, and Mr. Clayton voting for it, and Mr. Grundy and Mr. Woodbury against it. Mr. Bradley was then sworn by the chairman, and answered the question, when Mr. Holmes propounded another question: Were you removed from your office, and when, and, if you know, for what cause or causes? Mr. Grundy objected to this question; and Mr. Hendricks, to give himself time, as he said, to examine the resolution, moved to adjourn. Mr. Grundy, Mr. Hendricks, and Mr. Woodbury voted for the adjournment, and Mr. Holmes and Mr. Clayton against it." Thus, continued Mr. C., this question had been proposed by his friend from Maine to a single witness; and, before the committee had even decided upon it, the gentleman from Tennessee had offered this resolution to the Senate. It appeared to him, that the gentleman from Tennessee thought that the committee should never dare to ask information from any other source than the Postmaster General himself. To prove this, if proof were yet necessary, he referred to the journal of the proceedings of the committee of this morning. A resolution was offered to request Joseph W. Hand, solicitor of the department, to attend with the book, showing balances of accounts had been collected, and to give information as to the actual state of the available funds; when the gentleman from Tennessee objected to the resolution, and moved to dispense with Mr. Hand's testimony, and to call on the Postmaster General on the subject; and being supported in this by the gentleman from New Hampshire, the testimony was refused. The importance of ascertaining the true nature of those funds was unquestionable. The bill pending in the other House to establish additional post routes, had been arrested on account of the supposed want of funds to defray their expense. The public demand for these routes, as manifested by the daily petitions presented here, demonstrate the interest which this question had excited; and the honorable Senator from Tennessee must labor under some manifest delusion, in supposing that such an inquiry should be confined to the Postmaster General.

That gentleman seemed to suppose that a dismissed officer was incompetent to testify, merely because he had been dismissed. The witness [Mr. Bradley] who was brought before the committee, had served his country with great honor to himself for about thirty years. He had grown up in this department, was thoroughly conversant with all its concerns, and had through life sustained an irreproachable character. The breath of proscription could not taint it. The shafts of calumny would fall harmlessly before it. And if the testimony of such men be incompetent, to whom should we go for information? To the clerks and officers of the department alone? Were they more worthy of credit than the man who had been driven out of office for a manly exercise of the right of opinion? Were those alone worthy of confidence who had learned to

"Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning?"

There were, doubtless, many high-minded and honorable men holding office under the department. But would you compel them to appear to give evidence against it, when you know, from the persecuting and proscriptive temper evinced by it, that, for any material disclosure of abuses, they would probably fall the victims of their own integrity in less than twenty-four hours? Perhaps not a few of these men, with their families, were dependent upon their offices for bread. They had learned no other means of living. And, for one, he did not hesitate to say, that he would rather forego the whole investigation, important as he verily deemed it, than to compel one of them to do an act which, however pure in its motive, or honorable in its performance, might cause him to be deprived of his means of living.

It would be seen, then, that while the committee were thus trammelled by a refusal to suffer them to inquire into abuses from any person who might have been dismissed from office, these abuses must pass without exposure. The whole object of the inquiry might be frustrated. This department, which, by the report of the late Postmaster General, for the year 1827, contained not less than twenty-six thousand officers and agents of every description, among whom there were more than eight thousand four hundred postmasters, and more than two thousand mail contractors, could of itself form an executive army, ready to march at any time, at the word of its political chief, and storm any position which he might order to be carried, however sacred in our civil institutions, and though in our souls' just estimation prized above all price. But it would remain to be seen whether this determination to hide the light would satisfy the people! They were awake to the importance of this inquiry. They felt that the exigencies of the country, now demanding the establishment of so many new post-routes, and now, for the first time in the history of this department, demanding them in vain, called loudly for some radical change in the management of its affairs. They had read, as he had, with astonishment, the report of its chief to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the other House at the last session, in which he declared that "it must be obvious, that, without any considerable improvement in the mail facilities for at least three years to come, it would be difficult to make the department sustain itself in its present operations, without any increase of the number of mail routes." And, seeing these things, he said to the gentleman from Tennessee, let no friend of the department, or its chief, lay the flattering unction to his soul, that, by suppressing this investigation, either directly or indirectly, they can escape the consequences which invariably flow from attempts to conceal the true state of their affairs from an intelligent public.

Mr. WOODBURY, (also a member of the committee,) said, that the question involved in the resolution stood forth singly, naked, and, as he believed, virtually adjudicated by the Senate at the last session. He never anticipated that all the concerns of the Post Office Department, and all the proceedings of the select committee, would be drawn into its discussion. But the course just pursued by the honorable chairman left no alternative but assent to his allegations, or a reply. In relation to the personal imputation, that a portion of the committee had attempted to exclude light, or to baffle inquiry, he would boldly appeal to every other member of the committee for its contradiction. Every proposition for information had been met and examined with promptitude, and sanctioned, whenever a majority of the committee deemed it to be embraced within the reference, and presented in a shape best calculated to elicit the truth. The proceedings of the committee on the very subject of the present resolution—the causes of the removal of officers—furnished a very striking illustration on this topic.

An interrogatory was, at an early moment, offered by the chairman, addressed to the Postmaster General, asking for the causes of removal in each case since his connexion with the department. This interrogatory was believed by a majority of the committee, as he supposed, improper, after the repeated decisions of the Senate last session against similar inquiries; and it was further thought to be derogatory and unjust to give publication and notoriety to all the charges on file against five or six hundred individuals. The proposition was, therefore, amended, and the causes of removal left to be stated in general terms, without any personal application. This was settled as a question of power and propriety, and not with the least view, in any body, of escaping from any legitimate inquiry.

But, to show the spirit and temper prompting that interrogatory, rather than those opposed to it, after the lapse of many days, and after power was obtained to send for persons and papers, in the examination of another subject, a question to a witness, involving the same principle as to the causes of removal, was again renewed; and a majority deciding in its favor, the minority were compelled to acquiesce, or, by this resolution, obtain the opinion of the Senate against the inquiry. Was not this correct and parliamentary on the part of the minority? Ought they first to have asked leave of the majority opposed to them? And was it not proper for the Senate to construe their own reference, and even to amend or discharge it entirely, if expedient? The reference was the act of the Senate. To the Senate the committee were amenable. The Senate had their allegiance; could control all their movements; and to their decision, whether for or against the resolution, he, for one, should bow with all due deference. He would sit and examine, early and late, in session and out of session, if so directed.

Having thus offered the vindication of the minority for presenting this resolution to this body, the main, and indeed only proper question recurred: Ought the committee to be limited or not in their investigation of the causes of removal from office? He should not now argue what had been so fully argued here only at the last session—both the uselessness and inexpediency, if not the encroachment on constitutional principles, of such an inquiry by this body. He supposed that the Senate was not now disposed to cross its own path on this subject. What would it lead to in the present instance, were the committee to go into the causes of each of the five or six hundred cases; to send for the person of each removed officer to obtain evidence, and to summon even third persons, without number, for explanation and support of either side? He could not see the utility, any more than the end, of such an investigation. But there might, he admitted, be some benefit in our legislation by knowing the general causes which influenced any department in its removals.

The chairman was in error in supposing that he had been a member of the Committee on Executive Patronage, who had made the report referred to by that honorable Senator. He was a member of a subsequent committee on that subject, and approved most of the principles in the report of the first one; and, therefore, would regulate, at all times, when practicable, the influence of the Post Office Department, or any other Department, by additional laws, where laws could reach the evil, and where he had ascertained that the general grounds of removals, or of other proceedings in the department, were such as to injure or to endanger the public interests. Hence, he had not objected now to ask the general grounds of removal in that department, or to investigate, to the fullest extent, its fiscal operations. These operations were conceded to have been the chief object of the original reference. It was with a view to them that the power to send for persons and papers had been voted for by him: but now, when that power was attempted to be turned to a different, and, as he believed, improper inquiry, it was high time, in his opinion, to ask the direction of the Senate.

He regretted that the member from Delaware had deemed it relevant, on the resolution now under consideration, to discuss at all the comparative condition of the fiscal concerns of that department, under its present and under its former administration. He stood not here as the mere apologist or eulogist of any man. But the course of the honorable chairman demanded a brief reply; and without any invidious contrast between the heads of that department, at different periods, he would endeavor to satisfy the Senate, in a very few words, that the minority of the committee had shown no unwillingness to probe to the quick the pecuniary affairs of the department at any period of time, and that, so far as these affairs were accurately known, their present condition was highly creditable to the great public objects of the creation of the department, and to its general fiscal administration for the last two years.

The first eight interrogatories proposed to the department by the chairman, in the committee, so far as they related to its funds, had been adopted without a dissenting vote. The extraordinary power to send for persons and papers with a view to the same object, had also been asked for, without opposition, in the committee. The minority had been as anxious as the majority to obtain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And when a call on subordinate clerks had been proposed, it had been merely changed into one to the head of the department, as more decorous in the first instance, and as the only proper call until the head should decline or neglect to answer. No such neglect had yet occurred. Calls made at the last session, involving an unprecedented degree of labor, had precedence, and had put in requisition all the force of the department which could be spared from its current business; calls, one of which, alone, he had no doubt, from its character, would present an answer filling, if printed, a thick octavo volume. He had so advertised the committee, when some of their own troublesome interrogatories had been propounded; and it would be oppressive to ask of the department to make brick without straw. The minority, therefore, to avoid delay, had expressed a willingness and wish to examine the books of the department without so much copying, and had stood ready at all times to proceed, and make the appropriate examination. The Senate would thus judge how far any imputation was deserved by any of the committee, of a desire to shut out light, or to check or delay suitable inquiries in relation to the funds of the department.

One word as to the comparative state of these funds. The chairman, (how impartially the Senate must decide,) began by saying, that if the salaries of the officers of the department, and the repairs of its buildings, were charged to it, it would be found much in arrear, if not insolvent. But is it pretended that those salaries and repairs have ever been charged to it under former administrations? Again, it was alleged that the expenditures now exceeded the receipts, and that some of its operations, without relief from Congress, would become entirely palsied. But he contended that, on an examination of dates and figures, and considering the effect of our own new laws on the fiscal concerns of the department, it was at this moment more effectually answering the object of public accommodation in the rapid and safe transportation of the mail, than at any former period of the Government; and that so far from needing appropriations from Congress to prevent its bankruptcy, it only asked the forbearance of Congress on its new, numerous, and burdensome routes.

How stood the facts? In May, 1828, you passed a law establishing from two hundred to two hundred and fifty new post routes. Here they were; and any gentleman who chose to read those in his own section of country, would be satisfied, as he would from the nature and history of the establishment, that many of those new routes were not only expensive in the first instance, but exceedingly burdensome afterwards, by the income falling short of the annual cash.

What was the consequence? In the year ending July, 1828, while few or none of the new routes had been put into operation, and while the department was entirely in other hands, the balance against the department was 25,000 dollars. He should use round numbers. He had no doubt that this deficit happened, not from any misconduct in the then head of the department, but from the same kind of causes which had properly operated since—a desire to extend the accommodations of the mail to the utmost extent the finances of the department would admit.

In the year ending July, 1829, only two or three months of which were under the administration of the present head, the balance increased to 74,000 dollars. Many of the new routes had, doubtless, in the mean time, been put into operation at a large expense, and not, it is presumed, though then, as well as now, open to the imputation of happening from profligacy and fraud.

In the year ending July, 1830, the balance was 82,000 dollars. How? By corruption and extravagance? No, sir. This balance was created by expenditures under the last, and under former laws, which the public interests demanded, and which can be seen in detail in our own documents of the present session. By these, it appears that, in the last year, still more new routes had been put into operation, or old ones extended, so as to carry the mail on horseback thirty-one thousand miles further than at any former period. Routes had also been extended, expedited, and improved, for the safety of the mail, so that it was conveyed in carriages one hundred and eighteen thousand miles more than in any former year. Yet the chairman talked as if nothing short of the grossest corruption and waste had produced an increased expenditure.

But look a step further. If this imputed waste and corruption actually existed, not only would the mail not be transported in such increased distances, and in such improved ways, but the whole amount of income would be stationary or diminished; whereas, in truth, the receipts of the department exceeded the last year what they were in 1828, the last full year of the past administration, nearly 300,000 dollars.

Had the funds been squandered, then, to the winds and waves, or faithfully collected? Had the increased expenditures been made on the same labor performed, or on the increased and improved transportation of the mail for so many thousand miles further.

Look to your documents also for an answer to the charge that the department is bankrupt, and that the aid of Congress is invoked and is necessary to avert impending ruin. Did the Postmaster General say this? No, sir. So far from all that, the debts in arrear due to the Post Office, meet thus far more than all the annual balances against it; and the Postmaster General had officially informed us, since the commencement of this very session, that, as the contracts for the next four years had been renewed, and in a way to save the department, annually, over 72,000 dollars, and as the increase of postage is progressive, there is "a foundation for the belief which has been expressed, that the current revenue of the department for the succeeding year, will be sufficient for its disbursements."

He impugned the motives of no gentleman who differed from him in opinion, either here or in the committee. Differences of opinion would honestly occur both in private and public life. But the Senate would now enjoy an opportunity to decide whether the course pursued by his friends and himself in the committee had been such as the courtesy due to official intercourse with the department required, and such as the true interests of the Government justified.

In fine, they would see whether any thing thus far had been developed in the condition of the General Post Office, so alarming, so very terrifying, as some gentlemen desired them to believe.

Mr. HOLMES said, if he were to consult his own individual wishes, he should vote for this resolution. Its object was to limit the inquiry directed by the Senate. The committee were to inquire into "the entire management" of the Post Office Department, and to this end they were empowered to send for persons and papers. The resolution under consideration proposed to prohibit the committee to ask a witness why he was removed from office by the Postmaster General. Now, said Mr. H., as I deem such an inquiry essential to the performance of the duty assigned me, the Senate, I know, would not, if they could, compel me to perform a duty in a manner which I conscientiously believe to be wrong. If, therefore, they should think proper to pass this resolution, I should ask to be excused from further service on the committee; the Senate would of course excuse me; and I should be thereby relieved from this troublesome business. But were I the particular, personal, and political friend of the Postmaster General, I should vote against this resolution. So far from being afraid of inquiring into the official conduct of my friend, I would court the strictest scrutiny. Let the witnesses be partial or impartial, an honest and faithful officer can never suffer by inquiry. Let him submit to the severest ordeal, let every thing be subjected to the strictest examination, and if he cannot stand, let him fall. These are no new doctrines with me—they have been the maxims of my whole political life. In a Government like ours, those who receive and disburse your public moneys, should be watched with a vigilant, and even a jealous eye. Here is the commission under which we are acting:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report the present condition of the Post Office Department; in what manner the laws regulating the department are administered; the distribution of labor, the number and the duties assigned to each; the number of agents, where and how employed; the compensation of contractors; and, generally, the entire management of the department; and whether further and what legal provisions be necessary to secure the proper administration of its affairs."

In proceeding under this broad commission, it became necessary to have power to send for persons and papers, and the committee unanimously agreed to ask for this authority, and the Senate as unanimously granted it. The committee had sent several interrogatories to the Postmaster General, of which this was one: "What Postmasters have been removed since you came into office, and for what causes? Please give the names and place of residence when removed, with the time and causes of their removal—classifying the causes for brevity's sake." This interrogatory was put by me, but not in its present shape. My inquiry was into the causes of removal of each; but the friends of the Postmaster General insisted upon a classification, which, whatever the intent, does in effect leave it in the power of the Postmaster General to evade the whole inquiry. Now, in this state of the case, and while this inquiry, thus modified, is before the Postmaster General, Mr. Bradley, a former Assistant Postmaster General, is summoned before the committee. The first question put by Mr. Holmes was this: "How long were you Assistant Postmaster General, and what were the duties assigned you in the department?" This question was objected to, unless the interrogator would first state to what examination it was intended to lead. The answer of course was that no such explanation would be given; none was necessary; for the interrogatory carried the intent upon the face of it. Even this mere preliminary question was seriously opposed in committee, and was at last permitted to be put to the witness by a majority of one only. Messrs. Clayton, Holmes, and Hendricks, in the affirmative; Messrs. Grundy and Woodbury in the negative. The next question, and which is the foundation of this extraordinary resolution, was this: "Were you removed from office; when; and, if you know, for what cause or causes?" During the discussion whether this question should be put, a motion was made by Mr. Hendricks to adjourn, and carried. Messrs. Grundy, Woodbury, and Hendricks in the affirmative; Messrs. Clayton and Holmes in the negative. In this predicament were we, (an inquiry of the Postmaster General into his causes of removal, a question to the late Assistant Postmaster General why he was removed, then pending,) and the Senator from Tennessee, without consulting the rest of the committee, asks the Senate to stop the inquiry—to forbid us to ask the question! Were the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire serious in their endeavors to obtain the causes of removal, when they united in inquiring of the Postmaster General himself, and do they object to an inquiry of the witness? None but the removing and removed are presumed to know the causes. You are forbidden to ask the officer removed, and are limited therefore to a general inquiry of the Postmaster General himself, the very officer whose conduct is the subject of investigation. This is a very easy way to let off a delinquent—he is not only a witness, but is the only witness in his own case. And we must not be too particular in our inquiries even of him. He is to classify, "for brevity's sake." If he chooses to smother the design, let him resort to generalization. And why are his friends so sensitive? If your officer is innocent, he can very safely answer any interrogatory, however particular. He is in no danger from any witness, however strong his prejudices. An honest and faithful officer should never have cause to fear investigation. Ours is a Government based entirely on responsibility, where the acts of every agent should be open to public inspection. All secrets are grounds of suspicion and jealousy, and especially when claimed by a subordinate officer.

The two questions which were put to Mr. Bradley, were manifestly preliminary. They, on the one hand, went to show the extent of his means of knowing the state of the department. He had held the office thirty years, and nearly the whole time had managed its fiscal concerns. Had he been removed by the present Postmaster General, and if so, for what cause? This, on the other, would show how far he might be prejudiced—presenting at once his knowledge and his bias. Who could have apprehended any danger from such questions? No friend of an innocent man could have objected to the inquiry; and had an opposer of this administration done so, it would have been complained of as evidence of hostility.

But my principal object was, I admit, ulterior. It was to ascertain the causes of the unprecedented number of removals in this department. This, I know, is a tender subject. Neither the minions of power, nor the slaves of ambition, like very well to give reasons. Let motives be divulged, and tyranny would soon be banished the land. The post office, and the press, when free and unadulterated, are the efficient engines to demolish tyranny. To corrupt these, is the prime object of every aspirant to absolute power. Put into the hands of talents, combined with ambition, the press, the post office, and the purse, and you may talk of liberty—you may retain the shadow, but you will have lost the substance.

Thus far the committee have "made haste slowly." We have scarcely entered upon the threshold of inquiry, and now this resolution is offered, without the least notice to the committee—the object of which is to arrest the whole proceeding.

I shall not forjurge the case. I do not say that the Postmaster General has done right or wrong. This Senate has directed its committee to inquire, and has given it ample powers, and I, as one, do not feel at liberty to disobey. There is certainly a diminution of the funds of the department, indicating that it is insolvent, or verging to insolvency; and the Postmaster General has officially informed us, that, from the 4th March, 1829, to the 2d March, 1830, four hundred and ninety-one post officers had been removed, not including those in the department, or in the post office of this city.

This administration owes its existence to its professions of economy. The advocates of General Jackson told the people, what they were quite willing and very ready to believe, that the funds had been squandered, and that General Jackson was the very man to correct the abuses. It has been boldly asserted in this Senate, and gone out to the American people, that all this is a miserable pretext, and the whole affair is a mere system of "rewards and punishments." It appears, too, that more changes have been made in the post office than in any other department, and that this seems most in embarrassment. Things thus appearing, it is most extraordinarily proposed to stifle the inquiry which the Senate unanimously directed. We have heard much of "bargain and corruption," as well as of "economy." It may turn out that all this "bargain and corruption" has occurred under this administration. If any of it was employed in establishing the former, it has not been yet discovered. It was the general cry during the last canvass; and if any proofs can be adduced, they may be elicited by this inquiry.

The number and compensation of clerks in the department could not have been extravagant, unless we are deceived by appearances. We find the number has been greatly increased, and there is a petition now pending before us for additional pay. Though this does not, to be sure, look much like "retrenchment and reform," still it is possible that these additional expenditures may become necessary, from the increased duties of the department. But I should think that to displace experience, and substitute inexperience, would sufficiently account for it. It is impossible, if you remove the most experienced and faithful officers in a department so complex and ramified, that the business can be done so expeditiously or correctly. It is impossible that the men the most intelligent, practical, and faithful, can perform duties so well as those who have been trained and disciplined by long practice.

It is possible, though I cannot admit that it is probable, that all these six or seven hundred removals were for good cause. The late Postmaster General was a faithful and vigilant officer and a rigid disciplinarian. It would seem, at a first glance, that he could not have overlooked all these unworthy men, or that, if he knew them, he would have permitted them to remain. The friends of the present incumbent profess to respect the character and merits of the late Postmaster General, and we hope they are sincere; but surely it is a poor compliment to his talents or integrity to impute to him the employment of such a regiment of bad officers, either from ignorance or design. Sir, it is my prima facie opinion, that scarcely one in a hundred has been removed for sufficient cause; but still, if, upon inquiry, it should be otherwise, I will be the first to retract, and exonerate the Postmaster General from all proscription.

The Senator from Tennessee [MR. GRUNDY] thinks it a drudgery, a small business, to make this inquiry. He surely cannot mean this as a reflection upon the Senate for directing it. If the Postmaster General shall have prostituted his office for purposes of proscription, and shall have descended to an inquiry into the party preferences of every obscure deputy in the United States, for the purpose of fixing the seal of reprobation upon every one who would not sacrifice to this modern Moloch, it is humiliating to follow him, and expose him in his degrading occupation? No, sir; if an officer will descend to petty, contemptible persecutions, low as the business is, it is proper to ferret him out.

I cast no imputation upon the members of the committee who think differently. They probably believe themselves to be right, and we are satisfied that we are right; and thus the account is balanced between us.

For myself, I cannot indulge a doubt that this inquiry is not only legitimate, but necessary, and demanded by the American people.

Since the committee was appointed, not only have the public papers, but private letters from respectable individuals, urged on the inquiry. And just as we are commencing it with adequate power and authority, the whole is to be suppressed!

I hold in my hand a letter from a highly respectable Virginian to one of its Senators here, making high charges of corruption and fraud in mail contracts, and naming the witnesses to be called to prove them. It was my opinion, and that of the chairman, that the witnesses should be immediately summoned to testify. But a majority thought that we ought first to seek for evidence at the department; thus expecting that, if any thing was wrong, the Postmaster General would furnish the necessary evidence to convict himself. Now, if it be proper to inquire at all, why proceed in this circuitous way? When a respectable citizen alleges fraud, or that he believes it, and names the witnesses by whom he would prove it, why not send for them, when our powers are so ample? It seems to me that so cautious a procedure as this is to induce a premature suspicion of error or guilt.

The Postmaster General is in no danger of injustice by the inquiry into the causes of removal. If a man is removed for good cause, he would not be very forward to complain or to testify, when he would know that thereby his own demerits would be made manifest. If these removals have been made as a punishment for the exercise of the freedom of opinion, a remedy should be promptly provided. Sir, the people of the United States will never tamely suffer a department of such power and influence to become an engine which may one day batter down their liberties. Sir, the suppression of inquiry is among the new fashions introduced by this administration. Inquiry, hitherto, has been always popular; so much so, that a member would scarcely hazard his reputation in opposing it. No apprehension that we might meet with impeachable matter could deter us. Indeed, such an argument would have been ridiculed. The Select Committee of the Senate of 1826, on the subject of Executive patronage, were not so timid lest they should compromise their impartiality. They inquired into facts, as the foundation of legislation; and although we found no instances where the power of removal had been abused, we deemed it safe to regulate and restrain it. The mischief which might befall us from Executive influence, by means of the post office and the press, were foretold in the spirit of prophecy. That report was drawn by the Senator from Missouri, [MR. BENTON,] and the facts embodied there are good proof that the committee were not then over scrupulous in their inquiry. The slavish doctrines of the present day would not now tolerate a report couched in such language, and breathing such a spirit. The committee proceed:

"The whole of this great power will centre in the President. The King of England is the 'fountain of honor'; the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has 'power' over the 'support' of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and, upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them, as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate. If the President was himself the officer of the people, elected by them, and responsible to them, there would be less danger from this concentration of all power in his hands; but it is the business of statesmen to act upon things as they are, and not as they would wish them to be. We must then look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled; when the civil and military officers of the Federal Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination by the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? and what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name of a thing soon accommodates itself to the substance. The first Roman Emperor was styled Emperor of the Republic, and the last French Emperor took the same title; and their respective countries were just as essentially monarchical before as after the assumption of these titles. It cannot be denied or dissembled but that this Federal Government gravitates to the same point, and that the election of the Executive by the Legislature quickens the pulsation."

"The committee must, then, take things as they are. Not being able to lay the axe to the root of the tree, they must go to pruning among the limbs and branches. Not being able to reform the constitution in the election of President, they must go to work upon his powers, and trim down these by statutory enactments, wherever it can be done by law, and with a just regard to the proper efficiency of the Government. For this purpose, they have reported the six bills which have been enumerated. They do not pretend to have exhausted the subject, but only to have seized a few of its prominent points. They have only touched in four places the vast and pervading system of Federal Executive patronage—the press, the post office, the armed force, and the appointing power. They are few compared to the whole number of points which the system presents, but they are points vital to the liberties of the country. The press is put foremost, because it is the moving power of human action; the post office is the handmaid of the press; the armed force its executor; and the appointing power the directress of the whole. If the appointing power was itself an emanation of the popular will, if the President was himself the officer and the organ of the people, there would be less danger in leaving to his will the sole direction of all these arbiters of human fate. But things must be taken as they are; statesmen must act for the country they live in, and not for the island of Utopia; they must act upon the state of facts in that country, and not upon the visions of fancy. In the country for which the committee act, the press, with some exceptions, the post office, the armed force, and the appointing power, are in the hands of the President, and the President himself is not in the hands of the people. The President may, and, in the current of human affairs, will, be against the people; and, in his hands, the arbiters of human fate must be against them also. This will not do. The possibility of it must be avoided. The safety of the people is the 'supreme law;' and, to ensure that safety, these arbiters of human fate must change position, and take post on the side of the people."

Sir, you can never legislate correctly without inquiring into the necessity. You should search deep, and ascertain the length, breadth, depth, and height of the mischief to be remedied. Both Houses of Parliament, by their committees, collect and embody the evidence on each subject as a foundation for legislation; and who ever heard it objected that they might find impeachable matter?

The Committee of the House of Representatives of 1818 had no scruples, no delicacy like that here manifested. They summoned not only the clerks, but the chiefs of the departments themselves. They used "the incision knife and the caustic," and searched the wound to the bottom. They did not stop at a summons; but, when that was disobeyed, they issued a capias, and brought in the witness by force. No one then complained of want of decorum. The Representatives of the people spoke, by their committee, and their voice was obeyed.

We do not find another case where a call of such magnitude was refused, and we ask the gentlemen on the other side to give us a single example. Strange doctrines, indeed, which cover your executive officers with such a panoply!

[Here Mr. GRUNDY requested Mr. HOLMES to suspend his remarks until to-morrow, as he had just understood that there was some executive business before the Senate, which it was indispensably necessary to act on to-day.]

Mr. HOLMES acquiesced in the suggestion; when,

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and spent half an hour within closed doors; and then adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

POST OFFICE CONTRACTS.

A report was received from the Postmaster General, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, giving a list of contracts made by that department, together with the number and compensation of clerks employed in that department.

[The documents consisted of copies of all contracts made by him or his predecessor, on which additional allowances had been made for additional services; copies of all contracts existing when his immediate predecessor came into office, on which similar allowances were made, and copies of all contracts made by his immediate predecessor, on which similar allowances had been made. The letter adds, "that the labor required for the investigation of each case, on more than seventeen hundred routes, and making the statements, besides preparing copies of about fourteen hundred contracts, comprising together nearly six thousand large folio pages, has required the constant and diligent service of several clerks for about six months. The current business of the department has been delayed, so far as could be done without producing permanent loss; and, together with the new arrangements rendered necessary in answering the several calls for information from the committee instituted by the Senate on the 15th of December, it has not been practicable, with all the force that could be applied, to finish the report at an earlier period."]

Mr. GRUNDY moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with a view to a selection of such parts as it would be proper to have printed. In its present shape it was too voluminous for printing. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BURNET] who offered that resolution, calling for the information contained in the report, belonged to that committee, and it seemed proper that it should have that reference.

Mr. BURNET said he would not oppose the reference suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] but he had supposed the subject would be referred to the select committee on the present state of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GRUNDY remarked that his object was to refer the subject to the committee who had the least business before it. To himself it was totally immaterial, as he belonged to both of the committees proposed. The standing Post Office Committee were not overwhelmed with business, while the other was.

Mr. CLAYTON contended the report should be sent to the select committee, as that committee were now engaged in the investigation of this very subject; and he did not apprehend that there was any inquiry before the other committee which bore any relation to it. As for the selection of the documents which it would be proper to have printed, the select committee could do it as well as any other. He hoped the gentleman would withdraw his proposition, and allow the report to go to the select committee.

Mr. GRUNDY said he could not withdraw his motion. The gentleman from Ohio, who called for the report, belonged to the standing committee, and it was proper he should have an opportunity of acting upon it. Besides, it was useless to disguise another fact. The select committee had taken so wide a field for its investigations that the prospect of its soon terminating its labors was but a gloomy one. These committees met in the same room, and any information possessed by one could easily be communicated to the other.

The question was then taken on the first proposition to refer the report to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 18.

NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. BARNARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay and emoluments of Masters Commandant in the Navy of the United States; and, also, of allowing additional compensation to Lieutenants when acting as first Lieutenants of a ship of the line, frigate, or sloop of war, according to the rate of the vessel.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, introduced a bill to reduce the duty on imported sugar.

Mr. BROWN moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce. The motion was rejected—yeas 16, nays 25.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, it was then referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The bill for the adjustment of the claim of James Monroe, passed in the other House, was read a first time, and laid on the table until to-morrow, at the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, who wished time to prepare an amendment to it.

POST OFFICE INVESTIGATION.

The resolution of Mr. GRUNDY, declaring that the select committee, appointed to examine into the present condition of the Post Office Department, are not authorized to call witnesses who have been removed before them for the purpose of ascertaining the causes of their removal, being again taken up—

Mr. HOLMES rose, and resumed the remarks which he commenced when the subject was last under consideration. I confess, said Mr. H., that since our last adjournment, my surprise has been increased, rather than diminished, at the objection to the inquiry. What possible reason can there be why the Senate should not have an answer to this question—"for what cause or causes were you removed from office?" It cannot arise from a sympathy for the witness. If the answer would criminate him, he has a right to withhold it. The question is, nevertheless, proper, whether he can exculpate or is willing to criminate himself, or refuses to answer at all. In every judicial tribunal, a question which may possibly, or will probably, criminate the witness, is always proper, but the obligation to answer is another affair.

But here the witness does not object, but is willing to answer. Every obstacle in regard to the witness is, therefore, removed. Why, then, is this merely preliminary question to be refused?

Is the Postmaster General afraid of the answer? Has he been consulted, and does he think it most prudent to object? If so, there is strong ground to suspect him. What high-minded, honorable, and honest man would fear an answer to such a question? Is he afraid or ashamed that the people of the United States should know the principles by which he acts?

Is this objection without his consent? If so, it is surely using him unfairly; and, if it came from a political foe, might be just ground of complaint. But public opinion will, at any rate, ascribe this reluctance at inquiry to him. The resolution to trammel the inquiry comes from his personal and political friends, and it will be believed that it is by his consent, and at his request. Why, it will be inquired, do you suppress an answer to such a question? If this officer removed does not, in his answer, give the true cause, cannot you? Do you fear his perjury? You have the means to answer and detect him. Do you fear his truth? That is just what we want. A witness who has been Assistant Postmaster General thirty years, and against whom no official misconduct has been alleged, is not to be lightly esteemed. His testimony would be believed quite as soon as that of the Postmaster General himself.

I remember that an officer, a friend of mine, of high respectability, was accused of misconduct, and the charges were grave and serious. They were made to President Monroe at the close of his administration, and he left them to his successor. I expressed to Mr. Adams a strong belief of the innocence of my friend, and insisted that at least he ought to be heard in his own defence. To this request in his behalf the President assented—a commission was instituted to hear the parties and evidence. On my return home, I informed my friend that an inquiry was directed, at my request, at which he seemed dissatisfied, and to think it was unnecessary. From that time I began to suspect, and to regret that I had spoken so confidently to the President of his innocence. A full examination was had, the guilt proved, and the officer removed. I state this case, sir, to show that any apparent reluctance of the Postmaster General to submit to this examination, or any disposition to limit or restrict it, will be ground of suspicion against him before the American people.

But, say gentlemen, we are prejudging a case which we may be called to try as a high court of impeachment. We answer—our duties are legislative, executive, and judicial; and shall we refuse to perform one class of these duties, because it may conflict with the others? If we are never to perform legislation, lest by possibility we should meet with impeachable matter, there are few cases where we can act at all. In all this, however, our course is a very plain one. The framers of the constitution supposed the cases of impeachment would rarely occur, and they judged correctly. It was never expected or intended that this power should in the least control or restrain our legislative duties. In the course of inquiry into facts or conduct as a basis of legislation, we are never to anticipate high misdemeanors or impeachable matter; and it is the same with our executive duties. Suppose a district judge, while under impeachment in the other House, should be nominated to the Senate for a justice of the Supreme Court, must we not inquire into his qualifications, and consequently into the offence of which he stands charged? Or are we to translate him to the Supreme bench, without noticing the fact that he stands charged with official tyranny or corruption by the grand inquest of the nation? Sir, it appears to me there is in this an affectation of delicacy—a morbid sensibility—it is altogether new; the Senate has never hesitated to inquire into official misconduct, the better to enable them to perform legislative or executive duties. Let me instance a distinguished case—that of the Seminole war. A committee of the Senate was elected by ballot purposely to investigate the conduct of General Jackson in that war. This investigation involved the questions whether the commander of the army had violated the constitution of the United States, in waging war against a foreign Power; and, if so, whether he could be justified by orders from the President or Secretary of War. This was looking into impeachable matter which might involve the Secretary of War, and even the President; both, by the constitution, impeachable officers. The committee were not restricted in that case, but they did investigate, and made a report, which, in explicit and decisive terms, censures the conduct of the commanding general, and this at a time too when the public pulse beat high in his favor.

But, sir, this objection proves too much. There is scarcely a branch of the resolution of inquiry but is liable to the same. The present condition and entire management of this department gives us a broad commission indeed, and we cannot move a single step without being exposed to meet, by possibility, impeachable matter. The Senator from New Hampshire is willing for general, but not for particular inquiry as a basis of legislation. What can he mean? What would be general enough to suit him? Is an inquiry into the causes of removal too "particular?" How are we to inquire into "the entire management of the Post Office Department," without going into particulars? What prudent man would be satisfied with the concerns of his farm or plantation, without examining the detail?

The Senator from Tennessee insinuates strongly that the question which so much afflicts him and his friend, the Postmaster General, is "unbecoming, and calculated to convey false impressions." With all due deference to that Senator, I must take the liberty to be my own judge of propriety, subject, however, to the discipline which the rules of the Senate prescribe. Unbecoming! Not suitably respectful, I suppose, to the high dignity to whom it related! Unbecoming to inquire of a witness, why this dignitary did a certain official act? And has it come to this so soon? Sir, if decorum is to be properly graduated, let this clerk of the President, this new fledged head of a department, always solicit, and with all humility, that this Senate will charitably examine his case, and hear his reasons or his excuses. Calculated to convey false impressions! How? Impressions are made every where that these removals are persecutions. Are these impressions correct or false? If false, how can an inquiry into the true cause make them more false than they are?

These removals may have been made purposely to increase Executive power and patronage. If so, a bill like that of 1826 may be reported to correct this abuse. If, then, when no proscription in that department had been felt or even suspected, it was deemed necessary to prevent even the possibility of post office patronage, how much more is it now necessary to interpose, when every one opposed or even suspected is swept off as with a whirlwind? Then no post office patronage had been felt; even jealousy had scarcely imagined it. Then the Postmaster General had not subscribed to the proscription system. The late Postmaster General had never deemed it consistent with his official duty to require a political creed as a qualification for office. His inquiries were, "is he honest, capable, and faithful to the constitution?" Adams or Jackson were no questions with him; and had it not been for this his Roman virtue, he would still have been retained—the managers had need of his character and influence, but they were afraid of his integrity. To keep him, they made his department a constituent part of the cabinet, that his acts may be under its control. If they could get him in their team, they might use him to their purpose. But Mr. McLean had too much integrity and independence of character to become a machine to execute a system which he abhorred; he was not proscribed, but laid on the political shelf. Removals from office are to be made for the benefit of the people, for whose protection and safety these officers are established. If officers who were unworthy should have been retained, the error should be corrected; if officers worthy should have been displaced for the purpose of providing for others less qualified or vicious, why should not this mischief require a remedy? In the case before us, it may be that the removals in the Post Office Department have created the embarrassment—that there are embarrassments, we have no reason to doubt.

Would it not be well, then, to inquire into the causes, and, if these unprecedented removals should have been the causes, to prescribe a remedy?

It is most certain that since the present Postmaster General took charge of the department, its movements have been retrograde.

The late Postmaster General, Mr. McLean, states that, in 1828, the funds were, - $616,394
That the bad debts or unavailable funds were 284,289

Leaving of available funds at the disposal of the department,	-	332,105
In November, 1829, Mr. Barry has reduced these funds from $616,394 to	-	541,680
From which he deducts the unavailable funds reported by his predecessor,	-	$284,289
He then deducts further bad debts which he pretends to have discovered,	-	26,541
	-	310,830

Leaving a balance of, - $230,850

He then endeavors to give the cause of this diminution thus: he says Mr. McLean reduced this fund $101,256 03 in this way: he expended $74,714 15, and the residue, $26,541 88, is composed of unavailable, which Mr. McLean rendered as available funds. Now, were it true that Mr. McLean had reduced the funds $74,714 15, and had calculated $26,541 88 as good, which afterwards turned out to be bad, still is it fair to charge Mr. McLean with an expenditure of $101,256 03 over his income? But Mr. Barry's excess of expenditure over his income from July, 1829, to July, 1830, is $82,000

Add to this the sum expended by him from April to July, which he has included in the $74,714 15, charged to Mr. McLean's administration,	32,000
Add, moreover, as in the general appropriation bill,	60,640

And you will find that in the first five quarters of Mr. Barry's administration, he has expended over and above the income, 174,640

This is not all. Under the act of May, 1828, there were established two hundred and thirty additional post routes, at an expense, probably, of $40,000. More than half of this expense was, probably, incurred by Mr. McLean. These routes went into operation in January, 1829, and the profits of the first quarter did not fall due until April, and were, consequently, not paid in to Mr. McLean, but to Mr. Barry. He admits, also, that the income from the office has increased in the last year about $150,000. Now, the appropriation bill of the first year of Mr. Barry paid him about $10,000 more than it did in the last year of Mr. McLean; and with all these facilities, how does it happen that Mr. Barry has consumed, in five quarters, $114,000 of the Post Office funds over and above the income, received upwards of $10,000 from the general appropriation bill above the former year, the avails of the whole first quarter of the new routes established in May, 1828, $150,000 of additional revenue, and yet that the available funds, which, in 1828, were $332,000, should, in 1830, be down to $148,000? Should we this year appropriate no more than the $60,640, (the appropriation of the last,) and the draft upon the surplus fund should be no greater than for the year 1830, $82,000, the expenditure for 1831 would consume the whole amount of this surplus fund, and the department will be literally bankrupt. That is, for the first time since its establishment, it will fail to support itself.

Now, this aspect of affairs may be erroneous, but I can see no error. It presents at least a subject of inquiry. We would examine if these things are so! and, if they are, whether the changes of the officers may not have produced this effect. If Mr. McLean had retained six hundred bad officers, so bad that they deserved to be removed even without notice, and his successor had substituted as many faithful men in their stead, it would seem a little strange that while the officers were becoming better, the office was growing worse. In the first aspect of this affair, it would seem that in these exchanges we had made a bad bargain.

The late Postmaster General had never proscribed—and never injured of the party feelings of an officer or a candidate. Yet, it is believed that, when the present Chief Magistrate came into office, a decided majority of the postmasters were in his favor. I do not ascribe this majority to any sinister conduct of the late Postmaster General; it was probably because it was the settled plan of the supporters of General Jackson's election, that they took care, and were on the alert, to recommend one of his partisans to fill every vacant office. Take an example in Maine: in the county of York, my own county, there were thirty-one postmasters—Jackson twenty-three, Adams eight. One would have supposed that those an Adams elector, would have satisfied the most insatiable and vindictive persecutor; especially as the remaining eight were offices so insignificant, that they were scarcely worth holding, and most of them, probably, more trouble than profit. But no! the knife was applied even here: three of these have been removed, two resigned "to save the trouble," and one remains; and of the remaining two I am not certain. Thus we see in a single congressional district, the whole post office influence, with custom-house officers and all others, brought to bear on the freedom of election, and then the administration will boast of success! An army of officers let loose to dragoon the people, the election is carried, and then you stand upon public opinion. Now, this is the very evil that the inquiry is intended to remedy. It is the abuse of public opinion; it is the morbid state of the body politic, produced by this deleterious influence by a subsidized press and a corrupt post office, which we deprecate.

In New Hampshire there are two hundred and thirty-six postmasters, and between the 4th of March, 1829, and the 22d March, 1830, forty-five had been removed; and without any notice, as I am told, of the least complaint against them, except they would not obey your god, nor worship the image which ye have set up. It is reported to me, and from a source entitled to full credit, that a certain distinguished officer of the palace, upon whom this Senate has since stamped its veto, presented on one morning a proscription list containing twenty-five, with an order that they should be removed, and, without examination or scruple, they were all struck from the rolls at a single dash. Sir, it is said that the chief of the Cyclops, Polyphenus, would be satisfied with two full grown Greeks for his supper, including flesh, blood, and bones; but your Postmaster General must, to satisfy his maw, devour twenty-five Yankees at a breakfast! Only think! Insatiable! unconscionable! Twenty-five full blooded New Hampshire Yankees at a single meal! Such a monster can scarcely be found even in the regions of fiction; but this is a horrid reality.

But every thing is done now upon "high responsibility." This panoply of oppression and fraud is to shield the subordinate officers as well as the President. Every petty tyrant is to cover his crimes by this ægis. No, sir, the truth must be that neither the President nor his minions can give any good reason for these corrupt and corrupting measures, and they, therefore, have to resort to silence as their only defence against an indignant and insulted people. They know, and every one here knows, that the removals have been chiefly made to provide for partisans, and they are ashamed to acknowledge it. Sir, it must be so; for what rational man would not even volunteer his reasons, where his motives were just and honorable? A gentleman was waked in the night by some one in his cellar stealing his meat; he jumped out of bed, and went and opened his cellar door. It was all dark: he listened; all was still as death. "Who is there?" he inquired. No answer. "What are you doing in my cellar?" Not a word. "Why don't you speak?" "Why, faith, sir," replied the other, "it is because I don't know what to say." Now, these men have got into the people's cellar, and are making dreadful havoc with the meat, and they won't speak, because they don't know what to say. Last session we predicted that irresponsibility, which is the legitimate meaning of "high responsibility," would descend to the subordinate officers of the Executive departments; that espionage and proscription would be pursued with a corrupt and cruel hand; and, not being a subject of inquiry, it would be beyond the people's reach, because it was beyond their means of knowledge. You see, then, the principle which this resolution involves—a principle fit only for tyrants—a rod fit only for slaves. Pass this resolution, and you make proscription a legitimate work. Pass this resolution, and it is fair to infer that each petty officer of the President will become a partisan tyrant, beyond the reach of the representatives of the people, and answerable to no human tribunal.

When ambition is set upon its purpose, the end is always made to sanctify the means. When Constantinople was taken by the Turks, Irene, a beautiful Grecian lady, of an illustrious family, fell into the hands of Mahomet the Second, then in the prime of youth and glory. His savage heart was subdued by her charms; he made her his wife, and secluded himself with her, denying access even to his ministers. The soldiers, accustomed to activity and plunder, began to murmur, and the infection soon spread even among the commanders. The Pacha Mustapha was the first to acquaint his master of stories told publicly to the prejudice of his glory. The tyrant, after an awful pause, formed his resolution: he ordered Mustapha to assemble the army, and then retired to Irene's apartment. "Never before," says the historian, "did that princess appear so charming; never before was the prince so apparently kind and affectionate." He ordered her maidens to dress her in the most splendid and costly attire—led her into the midst of the army, and, taking off her veil, demanded of his officers if they had ever beheld such a beauty? Then drawing his cimeter, and seizing her by her locks, he severed her head from her body at one stroke! Then, turning to his grandees, with eyes wild and furious, with the gasping head in one hand, and the bloody sword in the other—"This sword," he exclaimed, "when it is my will, knows how to cut the bands of love!" Thus does a mad ambition extinguish all the tender sympathies and endearing charities of social and domestic life. Your sword of proscription, regardless of them all, is now brandished, reeking with blood. The charms of virtue, the ties of friendship, the sufferings of revolutionary patriotism, are no protection, no security against this relentless monster, proscription.

And rivals, sir, when they can agree in a distribution of power, will each claim to be allowed his proscription list. The triumvirate agreed to divide the Roman Empire, and each to take his share—I do not allude to the first triumvirate, composed of Julius Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus: I mean the last—Lepidus, Mark Antony, and Octavius. It was concluded to meet on an island in the Rhine to settle the compact. Each was to be protected by a selected guard, and such is the jealousy of rival politicians, that, in this case, the island must first be searched, to ascertain if assassins were lurking there; next, each of their persons must be examined, to see if there were daggers concealed in their clothes. Finding all safe in these particulars, they proceeded to divide the empire. Both Antony and Octavius considered Lepidus a sort of dead weight, a millstone about their neck; and, to get rid of him, they assigned him the West, including Spain, where the Roman authority was very precarious. Mark Antony's share was the North, including Gaul; and Octavius took the South, including Africa, the islands, and the south part of Italy, embracing Rome.

This being settled, each presented his proscription list of those who were to become the victims of this very disinterested, patriotic distribution of the republic. When Octavius saw Cicero, his old friend and preceptor, stand at the head of Antony's list, his youthful heart was horror struck, and he vehemently and peremptorily protested against the barbarous deed. But all would not do; it was a sine qua non, and ambition at last yielded to the demand; the lists were all confirmed, and, in consequence, there were assassinated in one night three hundred Senators, and two thousand Roman Knights! Proscription here is not yet quite so bloody, nor do I know that each of any triumvirate here has presented his list. In looking round us, however, it would not, I think, require a very fertile fancy to find an analogy to this triumvirate to which I have referred. You recollect the catastrophe there; I express no wish in regard to the result here. I should prefer that some Brutus should be found to succeed against the whole coalition. But if not, if the result is to be the same, and young Octavius is to subdue his rivals, and to become the Augustus, I should rejoice, at least, that the temple of Janus was to be shut.

Sir, when this resolution was offered, I was reading the important news which I had just received of the revolution in Poland, and was exulting in the glorious event. In a half reverie, my mind was ruminating on the vicissitudes which that gallant people had experienced; the barbarous and despotic partition, when the unfortunate Stanislaus was compelled by the Cazarina, Maria Theresa, and Frederick, to surrender the best part of his dominions. I then glanced on more modern times, when another partition had completed the catastrophe. I thought, too, of a Kosciusko, a Pulaski, and a Poniatowski. In this state of mind, I heard read a resolution from a republican Senator, going to establish a principle that a subordinate executive officer was not to answer an inquiry into his official conduct. The contrast was so impressive, that, I confess, a chill struck me to the heart. When all Europe is alive to popular rights, and the people are every where demanding a surrender or restriction of Executive power, that not only we the people, and we the representatives of the people, but we the Senate of the United States, "most potent, grave, and reverend seignors," are to go in a body and surrender our liberties, and those of our constituents, not merely at the foot of the throne, but at the feet of a petty subdelegate!

Mr. President, it is in vain to expect a full exposition of the affairs of this department—and I now forewarn my friend, the chairman, that his honest zeal will be disappointed. I have seen enough already to convince me that a full and fair report is not to be had. If the Postmaster General asks for limits to the investigation, his friends on the committee will indulge him, and eventually he will succeed where he wishes in shutting out inquiry. In this, I cast no imputation upon any of the committee or the Senate—the effect which I predict may perhaps arise from an honest, though, I fear, a premature confidence in the intelligence and fidelity of that officer. I repeat, a full and fair report of the entire management of this department is not to be expected this session, if ever. Without the inquiry into the causes of removal, it is impossible.

Sir, I have done. In times when some New England States indicated a wish to nullify the acts of the General Government, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] and myself took sweet counsel together, and reprobated such infatuation. Now, when Georgia and South Carolina are still more infatuated, he abandons the old ground. Would that this were all. But it seems to me he has come to this absurdity—Independent States beyond federal control, and a federal Executive above responsibility! "Oh world, thy slippery turns!"

Mr. GRUNDY again rose. The Senator from Maine, said Mr. G., has thought proper, in his concluding remarks, to remind me of our ancient association, and of that period when we struggled together in behalf of our country. It is true, sir, there was a time when that Senator and myself held full political communion together, and stood side by side against those whom we considered hostile to the interests of our country. But these times have passed by. Men and things have changed; and, perhaps, no two men now stand more apart and farther separated from each other. This was announced at the last session, when, in the presence of this Senate, a solemn dissolution and severance of our political connexion took place.* I then apprehended, and I now see with sorrow,

* This has allusion to the following extract from Mr. Grundy's speech on Mr. Foot's resolution, at the last session:

"The Senate will excuse me for saying a few words in relation to the partnership made up by the Boston parson, during the last war, and now added to by the gentleman that his senior partner has acquired an entire ascendancy over him; and by this means I account for many things which I now see and hear, so entirely inconsistent with that gentleman's former political course. Our separation must be perpetual; and I can only now look back with pride and pleasure at what he once was, while I contemplate with pain and grief what he now is.

Before I proceed to answer the arguments of gentlemen, the Senate will indulge me in presenting to them a true account of the fiscal operations of the Post Office Department, so far as may be necessary to a right understanding of the conduct of its present presiding officer. The charge against him is, that in the last fiscal year, ending the 1st July, 1830, he has expended one hundred and fifty thousand dollars more than has been expended in the same time at any former period. This is a fact; and its existence is eagerly seized, and presented as evidence of a profligate waste of the public money. If the fact stood alone, and unaccompanied by any explanation, it might be entitled to some consideration; but when it shall be seen that this expenditure has been produced by contracts not made by the present incumbent, but by his predecessor—contracts not improvidently made, but made advantageously and beneficially for the country—when it shall appear that portions of this money have been expended in increasing mail facilities, in changing horse to stage routes, in accelerating the mails from twice and three times a week to daily mails, through the great arteries of the country, and extending it to every newly created seat of justice in the Union; and when it shall also appear that this increased expenditure has been accompanied by a corresponding revenue to the department, it would seem to me that a sense of justice should induce the gentlemen on the other side to suspend, at least, a portion of their censure.

The report which the committee expect from the department will show the original contracts, and the increased labor imposed on the contractors, and the additional sums agreed to be given by the department for the additional duties required: and it is a fact highly creditable to the Postmaster General, that a far less sum, in the aggregate, is now allowed, than the law warranted him in giving.

I will now proceed to show to the Senate a history of the expenditure complained of. For the year ending 1st July, from Maine, which makes it to consist of James Madison, Felix Grundy, his Satanic Majesty, and John Holmes.

"I was honored too much when my name was inserted in the title of the firm. I never had, nor have I now, capital or capacity for business sufficient to entitle me to such distinction; and, therefore, in the new arrangement about to be made, my name will not be inserted, either in the title of the firm, or upon the sign-board. Mr. Madison has become old and rich; for an honest and well-earned fame is a politician's wealth. He has retired from business, and Andrew Jackson has taken his place; the business will, hereafter, be conducted under the name and style of Andrew Jackson and Company. Of this firm I will be an humble and unnamed partner. The gentleman from Maine will not assist in conducting the business of this firm, and the third person named has a violent antipathy to it. Therefore, the best thing that can be done, is to dissolve the partnership, and let the two characters last named establish a new firm, under the name and style of —, [meaning the Devil and John Holmes.] In making this division, great reliance is placed on the many excellent qualities and superlative virtues of the gentleman from Maine, which will enable him to keep the senior member of the firm in order, should he prove refractory. To this dissolution of the old firm, and the establishment of the two new ones, I call all these Senators to bear testimony."

Post Office Investigation.

1828, the expenditures exceeded the receipts $25,015 85. For the year ending 1st July, 1829, the expenditures exceeded the receipts $74,714 15. And this is alleged as cause of accusation against the Postmaster General. Let it be recollected, that the present Postmaster General came into office on the 6th day of April, 1829, and had made no contracts, payments for which could have fallen due on the 1st July, 1829, every contract having been made by his predecessor. He was merely fulfilling prior engagements, and is entitled neither to censure nor praise for the effects of contracts made before he came into office. The excess of expenditure for the year ending on 1st July, 1830, was $82,124 85. For the first half of this year, the whole transportation of the mail was under contracts made by Judge McLean; and for the last half of the year, three-fourths of the preceding contracts continued, the western contracts only having terminated. It should be noticed that the expenditures for the second half year of 1829 were $948,366 74; and the receipts in the same period $892,827 60; producing an excess of expenditures for that half year of $55,539 14. The expenditures for the first half year of 1830 were $984,341 21; the receipts for the same period $957,755 50; leaving an excess for the last half year of $26,585 71; and it appears from the report at the commencement of the present session, that the excess of this last half year was actually but $17,019 16; a portion of the current expenditures that were made in the preceding year having been entered in the accounts of the first half of the year 1830—apparently increasing the excess of this half year to $26,585 71. Thus it appears, that in the first half year, after the contracts of the present Postmaster General began to operate, there was a great saving to the Government. I do not urge this as cause of censure against the predecessor of the present incumbent. He was an able and upright officer; he made valuable improvements in the department; and it is no reflection upon him to say, that his improvements have been improved upon, and that others have originated with the present head of that department, calculated to produce much public benefit. As an evidence that the condition of the department has improved since he came into office, I will merely state the fact, that the whole amount of postages from the 1st July, 1828, to the 1st July, 1829, was $1,707,418 42; and the amount of postages from the 1st July, 1829, to the 1st July, 1830, is $1,850,583 10, giving an increase in the first year of $143,164 68. This is an unprecedented increase of revenue in the history of this department.

Notwithstanding these facts are known and exhibited to public view, and to the inspection of gentlemen on the other side, still they say this Executive Department is going to ruin. Facts appear to have no effect on their minds; arithmetical demonstration produces no conviction, so determined do they seem on effecting the destruction of this officer. This investigation has produced a very different impression on my mind. I viewed the present Postmaster General chiefly as a man of general talents, an able and eloquent advocate; but I now perceive him to be the practical man—the able man of business—capable of grasping, with ease, the vast system, and comprehending the intricate machinery of this department, and of directing its energies to the greatest benefit of the country.

There is now of available funds at the disposal of the department, the sum of $148,724 22. As a further evidence of the increasing prosperity of this department, I will read from the report accompanying the President's message, so much as will show some of the improvements which have been made by the present Postmaster General:

“Between the 1st of July, 1829, and the 1st of July, 1830, the transportation of the mail was increased, in stages, equal to 755,767 miles a year; on horseback and in sulky, 67,104 miles a year; making an annual increase of transportation, equal to 812,871 miles a year, beyond the amount of any former period.”

The annual transportation of the mail on the 1st of July last, was about 9,531,577 miles in stages; and the whole yearly transportation in coaches, steamboats, sulkies, and on horseback, amounted at that period to about 14,500,000 miles.

The existing contracts for transporting the mail in the Southern division, embracing the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and the Territory of Florida, will expire with the current year. In the renewal of these contracts, provision has been made for extending stage accommodations over 1502 miles of post roads, on which the mail has hitherto been carried on horses only, or in sulkies, and on which the annual transportation in stages will, from the 1st of January next, amount to 278,656 miles. The frequency of trips will also be increased on 894 miles of existing stage routes, to the annual increase of 138,358 miles; making, together, an increase of stage transportation of the mail, from the 1st of January next, of 417,014 miles a year.

Provision is also made for the more frequent transportation of the mail on different routes, as follows:

Increase of trips on horse routes, 31,824 miles a year; increase of trips on existing routes, changed from horse to stage routes, 118,456 miles a year; increase of trips on stage routes, 138,358 miles a year; making, together, a total increase of 288,628 miles of transportation of mails in a year, beyond the amount of present transportation in that division, besides the improvement of substituting stages for horse transportation.

Among these improvements are included a line of stages from Edenton to Washington, North Carolina; from Newbern to Wilmington, North Carolina; a steamboat line from Wilmington to Smithville; and a line of stages from Smithville, North Carolina, to Georgetown, South Carolina; all of which are to run twice a week each way. These arrangements will complete the regular communication, by steamboats and stages, between Baltimore, Maryland, and Charleston, South Carolina; along the seaboard, by way of Norfolk, Virginia, Elizabeth City, Edenton, Washington, Newbern, Wilmington, and Smithville, North Carolina, and Georgetown, South Carolina; an accommodation desired alike by the public and the department.

Provision is also made for expediting the mail on many important routes; among which is the whole route between this place and Fort Mitchell, via Richmond, Virginia, Raleigh, North Carolina, Columbia, South Carolina, and Milledgeville, Georgia; which line will be traversed in two days less time than at present; so that the mail will run from this city to New Orleans in thirteen days after the 1st of January next.

Allowing the average expense of transportation, by horse or sulky, to be five cents per mile, and by stages to be thirteen cents per mile, which is about the mean rate paid in the Southern division, the value of these improvements, exclusive of the value of increased expedition, will be as follows:

Annual amount of transportation changed from horses to stages, 278,656 miles, at 8 cents per mile, (the mean difference,) -	22,292 48
To be added for increased number of trips on the same, amounting, annually, to 118,456 miles, at 5 cents per mile, -	5,922 80
Increased number of trips on former stage routes, amounting, annually, to 138,358 miles, at 13 cents per mile, -	17,985 54
Increased number of trips on horse and sulky routes, amounting, annually, to 31,824 miles, at 5 cents per mile, -	1,591 20

Making the total annual value of the improvements, - - - $47,793 02

Post Office Investigation.

[SENATE.]

The contracts have been made for the ensuing four years from the first of January next, including all these improvements, at a sum less than the amount now paid for transporting the mails in that division, by 25,047 87
To this sum add the estimated value of the improvements, as before stated, 47,793 02

And the actual saving to the department in the renewing of the contracts, will amount, annually, to 72,840 89

Besides the very considerable amount gained in the increased expedition of the mails on many routes of great interest to the community, the value of which cannot be well estimated.

In this saving in the expense of the contracts, and the additional revenue which may be anticipated from the improvements they secure, together with the general increase of postages, which is still progressive, will be seen a foundation for the belief which has been expressed, that the current revenue of the department for the succeeding year will be sufficient for its disbursements.

I have thus shown to the Senate the condition of the fiscal concerns of this department, and the improvements which have been made in the transportation of the mail.

I now approach a subject more intimately connected with the inquiry before the Senate. The removals of postmasters, called by the gentleman from Maine "proscription," a word which, from long habit and frequent use, he pronounces better than any man in this nation. There are about eight thousand five hundred postmasters in the United States; and, since this administration came into power, which has been near two years, about five hundred have been removed. Let us now see whether there be not unquestionable causes of removal, which may properly have produced as great a result as this. If a postmaster should commit any depredation on the mail, he surely ought to be removed, although the gentleman from Maine should exclaim "proscription." Should a postmaster violate the secrecy of correspondence, which some men have done, the Postmaster General ought not to be deterred from removing him by the cry of "proscription." The same fate should await all delinquents in paying their dues; likewise those who fail to render their accounts, or who abuse the franking privilege; and if, for any of these causes, removals take place, the gentleman from Maine entertains the Senate with his "proscription." Fraudulent exactions of postage—concealing or detaining letters, newspapers, or pamphlets—constitute just causes of removal; and if they are made, we hear the gentleman from Maine cry out "proscription!" Habits of intemperance disqualify a man for the office of postmaster; and, although temperance societies have done much in removing this destroyer of the human race from our land, I would still ask, if there be no drunkards in Maine? And should I be answered, that these worthy societies have entirely succeeded in the East, we are not quite so fortunate in the West, although they have made promising and successful progress. Still this vice in some degree prevails; and should a postmaster be seen staggering and reeling to his office, so blind that he could not see a letter, and he should be removed, the gentleman from Maine, unconsciously and from habit, would cry out "proscription." Insulting or unaccommodating deportment to persons having business at the office—habitual carelessness and inattention to the duties of the station, constitute just cause of removal; incompetency—refusing to comply with the standing regulations of the department—employing assistants of bad character—the commission of crimes—a dissolute course of life—such conduct as is calculated to destroy public confidence in the office, these are just causes of removal; and if a postmaster be removed for any of these, another victim is added to the gentleman's "proscription." The remote residence of the postmaster from the office—the refusal to give new bonds when required—being engaged in pursuits of a disqualifying character; such as will cause long periods of absence from the office—having too considerable a correspondence for the postage to be withdrawn from the revenue—being concerned in a mail contract—the inconvenient location of the office—all these render removals proper; and yet the present Postmaster General cannot act upon such cases as these without hearing the political clamor of "proscription!" And men should, in some instances, be removed to obtain the services of those better qualified to discharge the duties of the appointment. It has happened under every administration; it has happened under this, and will occur under every succeeding one, that from misrepresentation some improper removals and appointments will take place. Taking into view all these causes which I have enumerated, is it not rather matter of wonder, that, in the course of nearly two years, but a few more than five hundred out of eight thousand five hundred have been removed. My apprehension is, that even yet there remain among the subordinate agents of this department some men unworthy of their places. I confidently hope that the present Postmaster General will go on, until none shall be continued in the employment of the department, but men of worth and integrity, and that he will not be deterred from his duty by the cry of "proscription."

The power of appointing his deputies, is given by law to the Postmaster General solely. What right of supervision has the Senate over his discretion in these matters? If they have any, it must result from the claim that the functions of the Executive are to be performed in subordination to this body. This is neither in accordance with the theory, the practice, nor the principles of the constitution of this Government.

I will now show to the Senate some of the effects of this "proscription," which, in the poetical language of the gentleman from Maine, "makes the land turn pale." It will be recollected that, on the 1st May, 1829, the postmaster in this city was removed, and Dr. Jones—who is no Midas, at whose touch every thing turns to gold—was appointed his successor. According to the report on my table, the nett proceeds of the office, immediately preceding this change, for one year, was $2,803 25, and in the first year under Dr. Jones's management, the nett proceeds amounted to $7,943 11 producing a clear gain in one year of $5,139 86. Yes, sir; this single post office, under the present administration, without the aid of additional commerce, or any unusual assemblage of citizens, has produced a profit in one year to the Government, of the sum which I have quoted, and this is "proscription." I call it reform—call it by what name you may, it has produced results beneficial to the country; and the profits, since the year which I have mentioned, have shown that the increase is not of a temporary character.

Another effect produced by what the gentleman calls "proscription," may be exhibited. There are not half so many new cases of delinquent postmasters as at former periods; there is a reduction of the number of delinquencies since the first of January, 1825, of more than one-half; and this reduction has been sensibly experienced within the last year. This must be owing to some adequate cause. I know of no other to which it can be ascribed, but the terror of "proscription," which teaches, that for failures in the discharge of their duty, they will be removed from office. When I see such effects produced, I shall not be dismayed by the term "proscription;" for my country profits, though the incumbent lose his place. We shall hear no more of such losses as $10,000 in a single post office, as in the case of Fowler.

A charge has been exhibited in the committee against the Postmaster General of indebtedness to the Government; and Abraham Bradley, the dismissed assistant Postmaster General, has been examined to support this charge.

SENATE.]

Post Office Investigation.

Although his testimony does not tend to establish the fact for which the witness was introduced, it develops some facts of a highly interesting character to the community. I have the minutes of his deposition before me, subject to the inspection of every member, and I beg the attention of the Senate while I relate the substance of it upon this point.

He states that, many years ago, John Fowler, of Lexington, Kentucky, was appointed postmaster at that place; that he gave bond, with James Morrison and others as his sureties; that, he became a delinquent to a very large amount, and then gave a new bond, with W. T. Barry and five others as his sureties; that after the execution of the new bond, he paid up regularly, or nearly so, what fell due at the end of each quarter, amounting in the whole to all that was due from the time the new bond was executed, until he was removed from office. I will here remark, that I am authorized to say, by a respectable man now in the city, that Mr. Fowler, long before the surrender of the old bond, of which I shall presently speak, and before the department had applied the payments to either bond, directed the Postmaster General, Mr. Meigs, to apply all the payments made after the execution of the new bond, to the new account of his receipts.

Mr. Bradley further states, in his deposition, that there was no credit given on the old bond—that there was no application of the payments made to either bond, in any of the books of the department—that there was nothing but a general account current between Mr. Fowler and the department, in the books of the office—that the old bond was delivered up to James Morrison, after a sufficient sum had been paid, subsequent to the execution of the new bond, to satisfy the amount due under the old one, and this was done without the knowledge of the sureties in the new bond. Mr. Bradley does not expressly state whether the then Postmaster General directed the surrender of the old bond or not; but it is due to the memory of Mr. Meigs to state that he was a correct and honest man, and that there are letters of his still in existence, in which he stated that he had no knowledge of the manner in which the bond was abstracted from the office. It does not concern the present question to decide by whom this bond was surrendered. The great and important fact is established, that the bond was surrendered by the department to one of the sureties in it. Such are the acts which make a "land turn pale." Here is an official bond—not securing alone to the Government what might be due upon it, but also the good behavior, for the time of service, of the postmaster, and constituting the security to which any party, injured by his misconduct in office, was to look for indemnity—surrendered up. And this has been done contrary to law, and the uniform usage of the office. But one case besides this had occurred during the thirty years' continuance of the witness in that office. Why was the surrender of this bond applied for by Major Morrison? Certainly because he was afraid of his legal liability under it. Why was it surrendered? It must be because the person surrendering it was willing to release Major Morrison, with a view of throwing the delinquency which had occurred prior to the execution of the new bond, upon its sureties. The effect produced by the surrender of the old bond, we can all see. The department has lost ten thousand dollars. Major Morrison lived and died a wealthy man, able to discharge all his pecuniary responsibilities. Many years since, Major Barry and others were sued on this bond; the court decided that the bond had no legal obligatory force; a new trial was granted, and the suit was dismissed. This, it is admitted, constitutes no legal bar to the commencement of a new action; but the fact that the late Postmaster General did not commence suit during his continuance in office, which was several years after the dismissal of the first suit, furnishes a strong argument against the validity of the claim, from the opinion of the department itself, when it was under the management of an individual of high legal attainments, whose interest in the subject, if he had any, was only to collect the debt due to his department. Upon the facts thus stated, who can pronounce the present Postmaster General a debtor to the Government?

I am aware of the legal doctrine which may be urged on the other side; which is, that if one individual be indebted to another upon two bonds, and payments be made by the debtor to the creditor, without any direction on the part of the debtor, to which bond the payment should be applied, the creditor may elect to which he will give the credit. This is admitted to be the law, where no other individuals are interested than the debtor and creditor; but I should very much doubt whether a court and jury could be found in this country, when the question was between different sets of sureties, who would permit the delinquency which had accrued during the liability of one to be thrown upon others subsequently given, when no kind of delinquency had occurred during the last obligation. In the case of public officers, this would be particularly unjust; the legal effect of the condition of the last bond was, that Fowler should pay punctually, at the end of every quarter, the public money received by him in the preceding quarter: this he had done, and the condition was complied with. Can it be believed that, in this state of things, a court would be warranted in giving judgment against the new sureties for the delinquency which accrued prior to the execution of the new bond; more especially as it can be shown that Fowler directed the application of the payments to the new bond, and this long before the department had applied the money to either? I had thought, sir, the judiciary of the country to be the proper tribunal before which to try a question of indebtedness. The Government has sought to render Major Barry liable before that tribunal, and the suit failed. From the facts now disclosed, it always must fail. Although the Government, by its acquiescence, seems to have abandoned the claim, and this long before the present administration came into power, yet, for party purposes, and to gratify the feelings of a dismissed officer, Mr. Barry is to be denounced as a defaulter, and unworthy of public confidence. Whenever it shall be shown that Major Barry, the present Postmaster General, or either of the Assistants, Colonel Gardner or Major Hobbie, shall have surrendered the official bonds of postmasters, I will not stand here as their defender. No, sir; the clerk of a court who should surrender an insolvent marshal's or sheriff's bond, for the purpose of favoring and releasing the sureties, would stand in a light equally favorable with me. Such conduct, practised by whom it may be, is a high misdemeanor, and merits expulsion from office.

Mr. President: When men set out resolved to find fault, they seldom permit themselves to be disappointed. If facts fail, imagination supplies their place. I cannot, in any other way, account for the censure thrown by the gentlemen from Delaware and Maine on the Postmaster General, for not having answered the interrogatories transmitted by the committee to the department in December last. The Senate will recollect what was said by those gentlemen on that subject; but did any Senator suppose from what they said, that at that moment they had in their possession a letter from the Postmaster General, which gives the most satisfactory reasons for the delay, and which letter had been in the possession of the chairman for several days? I will take the liberty of reading that letter to the Senate, that they may judge whether the Postmaster General be culpable, or the complaint of the gentlemen be without cause.

Mr. GRUNDY here read as follows:

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Jan. 31, 1831.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 18th and of the 27th instant.

FEB. 7, 1831.]

Post Office Investigation.

[SENATE.]

"The preparation of the statements necessary to a reply to the interrogatories formerly submitted by the committee, was immediately commenced, and has been uninterruptedly prosecuted by the department. It has required not only the application of all the disposable force of the department, delaying some of its important current business, but has employed unremittingly several additional clerks. When the work is completed, it will be forthwith submitted to the committee.

"I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

"W. T. BARRY.

"Hon Mr. CLAYTON, Chairman, &c."

This letter tells the gentlemen why the interrogatories sent by the committee have not been answered, and still they urge that this officer has not, in this particular, done his duty. He has also been censured for not making his report in obedience to the call made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BURNET.] On this morning we have received that report, containing upwards of 6,000 pages; and surely, after gentlemen have heard the reasons assigned by the Postmaster General for the delay, their lips will be sealed upon this subject.

The gentleman from Maine has expressed a hope that the objection involved in this resolution did not come from the Postmaster General; but admonishes us that the public will say that it came from that quarter. I cannot tell what the people in Maine may be taught to say on this subject. I shall say to the people of Tennessee, that I made this objection upon my own judgment and responsibility; and to prevent him from falling into an error, I will now state, that although the Postmaster General and myself have been in company, both before and since this question has been agitated, I have never heard him express or intimate a wish, or opinion, on the subject. It is argued on the other side, that as the committee have sent inquiries to the Postmaster General, asking him to assign the general causes of removal, that therefore the individuals removed ought in justice to be heard. The committee have not inquired of the Postmaster General why any particular officer has been removed; but if this were even so, is it an argument that should be brought to bear against my friend from New Hampshire and myself? We objected to that course, and were overruled; and now a wrong committed by the gentlemen themselves is insisted on as a justification of a still greater error. It is said that the contingent expenses of the department have been increased. This may be true, and the gentlemen themselves cannot be ignorant of the causes which have produced it. There are not clerks in the department sufficient to perform the ordinary and current business; and these large calls for information upon the department create a necessity of employing other clerks to perform the additional labor. The very report laid on your table this morning must have cost several thousand dollars, and the calls made by the committee will cost several thousand dollars more. These form a portion of the contingent expenses of the department. I cannot believe it fair for gentlemen themselves to occasion the expenditure of money, and then raise a complaint that it is spent. Although I am perfectly willing to see the public money expended for beneficial purposes, and especially for the dissemination of useful information among the people, I cannot discern any valuable purpose that is to be answered by the copies of the 1,400 bonds, under the call of the gentleman from Ohio, this morning received by the Senate from that department; none of them will ever be read, either by the Senator, or any other man in the community.

As to the suggestion that the committee have refused to send to Virginia for witnesses to testify in relation to the great southern contract, these are the facts: A citizen of Virginia addressed a letter to a Senator from that State, complaining of the department for the manner in which that contract was made. He, as was his duty, handed over that letter to the committee. The witnesses were named in the letter, and a suggestion also that their affidavits had been taken. A proposition was made to send for the witnesses; this was not refused; but it was suggested, and concurred in by a majority of the committee, that before that step was taken, application should be made at the department for the purpose of seeing whether the affidavits of the witnesses were not there, and such other information as might be satisfactory; or at least enable the committee to act more understandingly in making the investigation. The chairman and myself were directed to call at the office and make the examination. I took care to mention to him that I would attend him at any time he should name, when the Senate was not in session. He has not found it convenient to this day to call on me for the purpose of discharging this duty. I have called at the office: I have seen the papers, and they contain a most ample vindication of the department. After the contract was made, the whole subject was laid before the President of the United States at the instance of those who were dissatisfied. The affidavits of the witnesses named in the letter referred to were taken; and, after a patient and full investigation, the President decided that the Postmaster General had acted correctly. If the gentlemen on the other side were anxious to obtain full and correct information in relation to the transactions of this department, why have they not pursued the course I have so often pressed upon them, that the committee should go to the department and examine into all its transactions and doings? I have assured them that I was authorized by the Postmaster General to say that, should such a course be deemed advisable, every thing should be thrown open to the inspection of the committee; that he, his assistants, and clerks, would afford every facility and give every assistance in their power to the committee. By proceeding in this way we could acquire a correct knowledge of the condition of the department, and how it is conducted. This course of proceeding is declined, perhaps wisely, as thereby every pretext of complaint might be removed, and the gentleman from Maine would be so fastened down by facts, that even his fruitful imagination could not furnish materials for accusation.

The gentleman from Maine has stated that in his own county there are thirty-one postmasters; that eight of them were friendly to the election of Mr. Adams; and of these seven have been proscribed; and this, with him, constitutes just ground of complaint. The people from that quarter differ from him in opinion. Since these occurrences took place, the people of that congressional district, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, have elected a representative favorable to this administration; and in his own county and town, the votes have been cast in favor of a senator and representative to the State Legislature of the same description. If, therefore, the gentleman's complaints are to be tried by the voice of his neighbors, the verdict is against him. The Senator from Maine has said that this voracious Postmaster General has, in the State of New Hampshire, devoured six full blooded Yankees at a single meal. [Mr. HOLMES here interrupted Mr. GRUNDY, and said he did not say six, but twenty-five: Mr. GRUNDY proceeded.] This shows most strikingly the difference between a man of imagination and one who deals in sober realities and facts. I had been lashing up my poor imagination in pursuit of the gentleman from Maine, and could scarcely arrive at six, when he with ease, (such is the power of his fancy,) can reach twenty-five. Twenty-five full blooded Yankees have then been devoured by the Postmaster General at a single meal. If this is to be taken literally, all I can say is, that he is a man of bad taste and strong stomach, for methinks I sometimes see one, the very sight of whom is enough for me. If this expression is to be taken figuratively, and the gentleman only means that the Postmaster General has put them aside, and removed them a distance from him, as unfit to be associates with him in the administration of his department, then he may have acted in good taste and no furtherance of the public interest.

The Senate will not expect me to notice the poetry of the gentleman from Maine. My business is with dollars and cents—post offices, and post roads, and this is a poor subject for poetical display. It requires the imagination and genius of the gentleman from Maine to strew flowers over post roads at this inclement season of the year. I will, however, notice his delicate and classical story respecting the public “meat cellar,” and make the true application. As I understand it, this “cellar” belongs to the people of the United States; the gentleman and his friends were once placed in it to take care of it; the people were of opinion that they were not faithful sentinels; they turned them out, and have placed others in, who they believed were more faithful, and the gentleman and his friends are now endeavoring to break in, but the people will not let them. The gentleman further remarks, that when men are seeking for power, any means are resorted to for the accomplishment of their object. Did the gentleman recollect that it might be said that he was illustrating the truth of his doctrine by his own example, and that the tendency of his whole conduct in this whole proceeding went to show that there were no morals in politics? The gentlemen exclaim there will be no report made by this committee. If there be none, the fault shall be theirs, not ours. I hope a report will be made, one that will silence calumny and seal the lips of slander. I have admitted that by means of misrepresentation some men have been removed, whom it would have been better to have retained, and the gentleman from Maine may have known some one instance of that kind; and such is his imagination, that whenever he hears of a removal, let the cause of removal be what it may, he supposes that it has been done improperly, and from a spirit of proscription. He reasons like the medical student; he was taken by his preceptor to see a sick patient; the patient had become worse, and the doctor charged the family with their having given him eggs to eat, which had increased his illness; the fact was admitted; the doctor again prescribed and returned home; the student was curious to know how his preceptor had come to the knowledge of the fact that his patient had eaten eggs; the preceptor told him he had seen the shells under the bed. On the next day the student was sent to see the same patient, and found the man dying, and informed his preceptor that the man had eaten a horse; the preceptor said that was impossible; the student persisted in it, and upon being asked the reason why he thought so, he said he had seen a bridle under the bed; and whenever the gentleman from Maine sees a bridle, or a change of postmaster, a horse or a Yankee, in his imagination, has been devoured.

The gentleman charges this administration with flinching. He who is now at the head of this Government never learned the art of flinching, nor will he permit those who act under him, either in the field or cabinet, to do so; and the gentleman will learn this, should the Chief Magistrate entertain the same opinion I do in relation to the call made on the Postmaster General to assign the causes which have produced the removals of postmasters. I have said that I thought that neither the Senate nor the committee have the constitutional right to make this demand. Should the Chief Magistrate think so, of one thing I am certain, that he who never suffered his own private rights, or the rights of his country, to be invaded, will not permit an encroachment upon the rights of his official station.

Sir, we cannot mistake the object which gentlemen have in view; they cannot desire to sacrifice the Postmaster General, a man so amiable and honest, an officer so able, faithful, and efficient, as he is. Their aim is higher; through him they wish to reach the man who keeps them out of power and place; but in this they will fail. “The gods take care of Cato,” and a just Providence, and an honest people will protect and defend the defender of his country against all unjust assaults of his enemies.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

DUTY ON ALUM SALT.

Mr. BENTON rose to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the duty on alum salt. He said that this kind of salt was not manufactured in the United States; that it was indispensable in curing provisions, and had to be bought at whatever price it might cost. He said that the uses of salt, and the injury done to the community by taxing it, had commanded the attention of the British Parliament, and occasioned a committee to be appointed in the year 1818, whose labors were a monument to their honor, and a title to the gratitude of their country. They had taken the examinations in writing of more than seventy witnesses, comprehending men of the first character in every walk of life, of whom he would mention Lord Kenyon, Sir Thomas Bernard, Sir John Sinclair, Arthur Young, and Sir John Stanley, whose testimony, with the reports of the committee, extended to four hundred folio pages. He would read some parts of their testimony, and believed that the Senate would perform a great service to the American people if they would direct a committee to make an abstract of the whole, and publish some thousand copies for distribution among the people.

Mr. B. then began to read a part of the extracts which he had made, when he was interrupted by Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, who made several points of order, one of which was, that Mr. B.’s motion was not seconded. The VICE PRESIDENT said that it was not usual to have motions seconded in the Senate; that the rule was a formality which had not been attended to in practice; but, if any Senator made it a point, the rule must be enforced. Mr. B. then appealed to the Senators from the south of Mason and Dixon’s line to furnish him a second. Several rose, and, observing among them Mr. WOODBURY, of New Hampshire, he gave him the preference, because he was from the north of Mason and Dixon’s line, and because he had been the first to open the campaign against the salt tax several years ago. He said that the report and speeches of the Senator from New Hampshire against the salt tax would remain as monuments to his honor when his own poor exertions were forgotten; and he took pride and pleasure in paying this tribute to him, and making it more fully known in the West, that he was only the follower of that distinguished and patriotic Senator, so justly dear to the whig republicans of all quarters of the Union, in waging a war of determined hostility against the salt tax.

The other objections of Mr. FOOT being disposed of, Mr. B. went on to read, or state, the extracts to which he referred.

1. From Sir John Sinclair’s evidence.—I was once at the farm of a great farmer in the Netherlands, a Mr. Messelman, at Chenoi, near Havre, where I was surprised to see an immense heap of Cheshire rock salt, which he said he found of the greatest use for his stock. He said, first, that, by allowing his sheep to lick it, the rot was effectually prevented; secondly, that his cattle, to whom he gave lumps of it to lick, were thereby protected from infectious disorders; and the cows being thus rendered more healthy, and being induced to take a greater quantity of liquid, gave more milk. And I saw lumps of this salt, to which the cows had access, in the place where they were kept. He also said, that a small quantity pounded was found very beneficial to the horses when new oats were given them, if the oats were at all moist. * * * He gave them great lumps, that they (the cattle) might lick when they chose. * * * One of the most important uses of salt, as connected with agriculture, is, that it preserves seed, when sown, from the attacks of the grub." * * * In a communication to me from Sweden, by Baron Schultz, he says, the salt destroys the different sort of worms found in the bodies of sheep, but in particular the liver worm.

EXTRACT.

2. Arthur Young's Testimony.—Did you ever try salt in the feeding of your cattle?

Yes; but chiefly with sheep; and I found the sheep astonishingly fond of it.

Do you think that it would be beneficial in preventing the rot in sheep?

I found it so in the years when my neighbors' sheep were generally affected with the rot; my sheep escaped, and my land was quite as wet as my neighbors'.

Do you think, considering the advantages in health, fattening, and the power of using inferior food in the feeding of cattle and stock in general, that the free use of salt would be an advantage equivalent to seven shillings a head to the farmer?

I should think it would be worth a great deal more. I think it is invaluable. In short, let my answer be what it would, it would be under the mark.

Dr. Young then gave his opinion that the stock in England would be increased in value above three millions sterling, nearly fifteen millions of dollars, by the free use of salt. He estimated the stock in England to be—

Horses,	-	-	-	1,500,000 head
Cattle,	-	-	-	4,500,000 do.
Sheep,	-	-	-	30,000,000 do.

3. Testimony of William Glover, superintendent of the cattle of the Hon. Mr. Curwen, M. P.

This deponent began to give salt to the cattle under his care the 19th November, 1817, and from that time till now the cattle have had salt, as follows: 40 milch cows and breeding heifers, each 4 ounces per day; 30 oxen, 4 ounces each per day; 27 young cattle, each 2 ounces per day; 26 calves, 1 ounce each per day; 48 horses, each 4 ounces per day; 444 sheep, 2 ounces each per week. The advantage of salt for sheep appears to this deponent to be great; as he says none of the stock have died in the sickness since they commenced giving salt; and they have had none in the rot; in other years they lost some of the ewes and wethers in the sickness. And this deponent says that he has now kept the cattle at Schoose farm ten years, and they were never so long without sickness.

4. The affidavit of thirty-two farmers.

We, the undersigned, being farmers, and the owners of land in the neighborhood of Workington, do hereby certify, that we are acquainted with and witnesses to the fact of Mr. Curwen giving salt to his cattle and horses, with their food, at the Schoose farm and at Workington; and that we are desirous of using the same for our live stock if we could obtain it without difficulty, and at a cheap rate.

EXTRACT.

5. Testimony of Mr. Curwen, M. P.—In regard to cattle, I have under-estimated the quantity, because, if salt could be had at a moderate price there is no animal I would give less than six stone, (14 pounds to the stone,) each per annum. * * *

I believe if salt were in general use for cattle it would amount to 340,000 tons—about 14,000,000 bushels—* * * "The importance of the free use of salt to agriculture can scarcely be estimated too highly. Salt contributes not only to the health of cattle and sheep, but accelerates and promotes the quantity of milk given by milch cows. [In another place Mr. C. says that the use of salt prevents the ill taste which the feeding on certain weeds and vegetables imparts to the milk.] It prevents the rot in sheep, and the effect of hoving, when stock are fed on turnips or clover. * * * Salt renders damaged hay palatable and nutritious; and, if applied in difficult seasons, prevents an undue fermentation and heat in the stack. Chaff and straw would be rendered available to a much greater extent than at present by the application of salt. It would be a most valuable ingredient in the preparation of warm food for stall-fed cattle in the improved system of soiling; and, from my experience of its salutary effects, I should consider the free use of it, as a condiment, the greatest boon the Government could bestow on the husbandman. * * * I consider the advantage from salt, in feeding my stock, on a farm of eight hundred acres, worth about one thousand pounds per annum, would exceed three hundred pounds per annum! (that is, add a third to the annual value of the farm.)

The probable consumption of salt for sheep and cattle may be taken as follows, to wit:

Per annum.	14 lbs. the stone.	Stones.
30,000,000 sheep, -	2 stone each, -	60,000,000
1,421,000 cows, -	6 do. -	8,526,000
2,000,000 young cattle, -	4 do. -	8,000,000
1,100,000 fattening beasts, -	6 do. -	6,600,000
1,200,000 draught cattle, -	4 do. -	4,800,000
300,000 colts and saddle horses, -	3 do. -	900,000
1,200,000 horses, -	not estimated,	88,826,000

N. B. 14 pounds 1 stone, 4 stones 1 bushel, 4 bushels 1 cwt.

☞ The English bushel of salt is 56 lbs.

6. Lord Kenyon's evidence before the committee.—By the information which I have been able to collect, I am induced to consider salt, when sparingly applied, as an admirable manure, especially for fallows and arable land; and, when mixed up with soil out of gutters, or refuse dirt or ashes, to be very valuable also on grass lands. My own experience convinces me that it is very powerful in destroying vegetation if laid on too thick, having put a large quantity of refuse salt on about one-fourth of an acre of land, which, after two years, still remains quite bare. A land surveyor of high character in my neighborhood, considers that the use of salt would be likely to be very valuable in destroying the slug, wire worm, snail, &c. which often destroy whole crops. He also remembers that salt was used largely in the neighborhood of the Higher and Lower Wiches in Cheshire, before the duties were raised to their present height. With respect to its value for cattle, horses, and sheep, I am informed that it is very highly thought of, both as nutriment, and as used medicinally, internally and externally. Its value also is extremely well known for rendering bad and ill-gotten hay more nourishing and more palatable to cattle than even good hay.

7. Evidence of Mr. Kingston.—In reply to your queries, as an agriculturist, I have no hesitation in saying that salt, if freed from duty, would become one of the most useful and general articles of manure that ever was thought of, if properly composed, by mixing it with mud of any kind—the cleanings of ditches and ponds, the surface of coarse ground thrown into heaps to rot, blubber, &c. am also persuaded, that if it could be afforded to be sprinkled on the layers of hay, when making into the rick, in catching weather, it would prevent its heating and getting mouldy. I had once some small cattle tied up to fatten, which did not thrive, owing, as the bailiff said, to the badness of the hay, of which they wasted more than they ate; but, by sprinkling it with water in which some salt had been dissolved, they returned to eat it greedily. I am free to say, a proper quantity of salt would prevent cattle from being hoven by an excess of green food.

8. Mr. Thomas Bourne's examination.—The committee understand you are a merchant, residing at Liverpool? I am.

Can you speak as to the probable effect of the repeal of the salt duties on your trade?

It would be a good thing, in my opinion, for the country at large, and also the manufactures.

Have you any knowledge of its being used in food for animals?

Yes, to horses in particular.

Has it a good effect?

Yes.

Then do you not suppose, if the restrictions were taken off, it would come into more general use among the farmers, for stock of all kinds?

It would in that instance; we used to have five horses in our rock salt mine, and those horses always appeared in good condition, though very much worked.

Were they liable to less disorders than those out of the mine?

Yes; much less.

Do you happen to know whether they were in the practice at that time of receiving salt with their food?

Yes; to my knowledge they were.

In what quantity?

About a handful to a quartern of oats.

9. Evidence of Mr. W. Horne.—There are very few farmers who are not aware of the importance of salt in preserving hay, and restoring it when damaged; many of those whom I have conversed with on the subject, have used it for these purposes, and it would generally be resorted to, to the extent of ten or fifteen pounds to the ton of hay, if the duties on salt were repealed. Lord Somerville has furnished most satisfactory information on this subject; and I know, from respectable authority, that it is a common practice in the United States of America to sprinkle salt upon hay when forming it into ricks. We also learn from Lord Somerville, that Mr. Darke, of Breckon, one of the most celebrated graziers in the kingdom, mixed salt with his flooded mouldy hay, and that his Hereford oxen did better on it than others on the best hay he had; and he was convinced the hay had all its good effects from the salt. * * * * I have learnt from Mr. Sutton, of Eaton, in Cheshire, that he would give thirty tons (120 bushels, of 56 pounds each,) of salt a year to his cattle, being fifty cows, if the duty were repealed. * * * * In many parts of the United States of America, salt is generally given to cattle.

The excellent condition of the horses in the rock-pits of Cheshire, may be adduced in favor of its benefit in fattening cattle and keeping them in health. Many counted that they can attribute the longevity of their horses to the good effects of salt. Mr. Hadfield, of Liverpool, furnishes an instance in his horse, thirty years old; he constantly gave it rock salt to lick, placing it in his manger. Mr. Young has furnished us, in the annals of agriculture, with a most interesting and satisfactory statement (obtained from the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris) on the effect of salt in fattening cattle. From this report it appears, that to the unlimited use of salt was to be ascribed the circumstance of four times the number of sheep having been reared on a sterile common, than would otherwise have subsisted on it; and that the wool of these flocks is not only the finest in the whole country, but bears the highest price of any in France. The fineness of the wool of the Spanish sheep is also attributed, in a great measure, to the free use of salt. It is not, therefore, I presume, an extraordinary position to say, that, by a proper use of common salt, the same quantity of forage might, on many occasions, be made to go twice as far as it could have done, in feeding animals, had the salt been withheld from them!

10. Mr. Charles G. Cothill, examined.—What is your profession?

Answer. A bacon and provision merchant, residing in Judd street, Brunswick square.

What is the nature and amount of your business, and how far has it been affected by the salt duties?

Answer. About fifty years ago my father established a manufactory in Vine street, and expended £10,000 in adapting the premises for the curing of bacon and the salting of pork. Our annual returns were about £50,000: it is now diminished to less than £1,000 annually, in consequence, as I apprehend, of the very high duties on salt, as our trade has diminished progressively as those duties have increased.

Do you not consider that the breed of hogs has also diminished, in consequence of this increase of duty on salt?

Answer. Very materially; and, as a further proof of what I state, we had a very extensive trade of £200,000 a year in hogs; now not £10,000.

What effect, in your opinion, would a great reduction of the salt duties produce in your business?

Answer. I conceive it would restore our trade: we should then be able to supply the West India markets, and other colonies, with salted pork, cheaper and better than any other country.

What is the quantity of salt used upon 100 weight of pork, to make bacon?

Answer. In a manufactory of bacon, about 12 pounds; to cure a small quantity, about 17 or 18.

11. Testimony of Sir Thomas Bernard.—I ventured to suggest that a tax on salt was fundamentally wrong in principle, because it presses most on the class least able to bear the weight—because of its immoral tendency—and because it deprives the nation of benefits, beyond measure greater than the whole produce of the impost. The salt duties are about a million and a half sterling per annum, (about seven millions of dollars.) The poor use most salt in proportion to their wealth; a cottager in the country ten to one in proportion to a nobleman in town. But the benefits of which the nation is deprived by the salt duties, are not easily appreciated, or even numbered. In agriculture and rural economy alone, the loss in feeding cattle, sheep, and hogs—in restoring damaged provender—in manure, and in the effect on wages, may, without extravagance, be supposed to exceed the whole value of the tax. Equal, perhaps, would be the gain to our manufacturers of woollen, linen, glass, earthenware, soap, &c. &c. &c. by the unrestrained use of muriate and carbonate of soda and muriatic acid, of which our salt mines and ocean afford supplies absolutely inexhaustible.

Mr. B. having read, or stated, these extracts, to show the use of salt in agriculture, said there were many other witnesses examined, to prove that alum salt, which the English usually called bay salt, because it was made by solar evaporation, out of sea water in the bay of Biscay, and other bays, was indispensable to the curing of provisions, for long keeping, or for exportation, other articles connected with agriculture, as cheese, butter, bacon, pickled beef, and pickled pork; and that the English Government permitted alum salt, under the name of bay salt, to be imported both into England and Ireland duty free, for these purposes, even when the domestic manufacture of common salt in England far exceeded the home demand, and furnished millions of bushels for exportation. He also stated that the committee of the House of Commons had examined the first physicians of Great Britain, to prove the effect of a deficiency of salt in the provisions of the poor on their health, and that these physicians uniformly testified that many diseases of the poor, and especially in children, were the effect of using vegetables not sufficiently salted, and fish and meat not sufficiently cured. He also stated that the committee had extended their examination to the use of salt in various manufactories, and had established, by proof, that a variety of useful manufactures required the abolition of the salt duty. On this point, he read extracts from the examination of Samuel Parkes, Esq. an eminent chemist of London, as follows:

EXTRACT.

12. Examination of Samuel Parkes.—What is your profession?

I am proprietor of the chemical works in Goswell street, London, and of other chemical works in Maiden lane, Islington.

Can you acquaint the committee what are the manufactures most affected by the salt laws?

The manufactures of mineral alkali, crystalized soda, muriatic acid, hard soap, distinguished from soft soap, Glauber salt, Epsom salt, magnesia, and sal ammoniac, are all materially affected by the duty on salt; but as common salt, or one or other of the component parts of common salt, is made use of in the composition of a great variety of articles that are employed in our manufactures, it is difficult to answer that question with precision. * * Respecting soap, I have only to observe, that common salt is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of hard soap; for however plentifully potash may be produced, large quantities of common salt must be employed with it, or the soap will be only temporarily hard; it will have no lasting consistence. * * Salt is employed largely in the preparation and manufacture of a great number of other articles that might be enumerated; and in a short time I have no doubt they would all be benefited by the reduction of the duty on salt.

How does the price of salt affect the soap boilers?

As it affects all other trades in which salt is employed.

State the way in which it affects them.

The cheaper it is, the cheaper they will have it if they buy it.

Do you know any other (manufacturing) purposes for salt?

Yes: it is used in very large quantities by dyers, when it can be had cheap; and in a great variety of other ways.

With respect to the salting of hides, I learn from further inquiry, that the butcher usually applies five pounds of salt to every ox or cow hide which he has occasion to lay by, or to send to the tanner at a distance.

Crystalized soda (made of salt,) is much used in washing. Four hundred tons are annually made at the Long Benton works only.

You have stated that, during the last six or seven years, it has increased from one to four hundred tons.

Yes.

This at the Long Benton works only?

Yes.

Which is made from salt duty free?

Yes. They have an exclusive privilege.

When Mr. B. had finished reading these extracts, and expressed his regret that, out of seventy witnesses and four hundred folio pages of testimony, he could read no more without encroaching too much on the time of the Senate, he said he would introduce the testimony of some American witnesses to the same points. He had seen the statements of the English witnesses last winter; and, being desirous to hear what Americans would say on the same subject, he had, in the course of the last summer, addressed certain queries to some friends and acquaintances in the Western States, and had received from many of them communications of so much interest and value, that he should lay them before the Senate; and, first, would exhibit the queries for the better understanding of the answers. The names of his correspondents, he said, would be known to the members of the Senate from the States in which they reside; some will be known to the Senators from many States; and some to the whole body of the Senate.

Queries on the state of the salt trade in the Western States.

1. Whether the trade in salt is monopolized? and, if so, at what works? and over how many States do the sales of these monopolists extend?

2. The practices of the monopolists, if any, to enhance the price of salt, and to prevent competition?

3. The prices of domestic and foreign salt in your neighborhood, and the freight of foreign salt from New Orleans?

4. Whether the monopolists have established depots of salt in different States, and appointed agents to sell their salt, and restricted the sales of each depot to its district? How far are the depots apart in your State?

5. Whether the salt manufacturers have entered into agreements with the monopolizers to restrict the quantity of salt made at the works? to confine the sales to the monopolists? and to stop working wells and furnaces for pay? The meaning of the phrase "dead wells," and the rent of such wells?

6. Whether salt is sold in your neighborhood by weight or measure? If by weight, how many pounds are allowed to the bushel? and how much a weighed bushel measures?

7. In selling by the barrel, is due allowance made for the weight of the barrel, and for the loss of salt in drying? If not, what is the difference between the real and nominal quantity in the barrel?

8. Whether the monopolists sell for money, or country produce? for ready pay, or upon credit? and whether the price is higher or lower since the monopoly?

9. Do the monopolists rise and fall in their prices according to the presence or absence of competition? and what salt competes with them?

10. Do they realize great gains?

11. Whether the domestic salt is fit for pickling beef and pork, for curing bacon, and preserving butter, for exportation, or consumption in the South, or long keeping?

12. Whether beef and pork, put in common salt, will be received for the use of the army or navy?

13. The necessity and expense of repacking beef and pork in alum salt, in New Orleans, which has been put up in domestic salt?

14. The necessity and advantage of giving salt to horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs? Whether salt is not indispensable to stock in the Western States? Whether there is not a great difference between inland and maritime States in this respect? The reason of that difference? How much salt per head, and how often per week or month ought it to be given to each kind of stock? and whether the farmers in your section of the country are prevented, by the high price and scarcity of salt, from giving as much to their stock as they need?

15. The use and advantage of salt in preserving hay, fodder, and clover? In restoring them, after being damaged by wet?

SENATE.]

Duty on Alum Salt.

Communication from G. T. C. McCLANNAHAN, Esq. of Jackson county, North Alabama, October, 1830.

Your first query—the trade of salt is entirely monopolized here by James White, of the Holston salt works, in Virginia. I cannot exactly tell to what States these works furnish salt, but it is to be supposed to the western parts of Virginia, eastern part of Tennessee, a part of North Carolina, the northern part of Georgia, North Alabama, and some in South Alabama, &c. &c.

Query 2d—Colonel J. White has a depot at this place, a mile and a half from Tennessee river, down which stream he boats his salt. And if any person else brings salt here to sell, they immediately undersell that person and ruin him. The people sometimes get their salt from Nashville, when they have a convenience of doing so, and it comes much cheaper, after paying land carriage one hundred and thirty miles, than White's salt; but no person dares to compete with him here; because he can, at his will, undersell any person who pays a land carriage of one hundred and thirty miles; and therefore instantly break them up. One thing is yet to be told, which will convince any man of the sin and oppression of this monopolizing system. This same James White will carry his salt by us down to Ditto's landing, ten miles below Huntsville, haul it out to Winchester, Tennessee, which is fifty-five miles of land carriage, and sell it there so much lower than he will here on the river take it out of his boats, that some of the planters, who are able to take their wagons and cross a very bad mountain, (part of the Cumberland,) haul their salt over from Winchester, which is forty-five miles from this place. Is this not oppressive to the poor? Would not this governmental monopolist wring from the distressed orphan, widow, and war-worn soldier, all their earthly sustenance? And yet the Congress of the United States—this boasted land of liberty and equal laws, countenances such oppressive acts. Why does Mr. White not sell as low here on the river as at Winchester, after carrying his salt one hundred and twenty miles, fifty-five by land, and that, too, the very same salt? The answer is obvious. At Winchester there is some competition; it is not so far from Nashville, where foreign salt may be obtained. And this is why he sells it lower there than at this place.

We are here fenced in with almost impassable mountains, at a great distance from any commercial depot, and without the means of shunning the exorbitant exactions of these vampyres, who take the bread from the mouths of our children with the calculating coldness of an Arab; and these acts are legalized by a Congress of freemen. We are glad to hear the stern voice of indignation at this oppression, uttered by some of the patriotic republicans of that body; and we should glory in being among the most persecuted victims, if by that means this most pernicious system of monopoly could be overturned.

Query 3d—We have no foreign salt here for sale; two years ago some gentlemen brought a few bushels from Nashville, and sold it for one dollar and eighty-seven and a half cents per fifty pounds, underselling the salt gentlemen here at that time. The domestic salt has got lower than it was four years ago. Then it was two dollars and fifty cents, now one dollar and eighty-seven cents to two dollars.

The freight from New Orleans to Nashville is one cent per pound, as I am informed by a merchant of this place, and from Nashville to this place one and a quarter cents per pound.

4. There is a depot here, and another at Ditto's landing, as I am told, for selling salt. These places are about fifty-five miles apart by land. The remaining part of the question I do not know any thing about.

5. Colonel White, as I have been informed by good authority, leased the Preston salt works, in what is called New Virginia, for nine or twelve thousand dollars annually; but I am further informed that the lease is out, and the works are to go into active operation to compete with White, he having let them lie idle heretofore; these are "dead wells," but the number of dead wells he has I am unable to inform you.

6. Salt is sold here by weight, fifty pounds to the bushel; and fifty pounds (the bushel) of the salt which I tried, (without pressing,) measured 1,188 $\frac{505215}{1000000}$ solid inches, making 4 gallons $1\frac{4832}{100000}$ quarts, dry measure, which is but very little over half a measured bushel. Therefore, when salt is two dollars the fifty pounds, we have to pay at the rate of three dollars and sixty-six and a half cents the measured bushel. This is oppression in a free country—this is the fruit of the tariff.

7. In selling by the barrel, the weight of the barrel, and the net weight of salt, is sometimes, and most commonly, placed on the barrel; but the weight of the barrel is marked much less than its real weight.

They make no deduction for the drying of the salt. One barrel I particularly weighed out, and it lost twenty pounds; and I am credibly informed that some have lost as much as fifty.

8. The monopolists here sell for money, or cotton at the cash price, which is the same thing as money. They do not credit their salt. There is always two prices for cotton here—a cash and discount price. Merchants, in taking in cotton for their accounts, give more for it than they will in money; and this is called the discount price. The salt gentlemen sell their salt for cotton, at the cash price. The remaining part of the query I know nothing about.

9. The monopolists have fallen here, since they find that people would go to Nashville for their salt, if they did not. But they know at what price to keep it up; they know the planters cannot take the trouble to go one hundred and thirty miles to Nashville, to get a little salt; and they know that no person dares to compete with them, as they could instantly reduce the price of their salt, and thereby ruin their competitor.

10. They certainly must realize great gains, or they would not give nine or twelve thousand dollars annually for one manufactory, to let it lie idle. Why does not Congress lease all the salt works in the United States, and let them lie idle, and then knock the duty off of salt, if they wish to encourage the manufacture of salt, by filling the pockets of the manufacturers? It would be much better for the people. They would be great gainers by purchasing the salt works, and demolishing them, or letting them out at a small rate, and then striking the duty from salt.

The remaining queries, I am in hopes, will find abler persons to answer them than I.

Communication from a meeting of the citizens of Madison county, Alabama, 8th of November, 1830, the subject proposed by Dr. William H. Glassecock, and authenticated by the signatures of Thomas Miller, President, and Charles A. Jones, Secretary.

Answer to 1st. The salt consumed here is almost exclusively obtained from Col. James White's manufactory, of Virginia, and sold by his agents in East Tennessee, a part of North Alabama, and West Tennessee.

To the 2d. We can give no definitive answer.

3d. The price of domestic salt is one dollar and twenty-five cents per bushel, by the barrel, or one dollar and seventy-five cents by the single bushel. Foreign salt sells at about the same. The freight of salt, from New Orleans to Huntsville, is about one cent and three-fourths per pound.

4th. Colonel White has salt deposited in different parts of this State, and others, at various distances from each other, say ten to fifteen miles.

5th. Preston's works were for some time discontinued for—say ten thousand dollars per annum.

FEB. 8, 1831.]

Duty on Alum Salt.

[SENATE.]

6th. Universally sold by weight, allowing fifty pounds to the bushel; the measured bushel will weigh from seventy to eighty pounds.

7th. When the salt is weighed out of the barrel, it seldom holds out, and frequently loses from five to twenty pounds. We may add, that, however honestly it may have been put up at the works, it is generally brought down in open boats, subject to the winter rains, which damage it more or less; and we know of but one of his agents who sells it any other way than by the marked weight.

8th. Salt is sold for nothing else but ready money.

9th. Salt is sold, high or low, according to competition. The Kenhawa ground alum and Liverpool are brought in but sparingly, which is the only competition.

10th. We believe that White realizes great gains. We are sustained in this opinion, from his carrying it by land twenty-five or thirty miles farther, where he meets with competition, and selling it for less than he does here.

11th. Wholly unfit.

12th. It will not be received for either.

13th. We can give no correct answer.

14th. It is indispensable for stock of all kinds. It is thought they require more in the Western States than maritime States, owing, probably, to the absence of the sea breeze, and vapor impregnated with salt coming from the sea, and alighting on the vegetable matter. Stock of all kinds should be salted twice a week; but, owing to the high price of salt, the stock are probably not salted more than once in two weeks, on an average. From the best accounts, three thousand barrels of salt are consumed annually in Madison county, averaging about six bushels (of fifty pounds) to the barrel. The population being about twenty-seven thousand, gives us an average of thirty-three pounds and one-third to each person. Were those heavy duties taken off, the consumption would be much greater.

15th. Salt is thought to be useful in preserving hay, fodder, and clover; each will keep well if sprinkled over with it, though not thoroughly cured when put up. Moreover, our pork is often spoiled from the want of a sufficiency of salt to pack it up in, which we cannot obtain on account of the high price. Thousands, and tens of thousands of pounds are often lost from that circumstance alone. Alum salt would be an immense saving to North Alabama, in that one particular.

Resolved, therefore, unanimously, That the delegation from this State, as well as those of our sister States, have our unfeigned thanks for their exertions and co-operation the last session of Congress, with Mr. Benton, in endeavoring to repeal the duty on salt; and that we request our delegation to use their utmost to effect the repeal of a tax so burdensome to us, and of no ultimate advantage to any State.

Communication from Colonel F. W. Burton, formerly of North Carolina, now of Murfreesborough, Tennessee, dated December 8, 1830.

Your favor of July last, propounding fifteen queries on the state of the salt trade in the Western States, was received in due time. To the thirteen first of these queries, I am sure that the commercial gentlemen of the country can render a much more correct and satisfactory answer than I can.

To the fourteenth I will observe, that salt is indispensably necessary to the good condition of horses, horned cattle, sheep, and hogs, in the Western States. It is beneficial in the maritime States likewise, and the more so as you recede from the seaboard. The watery constituent parts of the atmosphere on the seaboard take with them salt, which is inhaled by these animals, and thereby they are supplied with that salt which is necessary for the healthful condition of all animals, both granivorous and herbivorous, and to some of those that are carnivorous. The quantity of salt, per head, to each kind of stock, will depend on the food with which they are supplied. If with grain, less; if with herbs, more salt. I am sure, if the price of salt be reduced, the farmers in this section of the country would give their stock a better supply, and that their improvement would be in proportion to the increased quantity given. To err, by an excess, is not to be apprehended.

To the fifteenth query I will remark, that the use of salt, in the preservation of hay, is well expended. And if new mowed hay, or clover, or other grasses, be packed, a layer of hay, and a layer of straw, either wheat, oats, or rye, and a good supply of salt to each layer be added, you make the best of food for horses and cattle.

I approve, very highly, your intention to repeal, if you can, the salt tax, totally and promptly. In this, and all efforts of your useful life, I wish you success.

Communication from General William Hall, of Sumner county, Tennessee, dated December 8, 1830.

I received your "queries on the state of the salt trade in the Western States," in due time; and have delayed answering them, only that I might obtain all the information within my reach necessary to a correct reply. The queries will be answered in the order in which they are proposed, Nos. 1, 2, &c., answering to the corresponding numbers in the queries.

1. The salt made at the Kenhawa works, from whence a large portion of the supply for this State, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, is obtained, is monopolized.

2. The monopolists have depots and agents in the different States, supplied by them, who are required to account quarterly for sales, which are made for cash, and at prices fixed by the monopolists.

3. The prices of domestic and foreign salt vary from seventy to one hundred cents per bushel of fifty pounds. Freight from New Orleans may be had at fifty cents per hundred pounds.

4. Answered in No. 2.

5. I have not been able to obtain any satisfactory information as to this query.

6. Salt is sold in this State, and throughout the Western country, by weight. The measured bushel weighs from twenty to twenty-five pounds more than the weighed bushel.

7. An allowance is made for the weight of the barrel, though none for the loss of salt in drying.

8. Is answered, in part, previously. The price is higher since the monopoly.

9. The price of salt is regulated by the quantity in market. The quantity of foreign, or other domestic salt, brought to this market, is inconsiderable.

10. The monopolists realize great gains.

11. Although Kenhawa salt is very superior to any other domestic salt brought to this market, I am informed that nearly all the beef and pork from the Western country is repacked in foreign salt, either for shipment, or for the army or navy.

12. See No. 11.

13. I am not informed as to the price of repacking beef or pork which has been put up in domestic salt.

14. The necessity and advantage of giving salt to stock of every kind is universally admitted. It is indispensable in the Western States, and ought to be given to all kinds of stock about once a week, and to each head of horses or cattle from two to four ounces at a time, and less than half that quantity to sheep or hogs, though farmers in this section are prevented from giving their stock the necessary quantum of salt, owing to the high price of the article.

15. The use and advantage of salt in preserving of hay, fodder, and clover, is admitted by all practical farmers, although but few avail themselves of the advantage, in consequence of the scarcity and high price of salt.

Duty on Alum Salt.

[FEB. 8, 1831.]

Communication from Lieutenant Governor Breathitt, of Kentucky, dated Russellville, Nov. 16, 1830.

My information will not enable me to answer your favor on the state of the salt trade in detail.

From the general opinion on the subject, there is no doubt there was, during the last year, an extensive salt monopoly supplied from the Kenhawa works. Depots were had principally on the watercourses for salt, where it was vended by their agents, sometimes on a credit of four or six months. Whether it continues the present season, I am not advised. Those depots extended to Tennessee. Sales were made for money. There is but little foreign salt brought into this neighborhood: I cannot, therefore, state the difference in price. This neighborhood is supplied from the Illinois saline, and the Kenhawa salt from the latter is preferred to preserve meat. It is not so white and clean as that from the saline. It is usually sold by weight—50 lbs. to the bushel, when sold by the barrel. The tare of the barrel is taken off; and the salt is generally weighed at the time of sale. It is, however, sometimes otherwise. About this time last year, the common price, at this place, was one dollar per bushel; now, it may be purchased at seventy-five cents. There is no doubt that salt is indispensable for the use of stock, and particularly in this country. Much stock has been raised upon the grazing the forest affords, and if they are furnished plentifully with salt, they are fat. Hence the necessity of its being as cheap as possible, and because, also, of its universal use by all. I was pleased at the reduction of the duties last session on coffee, tea, molasses, and salt. I should be pleased, however, to see the duties retained on manufactured articles, so that our own manufactories may enter into competition with foreign ones, and make a reasonable profit. I would not have them to have unreasonable profit; then it would be a tax upon one portion for the benefit of the other. The point to stop at is one of difficulty, and requires great experience and much research.

I should be pleased to hear from you occasionally.

Statement of the Hon. Mr. Lyon, of Kentucky.

That, being a member of a mercantile house which received a quantity of salt from the Kenhawa Salt Company, to sell on commission, in the years 1826-27, with instructions to sell at the original mark or lick weight, finding many of the barrels greatly deficient in weight, varying from 10 to 20 per cent., they roweighed, and sold a quantity at the real weight; that, when the agent of the company came on, he was dissatisfied, and said it was their custom to sell elsewhere at the original mark, and that it must be so sold there, which they refused to do. The agency, and the salt on hand, were transferred to other hands; and that he has great reason to believe the necessities of the people, in many instances, compelled them to purchase the deficient barrels at their marked weight.

Also, that, being in company with the Hon. Mr. Benton, of the Senate, in ascending the Ohio from Cincinnati, last fall, on board the steamboat Emigrant, said to belong to, and be in the employ of, the Kenhawa Salt Company, which was towing a keel-boat to Maysville, Kentucky, loaded with alum or foreign salt, and delivered there for the purpose of salting pork in that part of Kentucky.

Communication from General Milroy, of Delphi, Indiana, dated Nov. 25, 1830.

I received your letter requesting information relative to the salt trade of this country. My limited acquaintance with mercantile business will enable me to say but little from my own knowledge on the subject. I can say, however, that the belief is universal, and uncontradicted in this part of the country, that agents employed by the salt manufacturers furnish exclusively the supply of that article for the valley of the Wabash; and that none is permitted to be vended by others, so far as can be prevented by them; and that those agents are regulated by fixed prices, under which they may not sell, but can raise the price in proportion to the demand. It is also believed that a scarcity of salt is frequently occasioned by the inadequacy of the manufactories to produce sufficient supplies, or that those monopolists hoard it up for the purpose of extorting exorbitant prices; neither of which causes would operate to produce the scarcity and high price so oppressive to the West, was the salt trade left open to the natural course of competition.

The monopoly of the salt trade is notorious, and is one of the greatest grievances to be complained of in the West; and it is believed that the unrestricted importation of alum salt is, perhaps, the only method which can be adopted effectually to break it down, unless Congress should think proper to declare it a criminal offence to attempt a monopoly of any article of necessary consumption, as the British Parliament has done, and render such offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, which even would not be so effectual.

It will not be disputed but that a supply of alum salt is necessary in the West, even if the domestic salt was obtainable unembarrassed by monopoly, from its superior qualities in the preservation of beef and pork in a southern market, where we must of necessity send our surplus of those articles. It is believed by stock raisers, that a much larger quantity of salt is necessary for stock in the Western than in the Atlantic States, owing, doubtless, to the nature of the food on which they are subsisted, and the diseases to which they are subject.

I should have been much gratified to have been able to furnish you information on all the points on which you request it, and should have done it most cheerfully had I been in possession of it. Not doubting, however, but that the method you have taken will elicit it in abundance, I shall, therefore, rest satisfied, anxiously desiring the successful result of your efforts to repeal the salt tax entirely, concurring with you in opinion that it is the best service that can be rendered to the West next to the graduation of the price of public lands: in both of which great Western measures, you have the concurrence of a vast majority of the West most ardently wishing you success.

Communication from General Tipton, of Indiana, dated Logansport, Indiana, Nov. 24, 1830.

Your printed letter of July last has been duly received, and I have made strict inquiry of merchants, and other gentlemen of intelligence of this vicinity, in relation to the salt monopoly. From facts collected from them, and some within my own knowledge, I have no hesitation in saying that there is, and has been for years, a monopoly of that article, to the great injury of the poorer class of the people of Indiana.

Deposits for the sale of salt are established along the Ohio and the Wabash rivers, at from thirty to forty miles from each other, by monopolists from Kenhawa, in Virginia, and from Kentucky. One agent of these monopolists is at this village; another at Lafayette, forty miles below, who rise or fall in their prices according to the competition they meet, and, by this means, oppress the poor, and amass wealth to themselves to a very large amount per annum.

The salt manufactured at the wells at Kenhawa, and in Kentucky, will not preserve pork in the Southern climate. In the winter of 1822 I descended the rivers to New Orleans, with a quantity of pork put up with salt made at the wells of these monopolists. Soon after my arrival at New Orleans, I was compelled to purchase Turk's Island salt, and repack my pork; thereby incurring an expense of one hundred and fifty dollars.

Duty on Alum Salt.

[SENATE.]

I have no doubt that it would be of great benefit to Indiana to repeal the law levying a duty on foreign salt.

Communication from J. G. Read, Esq. member of the Senate in the State of Indiana, dated Washington County, Nov. 30, 1830.

I received yours of July last, and am sorry that it is not in my power to give you a more full account of the subject matter therein contained. Relative to the act of last winter reducing the duty on salt, I have only to say that, in this section, it met with almost universal satisfaction, and a great anxiety is expressed that the entire duty be taken off this winter.

I now proceed to answer, in a brief and concise manner, a few of the queries propounded by you.

1st. "Whether the trade," &c.—It is, but at what works particularly I do not know. The monopoly extends throughout this State, and, I am informed, generally throughout the Western States.

3d. "The price," &c.—Domestic salt is $1 25; foreign $1 50. The freight from New Orleans is one dollar per hundred.

4th. "Whether," &c.—They have; the depots are generally from twenty to thirty miles.

6th. "Whether salt," &c.—It is sold by weight, 50 lbs. to the bushel; a weighed bushel will not measure more than three pecks.

8th. "Whether," &c.—They sell only for cash in hand. The price is higher since the monopoly.

9th. "Do the," &c.—I do not know, but presume they do. Foreign salt competes with them.

11th. "Whether," &c.—It is not.

12th. "The expense," &c.—Some few years ago, I had a number of barrels repacked in New Orleans, which had been put up in domestic salt: it cost me $1 12½ per barrel, and 12½ cents for each hoop that was furnished in the place of those that got broken in the process. I presume the price is nearly the same yet.

14th. "The necessity," &c.—Salt to stock in this country is of great importance; without it, but few could be raised. It prevents many disorders, &c.; and many farmers here are prevented, from the high price and scarcity of salt, to give them what they need.

15th. "The use," &c.—It is of great use. It is found to be an advantage of at least 50 per cent. to hay, particularly prairie hay, that is of little or no use without salt, is found to be almost equal to fodder when properly put up in salt.

Communication from Gen. W. H. Harrison, of Ohio, dated Washington City, Feb. 5, 1831.

I have always supposed, and every year's experience confirms me in the opinion, that the duty on salt (at least the high rate of duty lately paid) was injurious to the interest of agriculture in that part of the Western country in which I reside. One of our staples, and the one which I believe yields the most profit to the farmer, is pork. The increase of its manufacture (if I may so call it, meaning the preparation of it in barrels for exportation) is altogether astonishing. It is believed that, in Cincinnati alone, there were slaughtered and packed this year one hundred thousand hogs, averaging at least six dollars, and thus scattering $600,000 amongst the farmers. It is ascertained, beyond contradiction, that sea salt is necessary to prevent its spoiling in its passage through the hot climate of the Mississippi, in its course to a foreign market, or to our own Atlantic ports. In both of these, our pork, of late years, has acquired a very high character. This is due to the experience which has been acquired in packing, and to the exclusive use, when it can be procured, of sea salt. Before that article was brought to Cincinnati by the steamboats, the pork which was prepared with the Western salt was always repacked at New Orleans, when sent to a market beyond that place, at an expense of one dollar per barrel, and sometimes with a considerable deduction from the quantity, from the rejection of tainted pieces. And, indeed, after its arrival at the foreign market, it brought a much less price than the pork of the Atlantic States, which had been cured with sea salt. From these facts, it must be evident, that, in proportion to the abundance and the cheapness of sea salt in the city of Cincinnati, the price of pork must, in a great measure, be governed, and the price in that great mart governs it in the surrounding States.

In the year 1826 or '7, the pork market opened in Cincinnati tolerably well; but the pork dealers from the Atlantic cities, finding a great deficiency of sea salt, and that at a very high price, refused to purchase, and the article fell to $2 and $2 50 per hundred.

The objection, in the Western country, that has been urged against abolishing or reducing the duty on salt, is, the apprehension that it may destroy the Western manufacturing of that article. Against the probability of this occurrence is the fact of the advance of price in the domestic article of from seventy-five to one hundred per centum in the course of six or seven years. I am not able to say what is the cost of manufacturing the domestic article at the several works in the Western country. I have understood, and believe, that from thirty to thirty-five cents was considered a fair price for it in Cincinnati some years ago. It is not now sold lower than fifty cents; and, for some time in December last, sixty-two and a half cents per bushel of 50 lbs. was charged for it.

I will add the further fact against the successful competition of the imported with the Western salt for domestic purposes, for which the latter is equally good with the former, that the salting of pork commencing in the beginning of December, the salt must be imported in the spring which is intended to supply the market—the usually low state of the rivers in the summer and fall preventing the navigation in these seasons. The investment of money, therefore, by the merchant in the article must be made at least six months before he can effect a sale of it.

Communication from John C. Webb, Esq. of Missouri, dated Cape Girardeau, county of Jackson, November 24, 1830.

I saw in the Jackson Mercury, August 30, a request of yours to the citizens of the West for information or answers to several queries on the article of salt. Considering myself interested in the matter, I shall endeavor to answer them so far as my own knowledge of the matter extends.

To the first query I know but little of myself further than this: there are some merchants amongst us that have been applied to for salt, and proposed trade in payment; their reply was, they were selling on commission, and could take nothing else but money for it.

The second query I know nothing about.

3d. The price of domestic salt in Jackson, varies from one dollar to one dollar twenty-five cents per fifty pounds, and that weighed with old rusty steelyards that will not preponderate, for eight or ten pounds. Foreign salt is never lower than one dollar and twenty-five cents per fifty pounds. Domestic, by the barrel, varies from seventy-five to eighty-seven and a half cents; foreign ditto, one dollar per fifty pounds by the sack, after paying for the weight of the sack, and then adding fifty cents more for the sack. The common freightage from New Orleans to the Cape, from seventy-five cents to one dollar per hundred.

4th. As to this query I know nothing of myself.

5th. This I likewise know nothing about.

6th. This query I have answered as to the weight per bushel, only the measured bushel, which, as near as I can say pointed, domestic salt will weigh from sixty-five to seventy, foreign ditto, from seventy-five to eighty-five.

7th. In selling by the barrel, thirty pounds is allowed for the barrel; if you take it by the nominal quantity, you pay seventy-five cents; but if you have it weighed, eighty-seven and a half cents is most common.

8th. As to the manner of selling, it is for money alone, and that in hand; no produce nor credit in the case will answer.

9th. It appears that there is no competition here; when there is a scarcity it is sure to rise, and plenty never brings it down lower than the above stated prices.

10th. This query I cannot answer.

11th. As to domestic salt they will not receive beef or pork pickled with it, and it does not answer for butter for exportation.

12th. Beef nor pork will not be received in New Orleans if put up in common salt.

13th. If any does go down put up in common salt, it has to be repacked with one bushel of alum salt for each barrel.

14th. I have long experienced the advantage of giving salt to stock of every kind; if I am working my horses, and they fail eating, give them salt or salt and water to drink; I discover it immediately restores them to their appetite, and they perform their labor much better. Through the winter I salt them twice a week, and through the working season ever other day. I find it necessary to salt cattle through the winter once a week, they eat their rough food much better, and look better in the spring; and when the grass and herbs begin to put up, I find it necessary to salt every other day, and then through the summer twice a week, and have always noticed, if I neglected salting one week, my milch cows failed of their milk. I have some neighbors that seldom salt their stock at all, and I take notice that my cattle look as well in the spring as theirs do in the fall. Their reason for not salting they say is, that salt is so dear. Sheep and hogs require salt at any rate once a week through the summer; hogs put up fatten much better by being well salted.

15th. The advantage of salt for damaged hay I know is great. I have seen hay that looked like it was almost entirely spoiled, and when stacked up with salt, cattle eat it clean, and looked well; but salt selling so high as it does, prevents us poor people from having it by us even for the use of our stock and pickling up our meat, as nothing but money will get it. Go to a merchant, and ask if he wants any kind of produce, if he says yes—well, I will bring it at such a day—I want some salt to pickle up my meat, for I have got no money—his reply is, my salt is a cash article; I cannot sell it for produce. Well, I am obliged to have salt; if you will trust me a little while, I will pay you the money for it. His reply then is, I merely bring salt for accommodation; I make nothing on it; I must have the money down, or otherwise, will reply, I am selling on commission, and am obliged to have the money. On these terms I have known men to do without salt until they had suffered considerably for want of that article, unless they could borrow of a neighbor.

Honorable sir, if your interference in Congress can mitigate the matter, it will confer a very requisite favor on our neighborhood.

Mr. B., after reading or referring to these communications, which were given under the authors' names, stated that he had another of very material import which he would read to the Senate, but without the name. He had the less reluctance in doing this, because he had endeavored to give to the agent of the Kenhawa company, who had been in attendance upon the other House during the session, an opportunity to answer. He had communicated the statement to a member of the Committee on Manufactures, whose name he was at liberty to mention, [Mr. J.

S. BARBOUR, of Virginia,] for the express purpose of enabling the agent to answer it before that committee, but who had not availed himself of that opportunity.

Statement of a citizen of Kenhawa, furnished as anonymous, that he may not compromise his tranquillity, but with the names of the payers and receivers in the "dead well" system; the names being now omitted, as it is not the object of Mr. B. to interfere with individuals, but to expose a system.

"Dead wells are now common at the Kenhawa salines, and are giving to the place a dilapidated and melancholy appearance, and doing a real injury to the country. There are many of these dead wells, and monopolizers pay the owner for letting them remain idle. * * * and * * * * * receive about $1,500 per annum for two dead wells. * * * receives about $3,000 per annum for one. * * * about $1,500 per annum for another. Many others receive less or greater sums upon the same terms. Besides dead wells, there are also unborn wells, whose owners are paid for not letting them be dug. I know several of this kind. * * * receives $1,250 per annum not to dig a well on his land; * * * receives $1,500 annually on the same terms; * * * receives $2,500 per annum in the same way; and I have no doubt, many others, and it is all a thing of notoriety in the neighborhood. Before the monopoly, the price of salt was about a shilling a bushel, as it is called, and as often under as above that price, and it could be got for any kind of trade; since the monopoly, it is fifty cents cash, and none will be sold for retail to the people of the States, except to those who will bind themselves to avoid competition with the monopolizers at their depots. The company that monopolize the works are the chief shippers, and through their agents retail to the people in most of the Western States, fixing their own price, their own weight, and the quantity which each State is to have, except so far as they are interfered with by alum salt from New Orleans."

After reading, or referring to the extracts of evidence, taken before the Committee of the British House of Commons on the salt duties, and reading or stating the communications received by himself from citizens of the Western States, Mr. BENTON proceeded to make copious and extended remarks upon the uses of salt in agriculture and manufactures; the difference between the impure and inferior salt made by boiling well water, and the clean, pure and crystallized salt made by the rays of the sun, in hot climates, out of the water of the sea; the variety of uses to which the well water salt was wholly unfit and inadequate; and the cruel injustice, on the part of the Federal Government, of expelling the pure salt from the country by an oppressive tax, which might otherwise be had both cheap and abundant, for the purpose of compelling them to use the inferior salt at an enormous and unconscionable price.

1. He remarked on the value of salt to stock, as proved by both the English and American testimony. It was proved that the health of all animals was preserved by it; and with this preservation of health, ensued all the advantages of increased growth and fattening, prolonged life, multiplied offspring; and superior flavor to the flesh, the milk, the butter, the cheese, the bacon, beef, and pork, which were made from them. In England, it was computed that the advantage to the stock from all these sources was 25 per cent. per annum. On one farm it was rated at about 33½ per cent.; and the aggregate advantage, or rather the aggregate loss to the farmers for want of salt, was stated to exceed the annual amount of the tax, which was about 7,000,000 dollars.

2. He remarked on the necessity of sun-made salt for butter and cheese. If put up in common salt, the butter soon became rancid, and sold at less than half the price of alum salt butter at New Orleans and in the West Indies.

Duty on Alum Salt.

[SENATE.]

He attributed the general inferiority of American cheese to the impure salt which was used in making it; and dwelt upon the articles of cheese and butter as sources of wealth to the stock-raising States, if duly improved by the use of pure salt. He said the exports of the last years had reached the value of $177,000 per annum; which, though considerable, was a trifle compared to the consumption in our towns, and the export to the Lower Mississippi. He considered the farmers as losing the one-half of their whole sales of butter and cheese, by using artificial salt, made by men, instead of using the natural crystallized salt, made by nature. To the cows on dairy farms, it was proved in England, that half a bushel of salt per annum was necessary; and the milk, butter, and cheese, all were richer and better flavored when that quantity, or more, was given. Common salt would do for the cows to lick; but alum salt was indispensable for butter and cheese that was to be long kept or exported.

3. In the article of bacon he estimated the loss at nearly one-half in using the fire-made salt. Such bacon would not sell for much more than half price in any of our market towns, and could not be carried to the Southern climates, or exported, without danger of spoiling and becoming a total loss. Such bacon was often a drug in the market at New Orleans at two cents a pound, a mere refuse article at that price, while the alum salt bacon was a ready sale at six or eight cents.

4. In pickled pork. For this purpose alum salt was indispensable. The artificial salt would answer no purpose. The poisonous ingredients called slack and bittern, which it contained, corrupted the pork in warm climates, and the soluble nature of the salt itself, by dissolving immediately, brought all the pieces in contact, and made each assist in destroying the other. The crystallized salt, besides being free from slack and bittern, is large in the grain, and so far insoluble that a layer of it remains for years between each piece of meat, and acting as a perpetual preservative. Mr. B. said that bacon might be made, after a fashion, with boiled salt; but pickled pork not at all. For that purpose, the sun made salt was a sine qua non. For want of this salt, the Western farmers had got into the general custom of making bacon, whereby they lost about one-third of the product of their hog stock; for the bacon dried and wasted near a third by the time it was sold, and would then sell for no more than pickled pork, which lost not an ounce in weight from the day it was put into the barrel till sold. A difference of one-third to be saved in the annual product of the hog stock, would be immense to the farmers; and this difference would be saved by the repeal of the duty on alum salt.

5. In pickled beef. For this purpose alum salt is absolutely indispensable. Beef could not be pickled without it; and, therefore, to find a market, the beef cattle were driven off upon the hoof. Mr. B. pronounced it to be a losing business, a most disadvantageous traffic, to any country to drive away its beef cattle to be sold on the hoof. The immediate loss in that operation was nearly one-half the value of the beef, and the whole loss of the hide, tallow, and offal; the consequential loss was, in the purchase of leather and manufactures of leather, and the purchase of soap and candles, and also in the loss of leather, soap, and candles for exportation. Pickled beef in New Orleans was usually from eight to twelve dollars a barrel, which was from four to six cents a pound. The farmers of the West usually sell their cattle at from 1½ to 2½ cents per pound; thus suffering a loss of nearly one-half on the beef; the hide and tallow, which is worth as much as the beef sells for at such rates, being thrown into the bargain, and given away. The disastrous effect of this suicidal business was seen in every town in the West, where foreign hides from South America, foreign leather, boots, shoes, and saddlery, and foreign soap and candles, from Europe and the Atlantic States, were daily exhibited for sale. Another disastrous consequence, but not so visible to the passing eye, was the loss of all these articles for exportation. The exportation of soap and candles had lately amounted to 912,000 dollars in the year; and of leather, boots, shoes, and saddlery, to 450,000 dollars. These exportations went from the Atlantic cities to the West Indies, and chiefly grew out of the gifts which the Western farmers made of their hides and tallow to the drovers. They were exportations which belonged to the West, not only because it produced the material out of which the manufactured articles were made, but it was the best place for carrying on the manufactory of them on account of the cheapness of provisions, and the facilities of exporting direct to the West Indies.

Mr. B. made a further illustration of the evils of driving beef cattle from the West, in its effect upon the internal navigation and domestic markets of the great valley. The Mississippi river was to the West what the Mediterranean sea was to the Romans; it is mare nostrum—our sea—and the steamboats and other boats upon it constitute our navigation. The building of these vessels gives employment to a multitude of useful and respectable mechanics; creates a demand for vast quantities of wood, iron, paints, and glass; furniture of every description; daily supplies of provisions; wood for fuel, now estimated at a million of dollars per annum; and for an immense number of persons to navigate and manage the boats. The aggregate of all these expenditures connected with steamboat building and navigation, was several millions of dollars per annum, and was the most profitable kind of expenditure, for it was carried to the very doors of the people, and delivered into their hands in their own houses. Having drawn the picture of the advantages of steamboat navigation to the West, Mr. B. ventured to make the suggestion that they would be nearly doubled by substituting a change in the beef trade, from driving the cattle on the hoof to the Atlantic cities, to sending the beef pickled to New Orleans and the West Indies. Such a change would open a new and immense head for freight down the river, and a corresponding increase for freight back; for it was of the nature of exports and imports to emulate each other; it would produce diminished prices for under cargo, of which salt would be the chief; and a corresponding increase of every expenditure connected with the construction and navigation of steamboats. He then avowed that this change, and the stupendous benefits resulting from it, depended solely and exclusively upon the free use of alum salt—upon the abolition of the duty upon that article—upon the simple and obvious process of permitting the Western people to use the salt according to their wants and wishes, which God had created for them in all the islands of the Gulf of Mexico. And he ridiculed with contemptuous sarcasm the affected alarms of those who expressed the fear that there would not be salt enough if the domestic manufactories checked their operations. He said it was a fear that there would be a failure of sunshine and sea water.

Having briefly touched upon the important uses of salt in agriculture, and especially for stock and provisions, Mr. B. proceeded to notice the disadvantages under which the farmers of the Western States labored with respect to that article. At the head of the list of these disadvantages, or oppressions, as they might with greater propriety be called, stood the appalling and astounding fact, that the whole salt trade of the West, so far as it depended upon the domestic manufactories, was one vast and cruel monopoly! The amazing fact was proved by a variety of testimony; it was known to every Western Senator present; it was felt at home, in every department of agriculture, by all the farmers of the West. The baleful effects of this horrid monopoly were forcibly depicted by the witnesses whose communications he had read. Double price and scant measure; the whole country districted, allowed, and stinted; ready money exacted; wells rented from their owners to lie idle; new wells prevented from being dug; overgrown fortunes to the monopolizers, privation, want, and suffering among the people and stock: such was the shocking and revolting picture which these communications presented to the Senate. Mr. B. animadverted in the most indignant terms upon monopolies of every species, and placed the salt monopoly at the head of the abominable and infernal list. He said this very monopoly was one of the causes which brought Charles the First to the block. Queen Elizabeth, though a petticoated tyrant, had the humanity, or rather sagacity, to suppress the salt monopoly, towards the close of her reign; for which act of mercy and condescension the whole Parliament went in a body to thank and bless her as an angel of beneficence. The bigot Stuarts revived it, and paid the forfeiture in the loss of life and kingdom. There had been no monopoly of salt in England since Charles the First had lost his head; the States beyond the Allegany mountains were the only example of that oppression at this time existing in the civilized world. Mr. B. considered the present duty on foreign salt as the father and guardian of this domestic monopoly. He considered it the protector, defender, and supporter of the monopolists. He considered the act of Congress which kept up this duty, as the law which established this monopoly; and denounced such a law, not merely as odious and oppressive, but as a species of impiety and sacrilege, a species of revolt and rebellion against the providence of God, who had created salt, and spread it through the universe, for the use of man and beast, and as the preservative principle of life and health in both. The sea was filled with it, and the sun manufactured it. It came cheap and pure from that manufactory, established by Divine wisdom, and co-extensive with the bounds of the habitable globe. Salt was the preservative principle of the world. Every living animal must have it; every species of food must contain it. Without it, universal death and corruption would ensue. The disciples of Christ were called by their master "the salt of the earth;" and that divine metaphor was intended to convey to the understandings of all people the knowledge of the preservative nature of their mission, a mission which was to save the moral world from corruption, as salt preserves the animal and material world. Laws to prevent any portion of the human race from using the pure and perfect salt made by the rays of the sun out of the waves of the sea, if enacted without a dire necessity, were impious contrivances to frustrate the beneficence of God. A war for self-preservation alone could justify such laws. They had existed in all countries, and had run highest where human liberty was at the lowest ebb. They are now disappearing, vanishing, and falling before the recuperative energies of popular rights. The gabelle fell, in France, before the march of revolution. In England, this unnatural tax, after obtaining the monstrous height of fifteen shillings a bushel, sunk and disappeared before the labors of that pre-eminent committee from whose reports a few imperfect and mutilated extracts have been read. The salt tax disappeared from the United States about twenty years ago, during the auspicious administration of the immortal Jefferson. Even Spain, the last country upon earth in which to look for a liberal example, was an instance of the generous use of salt. The United States alone are now presenting the example of keeping up this odious tax, of keeping it up without necessity, of keeping it up for the oppression of the people, for the protection of monopolizers, for the impoverishment and degradation of the West. But let the people not despair. Relief, though out of sight, is sometimes near at hand. The darkest hour of the night is that which precedes the break of day. In England, in 1801, the first attempt of the friends of the people to reduce the salt tax, was followed by the insult and outrage of raising it. The Pitt administration, to punish and intimidate those who proposed the abolition, immediately raised the duty from ten to fifteen shillings a bushel; but they raised the spirit of the people at the same time, and in a few years the whole oppressive burden fell to the earth.

Resulting from this monopoly, thus established and protected, came the present enormous price of salt. Mr. B. begged Senators to recollect the testimony he had read, and reflect in how many places the sum of 75 cents, or a dollar, or a dollar and a quarter, was exacted from the people for about two pecks and a half of inferior, fire-made, artificial salt, imposed upon them under the scandalized name of a bushel. If the duty was off, he would venture to affirm that the price of pure, sun-made, crystallized salt would not exceed a picailion for a real bushel at New Orleans, and three or four picailions in the central parts of the valley of the Mississippi. His calculation was this: that the import price of this fine salt was, at present, six cents for that of Malta; eight cents for that of Spain and Portugal; nine cents for that of Turk's Island; and that, in the vast increase which the foreign salt trade would assume, and the reduced price of the salt from Turk's Island, (a British possession) in consequence of the direct intercourse with that island, or rather with the five hundred Bahama islands, of which it is the chief, the average price at New Orleans would be six and a quarter cents; freight for salt, as under cargo, was now about one-third of a cent per pound, and would soon be brought by the great boats, during the spring floods, for one-fourth of a cent. Thus, would the price of alum salt, at Louisville, be reduced to about 25 cents a bushel. Low as this would be, a great proportion of the Western farmers would get it on still better terms. Thousands of flat-bottomed boats made without expense, navigated without skill or labor, loaded with every conceivable production of the farm and the forest, and descending from all the confluent streams of the Mississippi, visit New Orleans every winter. The owners are their own factors and commission merchants. They sell out the contents of their boat (which, moored to the levee, and labelled with its contents, serves for warehouse, kitchen, parlor, and bed-room) in the course of the winter months, when they could do but little at home; buy their groceries in the spring, step on board a steamer with their family supplies, and, for six dollars, are at home in eight or ten days, ready to commence the new crop with the return of the vernal season. To all such the acquisition of two or three sacks of pure and perfect salt would be nothing but the exchange of a few loose vegetables, which would have rotted at home.

Mr. B. maintained that the salt tax fell heaviest upon the laboring classes, and upon the poor. They used most salt in proportion to their wealth, and bought at a disadvantage, because they bought in a pinch, in small quantities, at retail prices, raised the money to buy it at a sacrifice, and were most subject to be imposed upon, both as to weight, quality, and price. It was so in England; it is so here. Look at the English testimony! It tells you the tax was harder upon the peasant than the nobleman. Look at the American testimony! It tells you that the people in remote places—the small farmers, remote from great towns, had to pay the highest prices, received the scantiest measure, and suffered most from extortion and imposition. It was in such places, and among such customers, that the weighed bushel of fifty pounds would find ample accommodation for lodging, in a half bushel measure; that the old rusty steelyards were used, that would not preponderate for ten pounds in fifty; that the deficient barrels were obliged to be taken at the marked weight; and that the extortionate prices of one and two dollars for these scant weight bushels, equal to two and four dollars for real measured bushels, and that for well-water salt, impregnated with poisonous ingredients, and only half the strength of sea-water salt, were actually paid by the helpless people, and received by the relentless monopolizers! And yet, in the face of these damning facts, in the midst of the cries of these suffering people, there is a scheme on foot, not only to resist the reduction, but to effect the increase of this diabolical tax! to raise it from ten to fifteen cents.

[Here Mr. B. alluded to the bill in the House of Representatives, to increase the salt tax, and thought this bill ought to be proclaimed throughout the West by a herald and a trumpet, to rouse and alarm the people, and to put them on their guard against the dangers it portended.]

Resulting from this monopoly, and the most degrading of its consequences, was the power to allowance and district the country for the consumption of salt. The Western country was districted and allowanced. All the witnesses prove the mortifying fact. Depots are established, and agents appointed to supply each district. No competition is permitted. No competition can come, except from New Orleans, and that in the season of high water. To prevent the fullness of the supply from operating on the highness of the price, the invention of "dead wells" was made, and a multitude of wells, rented from their owners, have been permitted to stand idle. Nay, more; a further exertion of this invention has exhibited the prodigy of wells suppressed—of unborn wells stifled in the womb of the earth—by hiring and paying people not to dig for their salt water! The consequence of these enormities was, stint in the supply, excess in the price. The country was starved for salt, and made to pay double, in many places quadruple its value. The domestic supply is not equal to one-fifth of the demand. The whole quantity made in the United States, as proved by the returns of the salt-makers themselves to the Secretary of the Treasury, does not exceed five millions of bushels; while the consumption of the country would require thirty millions. The whole product of the West, including Western Pennsylvania and the Holston works in Virginia, do not exceed two and a half millions of bushels, weighed bushels; each of which bushel, with a little packing and heaping, would comfortably establish itself in a half bushel measure.

Mr. B. believed that the stock alone of the United States would require twenty millions of bushels. He bottomed his estimate upon the consumption in England. It was there proved that the stock, independent of the draught horses, and hogs, which had not been included in the estimate, required twenty-two millions of bushels, fifty-six pounds to the bushel, to supply them annually. He felt mortified to know the number of stock in England, for he was speaking of England proper, and not know the number in the United States. He regretted that the return of stock was not included in the census—in the census made by State authority at all events—and especially in the West, where stock constituted so large a proportion of the wealth of the people. In the absence of accurate information, he must proceed upon probable data; and, as the United States was more populous than England, ten times more extensive, and the keeping of stock more easy, he would assume the stock census of England as furnishing, not the criterion of numbers, but the data for calculation; the sheep of the United States being probably one-third, cattle and horses doubtful, and hogs far more numerous. Assuming this calculation for the relative number of stock, the necessity for salt was greater: for the use of green food, and especially wild grass, was more usual in the United States; and this grass was more fresh, or free from saltiness, because, the United States being a continent, and not an island, the saline dews which corrected the freshness of the grass, did not extend to the interior States. Assuming the sheep of the United States to be one-third of the English flock, to wit, ten millions of head, and allowing to each sheep the English supply, of half a pound a week, which made half a bushel a year, and it resulted that the sheep alone of the United States required five millions of bushels of salt per annum! being just as much as the domestic manufacturers made! so that if the population of the Union should be thrown on the domestic supply, and the sheep supplied first, there would not be one grain left for the hogs, horses, cattle, people, and the thousand uses beside, for which salt is indispensable! So much for the domestic supply! It had been computed in England that the supply of salt to the sheep was the saving of six hundred thousand head from dying annually; the loss of Western stock for want of salt cannot be estimated. But it is a point for Western farmers to think of. Let each one make the computation for himself, and consider what his annual loss is in cattle, hogs, sheep, and horses, for want of this condiment to their food; this medicine for their health; this attraction against running wild; and then estimate, if he can, the annual aggregate loss of the nine Western States and Territories.

Mr. B. affirmed that the stint of salt was universal in the West; that it extended to all the operations of the farmer; that it even extended to the pots and tables of the poor! He believed that such an instance of stint, for a necessary of life, did not exist among the negroes of the West India islands. He believed that those negroes received from their masters, cruel as many of them were, a larger and better allowance of salt than the average of Western farmers received from the inexorable monopolists. He said the entire West was a stock-raising country. The farmers there, like the patriarchs of old, estimated their wealth, in a great degree, by the number of their flocks and herds. Before the invention of steamboats, this rich vein of wealth was but slightly and imperfectly developed. Want of salt prevented its development. Common salt could not be had in sufficient quantity for salting the stock. Not a pound of alum salt could be had for curing bacon, preserving butter and cheese, and pickling beef and pork. Foreign salt, of no kind, could enter the vast and fertile regions of the West. Freight, up the Mississippi, in keel boats and barges, was seven or eight cents a pound—across the Alleghany mountains, in wagons, was as much or more; and then commenced, from hard necessity and from absolute want of alum salt, the pernicious and impoverishing practice of driving off beef cattle on the hoof. But steamboats furnish the means of relieving this necessity, of supplying this want, and of terminating this pernicious practice. They are bringing salt from New Orleans at so low a freight, that, if the duty was off, the price to the purchasers, in the central parts of the Great Valley, and that of the pure sea-made salt, would not exceed twenty-five cents per bushel; while, to those farmers who trade down the river, the price could not exceed three picaillons. This cheap importation of pure salt—this unlimited means of importing it at the one thirty-second part of its former freight, was the greatest blessing of all the great blessings which the wonderful invention of steamboats has conferred upon the West. It was the very thing which was lacking to give full development to her richest vein of wealth—richer than the mines of Mexico and Peru—her stock and provision trade! Providence, of its infinite goodness, and to crown the blessings of the great West, sent this miraculous invention to give us that alone which was wanting, and never could have been got without it; the pure muriate of soda; the natural crystallized salt; the native, unmixed product of the sun and sea; the salt of Divine manufactory; as much superior to artificial fire-made salt as the works of God are superior to the works of man! Upon the dispensation of such a Providence, it was to have been expected that the Federal Legislature, to whom the whole power of regulating foreign commerce had been assigned by the States, whether wisely or not, time, and, above all, the continuance of the salt tax, will show, it was to have been expected that the Federal Legislature (that part of it, at all events, which assumed to be the particular friends of domestic industry) would have given all possible aid to the importation of this Heaven-sent salt. A bounty in favor of the ships which brought it, would have rested upon the same constitutional construction, and upon infinitely greater reasons of justice than a bounty in favor of vessels which bring home fish. The greatest exertions might have been expected for the encouragement of this importation. Every reason which the head could conceive, or the tongue could utter, sprung forth in favor of the encouragement; not a single reason that craft and cunning could devise, could be arrayed against it. The whole vocabulary of the "American system" furnished not a word against it: for that system rests upon the basis of making at home, and furnishing to the citizen, the same article, better and cheaper than the imported one! Well, alum salt, which comprehends all crystallized salt, (and all salt made by the sun, and none other, is crystallized,) alum salt is not made in the United States, (a little in the Northeast excepted,) not a pound of it is made in the West, nor any rival to it, nor substitute for it. By consequence, it could not be made cheaper and better at home! The "American system" was for it, instead of being against it, unless it is intended to exclude the industry of the farmer, who raises stock and salts provisions, from the industry to be protected by that system. A bounty might have been expected in favor of every ship that should bring sun-made salt to New Orleans. Instead of that, what have we seen? Federal legislation actually employed to keep this salt away! A hostile and repulsive tax of twenty cents imposed upon every eight cents' worth of this indispensable salt! A requisition upon the ship that brings it, to pay twice and a half its value into the coffers of the Federal Government before that ship is allowed to land it! Bond and security required, when the money cannot be paid down! And this security to be exacted from strangers who have crossed the wide seas to exchange their surplus salt for our surplus provisions! And, in consequence of these heavy and merciless exactions, most of the ships bring stones instead of salt—forced to bring stones by the Federal Government, and realizing the compulsive illustration of the strongest reproach contained in the sacred pages of the Holy Evangelists! They would bring salt for ballast in preference to stones, if the laws would permit them. Many that bring salt, throw it overboard, in the mouth of the Mississippi. When no longer needed for ballast, they throw it into the river, because they are neither able to pay the duty in ready money, nor to give the security which the credit system requires. Is this imagination, or is it reality? It is reality! And no longer ago than the last summer, the troubled waves of the Mississippi, and the dark shades of midnight, were the conscious witnesses of this lamentable fact, of this dire operation of taxing salt out of the land of America! Mr. B. said he had heard of this sacrifice; this new species of immolation, not to propitiate the genius of the river, but to appease the infernal genius of the salt tax, soon after it happened, and had laid it up in his memory for verification. That verification was quickly received; for on his passage to this city, in the month of November last, he fell in at Louisville, Kentucky, with the surveyor and inspector of the port of New Orleans, Major Spotts, formerly of the army, and lately approved by the Senate both as a military and civil officer, and from him received a confirmation of the fact. Two ships, Major Spotts was certain, had thrown their salt overboard; others he suspected of having done so! These ships, thus encountering the risk of forfeiting their cargoes, and incurring all the penalties of violating the revenue laws, in addition to the loss of the salt, because they could neither pay the duties, nor give the security, nor find any body to receive the salt as a gift, with a tax of twenty cents a bushel upon it! At that very moment the whole interior of the West suffering for salt! And for whose benefit are these oppressions practised? For the benefit of a few hundred monopolizers in the West, and a few thousand fishermen in the Northeast! For their benefit, the repeal of the odious tax is not only resisted, but an increase of the oppression is actually demanded!

Mr. B. drew the line of distinction between good and bad salt. It was a line easy to be drawn, for it was the line between the works of nature and the works of man. All salt that was made by boiling, no matter out of what water, was impure and imperfect; for the agitation and the heat prevented crystallization, and retained the poisonous ingredients called slack and bittern; all salt made by the power of the sun was pure and perfect; all the poisonous ingredients having settled to the bottom, and the salt itself forming into lumps by concretion and crystallization. The artificial salt, made by boiling, is good for many purposes; for salting stock, preserving hay and fodder, for daily use in fresh meat and vegetables; and, by help of much smoke and long drying, will save bacon for family use. The natural, sun-made salt was indispensable to pickling beef and pork, and to curing bacon, butter, and cheese for exportation, or the Southern markets. It was of the tax upon this latter kind of salt that he complained so much; a kind of salt so indispensable to the provision trade of the West, and so impossible to be made by the domestic manufacturers. To this part of the argument he invited, and invoked, and almost defied, the response of his opponents. The fire-made salt would not answer the great purposes of the provision trade. It could not be used by the provision curers, if presented to them as a gift. Sun-made salt alone would answer. It must be had, cost what it may; and a tax upon it was an oppression upon the people, without the possibility of producing a domestic supply of the same article. The domestic salt would not answer! All the testimony proved this great and cardinal fact. He would not recapitulate that testimony; but would refer to the circumstance mentioned by the honorable Mr. Lyon, of the House of Representatives, and of which he, Mr. B., was also witness—that of alum salt delivered at Maysville, in November last. This salt had crossed the Gulf of Mexico. It had ascended the Mississippi, in a ship, to New Orleans; then to Louisville, in a steamboat; then to Maysville, in a keel towed by a steamer. It had traversed a thousand miles of gulf, and nineteen hundred miles of river navigation, to reach its point of delivery; and that point in the immediate neighborhood of the great Kenhawa salt works! there to be employed in salting Kentucky pork for exportation, or Southern consumption! How overwhelming and conclusive the bare annunciation of such a pregnant fact! And that no circumstance might be lacking to complete the power of this impressive argument in favor of foreign salt, the company's own steamboat brought it! Thus making themselves public and unanswerable witnesses to the total inefficacy of their own salt, and the absolute necessity of using the foreign!

Mr. B. insisted that the burthen of the salt tax upon the West was aggravated by contrast; for in the Northeast there were drawbacks, bounties, and allowances which more than indemnified the fishing interest for the proportion of the tax which they paid. They were allowed to draw out of the Treasury, at the end of each year, as much money as had been paid, or supposed to have been paid, for duties on the salt employed in curing fish; and under this system of drawbacks and allowances, upwards of five millions of dollars had already been drawn. The vigilant Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. INGHAM,] had discovered large frauds in this business, say to the amount of fifty thousand dollars in a single year; but the laws were yet in force; and while they continued, the leak from the treasury on this account must still amount to a quarter of a million of dollars per annum. The Western States were allowed nothing in the way of drawback of duty on the beef and pork exported by them. These States, therefore, felt the unmitigated weight of the tax, while to their friends in the Northeast it was actually a money-making business. This was unequal and unjust in the extreme,

Duty on Alum Salt.

[SENATE.]

The constitution declared, and, if it did not, the first principle of equity would declare, that taxes should be equal and uniform throughout the Union. But this equality was destroyed when the tax was refunded to one quarter and not refunded to another. It was the same thing as if, in the law imposing it, the levy of the tax should be by sections, omitting one section entirely from the operation of the levy. It would be better in this case to levy by sections, because it has been proved at the treasury that a certain section draws back more than it pays—more than it would have been exempted from if the levy had not reached it. This business of refunding the salt tax to a part of the community, proves the impolicy of levying it at all: for if it is refunded to a part, justice requires it should be refunded to all; and, if it be refunded to all, where is the sense in levying it? The people of the North-east, with whom salted fish is a predominant food, have a drawback of the duty allowed them; the people of the South and West, with whom salted bacon is a predominant food, have no drawback; and thus the operation of the law is unequal as well as oppressive. The remedy for the whole is to abolish the tax, and all the superstructure of drawbacks, bounties, and allowances, which rest upon it.

The farmers, continued Mr. B., are the class most interested in the abolition of this tax; they feel it to the quick; and he could not allude to that meritorious class of citizens without the deepest feelings of sympathy and concern. They were the soul and body of the country. Their labors supplied all the elements of subsistence to man and beast. Their names were to be found upon every list of contribution to the public service. They were found upon the tax list, the muster roll, the jury panel, the road list, the bridge list, and every other list which exacted the payment of money or the performance of service. There was but one list on which their names were not to be found, and that was the list of office! Farmers and offices seldom get together. Their station in the body politic was, front rank for service, rear rank for reward. Surely, a body of men so numerous, and so meritorious, so ready to do, and to suffer for the Government, and so backward to ask favors from it, ought at least to be uninjured by the Government. Laws should not be made against them, if they are not made for them. Fair play, at least, should be their portion. The "laissez nous faire"—"let us alone"—should be their ready granted prayer. Yet, how stands the account with the Federal Government? Their produce loaded with duties in foreign countries—virtually excluded from many of them—by the total failure of Congress to make any attempt to regulate foreign commerce according to the power granted in the constitution, and the declared intention of the States in conferring that power upon Congress! An indispensable ingredient, not only in their wealth, but in their living, and only to be obtained from abroad, loaded with a duty of three times its value, before they can use it at home! The Gulf of Mexico is saturated with the purest salt. Two thousand islands abound with it. The Bahamas alone, about five hundred in number, of which Turk's Island is the chief, lying in the very channel to New Orleans, could glut the valley of the Mississippi at a picailon a bushel. These islanders want our provisions; we want their salt; but the Federal Government gets between the parties, and, by a total neglect of the power to regulate foreign commerce, and a manifest abuse of the power to lay duties, obstructs and prevents the natural and beneficial exchange of commodities to which the wants and superfluities of the respective parties so powerfully attract, and so urgently invites them. The same with land. The Federal Government has got all the land. Invested with the whole domain by the improvidence of the Southern States, it becomes the dog in the manger, and refuses to let the farmers have for its value what itself cannot use. But, to confine these reflections to the matter in hand. The Gulf of Mexico is full of salt; the Western farmers want it; they are debarred its use; and that by a Government whose taxes they pay, whose battles they fight, whose burdens they bear, and whose favors they seldom receive. We have a Committee on Agriculture, so styled, at least, whether by way of antithesis was not for him [Mr. B.] to say; certain it was, the name, if not the design, of the committee should have put them at the head of all the measures for the abolition of the salt taxes, and reduction of the price of refuse lands. He felt himself to be doing the business of that committee, and hoped they would soon be found fellow-laborers and co-operators together.

Farmers, and all the departments of agriculture, are the chief sufferers by the salt duty; but they are not the sole sufferers. Manufacturers suffer also; and it was computed by Sir Thomas Bernard, one of the witnesses examined by the committee of the British House of Commons, that the manufactures of England were annually injured to the amount of the tax derived from salt. Various manufactures require this article, either in its proper shape, or as a chemical preparation. The hard soap alone made in England was computed to require two thousand tons of mineral alkali per annum; and this alkali is obtained by a chemical process, either from salt in its proper state, or from the salt contained in barilla and kelp. To procure two thousand tons of alkali must require a much greater number of tons of salt. The barilla only yields seventeen per cent. of alkali, and kelp six per cent. The decomposition of the salt itself is the cheapest mode of procuring the alkali; and this salt is taxed two or three times its value in the United States, so that the Federal Government has actually established a tax upon cleanliness! for, without soap, people cannot be clean; and, without salt, they cannot have soap. The Committee on Manufactures ought to pursue this subject. Their learned labors, their scientific researches, their practical knowledge, their access to the fountain heads of information, their zeal in the cause, would enable them to give in a list of some fifty manufactures in which salt, or its chemical preparations of alkali, muriatic acid, oxy-muriatic acid, sal ammoniac, &c. &c. &c. is indispensably necessary. To that committee is resigned this branch of the subject; and the confident belief may be entertained that, at the proper time, this zealous committee—this committee no less capable than zealous—will come forward with a mathematical demonstration to prove that the salt tax is an injury to manufactures to the full extent of its own amount, say a million of dollars per annum; and that the prosperity of manufactures loudly demands its total and instant repeal.

Every interest cries aloud; the joint interests of agriculture and manufactures clamor together for the repeal of this tax. It is a tax upon the entire economy of nature and art, upon man and upon beast, upon life and upon health, upon comfort and luxury, upon want and superfluity, upon food and raiment, upon washing and cleanliness! A tax which no economy can avoid, no poverty can shun, no privation escape, no cunning elude, no force resist, no dexterity avert, no prayers can deprecate, no curses repulse! It is a tax which invades the entire dominion of human operations, falling with its greatest weight upon the weakest and most helpless. It is the tax which tyranny invented, in the worst ages of the world, to force from the cultivator of the soil, to wring from the clenched fist of penury, to extract from the mouth of hunger, the last unwilling contribution of vassals to lords. The tories introduced it into England above a hundred years ago. Our necessities compelled us to resort to it, in a small degree, at the commencement of our Government. The federal administration of 1798 ran it up to its highest amount. Jefferson overthrew it. The war of 1815 compelled us to resort to it again. Now we have no war, no federal administration, no necessity, and the disciples of Jefferson are in power. The English whigs have overturned this tory tax in England; cannot whig republicans overturn it here?

Mr. B. repeated, with energy and emphasis, and wished to fix the attention of the Senate, and of all America, fully on the circumstance, that the British Parliament had totally repealed the salt duties of Great Britain. The information collected by the committee of the House of Commons in 1818, effected the immediate overthrow of these duties. The King's ministers withdrew their opposition, impossible as it was for the treasury to do without the product of the duties, and difficult as it was to find a new article of taxation on which the amount might be levied; but they withdrew their opposition, and the bill for the repeal went through both Houses without further debate, and received the approbation of the King the next day. This is what was done upon the prayers of the people, in a country where the people are very imperfectly represented in one branch of the Legislature, not represented at all in the other, and where the chief magistrate who approves the act is an hereditary ruler; where the necessity for the tax was urgent; where the domestic supply of artificial salt was abundant; where the manufacturers of this salt clamored for protection; but where the voice of the people was heard, and every minor interest made to yield to that sacred voice. He quoted this example, and dwelt upon it: for he held it to be impossible that the republican Congress of the United States, without a single restraining motive which operated in Great Britain, could refuse to do for the people of the United States, what King, Lords, and Commons, had done for the subjects of the British Crown.

Mr. B. then explained the provisions of his bill. He said it proposed, in the first place, to make the reduction to ten cents (now provided for by law) take effect on the first day of April ensuing, instead of the last day of December next. The last day of December happened to be the most unfavorable season that could be found in the whole year. It was "the day after the feast." Hog killing time, which created the great demand for salt, was just over, so that the duty was kept up to the very moment that it pressed hardest. The true season for the reduction to take effect was the spring, the month of April, when the rivers of the West were all flooded, and the returning steamboats, and the citizens who had gone down to New Orleans on trading voyages, could bring up supplies for the ensuing fall. The second reduction in the bill was to take effect in April, 1832, and the duty to cease entirely in April, 1833—requiring about two years to complete the entire abolition of the tax. This was a slow process compared to what took place in Mr. Jefferson's time. The whole tax was then abolished at two reductions, and both made in one single year; and, while that great friend of the people remained at the head of affairs, no more salt tax was heard of in America. Mr. B. hoped that this would soon be the case again; that two or three years more would exhibit this favored land emancipated from the salt tax, and enable every farmer to give food to his family, salt to his stock, and send his provisions to market, without paying a daily and hourly tax to the Federal Government.

Mr. B. would make no apology for detaining the Senate on this subject. He knew it was felt by many as an intrusion. Other operations had gotten into fashion, and suffered impatient interruption, while an hour's attention was claimed for the people. Still he would make no apology. He stood upon his rights, which gave him authority to discuss the affairs of the people. He took post upon the words of the constitution, which created the Congress for the express purposes of legislation. He knew himself to be backed by those whose backing was worth having; he felt himself to be cheered by those plaudits which were unbought and unpurchaseable. He should proceed as long as he felt that backing and heard that cheering. He would proceed, with the blessing of God and the approbation of the people, until two great objects should be accomplished—till the salt tax was abolished, and the price of refuse land reduced!

Mr. SMITH, of Md., made a few remarks on the subject. He said that he was in favor of repealing the duty on salt, and had already introduced a bill repealing the duties on that article, among many others; but that he should be compelled to vote against the bill unless amended, inasmuch as it contemplated a repeal of the duty on alum salt alone, which was produced nowhere but at Turk's Island, while salt imported from all other places, England in particular, would be excluded from its benefits.

Mr. BENTON rose to reply, when he was interrupted by the PRESIDENT, who gave it as his opinion that the bill could not, according to the rules of the Senate, be introduced while there was a bill, the one noticed by the gentleman from Maryland, contemplating the same measure, lying on the table.

Mr. BENTON replied, that the bill he sought to introduce was for the repeal of the duty on a particular kind of salt, alum; while that of the gentleman from Maryland was to repeal the duty on salt in general. He, therefore, thought the measures were essentially different.

The PRESIDENT decided that the object of both bills as to the article of salt, was precisely the same; and that the leave asked by the gentleman from Missouri was not in order.

Mr. BENTON said he felt so confident of the correctness of the opinion he had formed, and so deeply impressed with the importance of the measure, that he must appeal to the Senate from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMES asked for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered.

Mr. HAYNE observed that the question of order which had just arisen was a new and important one. As he, and he believed other Senators, wished an opportunity to examine into the rules of the Senate before voting on the question, he hoped the subject would, by general consent, be laid on the table; which was done.

JAMES MONROE.

The bill for the adjustment and payment of the claims of James Monroe, was taken up, and read a second time.

Mr. HAYNE moved its reference to a select committee, on the ground of the peculiar nature of the claim.

Mr. NOBLE moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims, but expressed his decided opinion against its ultimate passage.

Mr. HAYNE replied, that the rules of their proceeding, when any measure of a peculiar character came before them, directed that a particular committee should be appointed for its consideration. The claims of Mr. Monroe were of a peculiar description, and the Committee of Claims, with the vast business they had on hand, could not have time to investigate them before the close of the present session. When these claims were on a former occasion before the Senate, they had been referred to a select committee, of which he was a member; and from this he knew that their investigation would be attended with considerable difficulty, and would require the attention of a select committee, to be confined to themselves alone. In advocating the appointment of a select committee, at this state of the bill, he expressed no opinion whatever on its merits.

Mr. BELL was of opinion that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., as he understood from the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] that the subject had before been referred to a select committee, was of opinion it was better to follow the same course at present.

The question was then put on Mr. NOBLE'S amendment, when it was negatived; and a ballot being taken,

Pay of Navy Officers.—Post Office Department.

[SENATE.]

MESSRS. HAYNE, SANFORD, FRELINGHUSEN, BELL, and BREDELL, were appointed a select committee.

PAY OF NAVY OFFICERS.

The resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. BARNARD, of Pennsylvania, concerning the pay of masters commandant and first lieutenants, was taken up.

Mr. B. stated that the object of his resolution was that the Naval Committee should inquire into the necessity of increasing the pay of masters commandant and first lieutenants. The bill of last session on the subject of the Navy, which had been reported, was of a general description, and had not been acted upon. It was well known that masters commandant were inadequately paid, considering the nature of the duties they had to perform, and that first lieutenants had no higher pay than junior lieutenants, who had not the same responsibility, and, in comparison, but trifling services to perform. Mr. B. further stated, that it was his object to have a medium pay fixed, for the former officers, of seventy-five dollars per month, and six dollars for rations, in place of the present pay, which varied from a lower to a higher scale; and also to raise the pay of first lieutenants in proportion.

Mr. HAYNE suggested to the gentleman the propriety of modifying his resolution—in its present form, it could be of no effect. There was no necessity for making inquiry on the subject: the bill which had passed the Senate last year, though, from its general nature, it had failed in the House, had settled the principle that a graduated scale was necessary. Than the officers of the rank mentioned, none better deserved an increase of pay. No officers had a greater share of duties to perform than the masters commandant; and it was also true that first lieutenants, though of long standing, and placed in such a responsible situation in the commanding of a ship, were no better paid than junior lieutenants of yesterday. He would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BARNARD,] so to change his resolution, as to direct the committee to report a bill in reference to officers of the above named ranks, and a bill of this abstract description was likely to be forwarded, when a bill of a more genial nature might not succeed.

Mr. BARNARD acquiesced in the suggestion, and the resolution was modified to read as follows, and thus adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to bring in a bill to provide for increasing the pay and emoluments of masters commandant in the Navy of the United States; and also of allowing additional compensation to lieutenants, when acting as first lieutenants of a ship of the line, frigate, or sloop of war, according to the rate of the vessel.

The remainder of the sitting was spent in Executive business.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

Mr. GRUNDY said that, at the last session of Congress a report was received from the Postmaster General, and, in consequence of the absence, at the time of its receipt, of the gentleman who made the call, it was laid on the table. He now moved that the report be printed for the use of the Senate. The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The resolution declaring that the select committee appointed to examine the present condition of the Post Office Department, were not authorized to call before them persons removed from office, for the purpose of ascertaining the causes of their removal, was again taken up.

Mr. GRUNDY concluded his speech in support of the resolution. [The remarks made by Mr. G. to-day are included in the report of his speech under the head of Monday.]

Mr. HENDRICKS (another member of the committee of inquiry) next rose. He said he would detain the Senate with a very few remarks; and, but for a notice by the chairman, of certain proceedings of the committee, when he was not present, he did not know that he should have mingled at all, at this time, in the debate. Absence from the committee, at any time, might, unexplained, be considered a dereliction of duty, with which he did not feel himself in the least degree chargeable. It was well known to the chairman, as well as to the other members of the committee, that, previous to any knowledge of the meeting alluded to, he had been notified to meet the Committee on Indian Affairs, a standing committee of the Senate, of which he was a member. This fact he had communicated to the chairman of the select committee, before the meeting had been called. This much he had thought proper to say, in explanation of the reasons of his absence from the committee that morning.

It was not his purpose, said Mr. H., to go into an examination then of the condition of the General Post Office, for that was a duty confided to the committee, which had not yet been performed; that, on the fragments of testimony as yet before the committee, he, for one, would not form any definite opinion, and he would not prejudge the case. The committee had closed the testimony on no one single point. The testimony of Abraham Bradley, the first witness, had not been closed. Mr. H. here spoke of the late Postmaster General, and said, that of him he had a most exalted opinion. He believed him to be an honest man; an upright and efficient officer. He remarked that as to the present Postmaster General, he would not, at this time, pass either censure or eulogy; that in doing either he should feel himself prejudging the case before the evidence had been heard. The committee had a large field before them; had taken as yet but little testimony, compared with that thought necessary; and that so far there was no testimony before the committee to criminate the Postmaster General. This remark he thought proper to make, for, from the journal of the committee, frequently referred to, he had been seen voting very broad, and almost unlimited inquiries, answers to which might seriously implicate the Postmaster General; inquiries of which the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire had complained to the Senate. He had, at the instance of the chairman, voted interrogatories, based on the allegations of persons unknown and unnamed to the committee; he had sanctioned questions which did not appear to him very necessary, because other members of the committee thought them so, and it was proper for him to say that this course was not based on any testimony given to the committee, of existing maladministration in the department, but was taken in order to give free and expanded scope to the examination, that misdemeanor, if it existed, might be ferreted out, or, that rumor with her hundred tongues might be hushed into silence. Justice required this to prevent erroneous impressions from the course he was pursuing; and while he thus acted, and should now vote, against the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and wish the inquiry to progress, he should feel himself bound, now, and at all times, to do justice.

He was somewhat surprised to hear the proceedings of the committee thus far exhibited before the Senate; for it had been agreed, that until they should be given in the form of a report, they should remain exclusively with the committee. But of this he would not complain, for every thing done by him in committee had been done from the house top; and nothing for concealment. The chairman, however, had thought proper to suggest, and somewhat in the tone of complaint, that a modification of one question, calling on the Postmaster General for the causes of removal, had been made. He says that, in the interrogatory referred to, the causes of removal in each individual case are not required, and that the Postmaster General is requested to classify the causes for brevity's sake. Mr. H. said he had voted for this modification, wishing to make a report at the present session, and believing that without the modification it would be impossible for the department to answer the call before the 4th of March. How correct he was in that opinion, the communication from the Department to the committee would show. Mr. HENDRICKS here read as follows:

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
January 31, 1831.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 18th and of the 27th instant.

"The preparation of the statement necessary to a reply to the interrogatories formerly submitted by the committee, was immediately commenced, and has been unremittingly prosecuted by the department. It has required not only the application of all the disposable force of the department, delaying some of its important current business, but has employed unremittingly several additional clerks: when the work is completed, it will be forthwith submitted to the committee. I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

"W. T. BARRY.

"HON. MR. CLAYTON, Chairman, &c."

Mr. H. said he might, however, here state, that he believed but one member of the committee thought this a matter of any great consequence. All the members except the one propounding the interrogatory, viewed the question as one of comparatively small importance. This he knew to be the opinion of the chairman. Nor could he see the difference for any practical result, between the question modified, and the question as it was originally framed; for, if fifty postmasters were removed for precisely the same cause, the statement of that cause once, as applicable to the list, would surely be as certain and satisfactory, as if that cause had been stated fifty times, and the statement appended to each name.

The narrative of one or two incidents in committee, he thought somewhat incorrect. Every thing had not been related precisely as recollected by him. On the suggestions contained in a letter to one of the Senators from Virginia, charging the Postmaster General with malconduct about some Southern contracts, and referring to affidavits and witnesses, it was proposed to send for several witnesses to Virginia. This letter had been handed round among the members of the committee, and a meeting called. It was instantly determined in committee to send for the witnesses; but, on the confident statement of a member, that the testimony, the very affidavits spoken of in the letter, were to be had at the post office, it was thought best to procure the affidavits first; and the diversity of opinion in committee was, not whether the witnesses should be sent for if needed, but whether the documentary testimony should first be procured from the department. It was remarked, that the documents ought first to be procured, and then, if these were not satisfactory, we would incur the expense of sending for the witnesses, and this opinion prevailed. The chairman and the Senator from Tennessee were required by the committee to perform the duty of going to the post office and procuring the affidavits, which duty the Senate had been told was not yet performed; and if there were any delay in this, the Senate would see that it laid at the door of the Senators from Delaware and Tennessee. The sense and the vote of the committee were, that the persons should be forthwith sent for, if the papers were not satisfactory; and after all this, well understood as he supposed, it seemed to him somewhat strange that the chairman in this should feel himself justified in talking about delay.

One other instance in which the facts, as they occurred, had been misapprehended. The meeting of the committee at which the examination of Mr. Bradley was commenced, had been named, and his motion to adjourn cited as a measure of delay. He had been represented as giving reasons for that motion; but whatever incidental conversation might have taken place about that time, he had given no reason for his motion to adjourn. He would have been saved the trouble of noticing this, if it had been stated that the committee had met in the afternoon, after a long session of the Senate, and had continued in committee some considerable time after candle-lighting. This the Senate would no doubt say was a sufficient reason for adjournment. There was no probability of being able to get through with the testimony of Mr. Bradley that night, and the committee then thought, as they have thought ever since, that night sessions on this business were unreasonable, and too laborious, and have had none of them since.

In conclusion, Mr. H. said, that the whole matter had confirmed him in a belief of the correctness of his vote originally given, for referring this examination to the standing committee. That was the committee which ought to have been charged with this duty. With the affairs of that department, the standing committee must necessarily be more familiar than the select committee could possibly be. It was their ordinary business and duty to examine into and understand the condition of the General Post Office. To a select committee the whole business was entirely new.

From what had been said, it would readily be seen that the committee were employed in a most laborious examination; and should the Senate pass the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee, the committee would be relieved from much of its burden. He could not, however, vote for the resolution. He entered upon the duties required of the committee with great reluctance, but, having proceeded thus far, he was inclined to go through. Let us not, said Mr. H., waste the time of the Senate in debating the matter now. The Senator from Delaware was the first who moved in this business. He had repeatedly said that there was good reason for believing in the maladministration of the department, and said, let us have light. He would not undertake, at this time, to say any thing about the maladministration of the department, but with the Senator from Delaware he would vote against the resolution before the Senate, and proceed in the business of the committee. He would not consent to stop at the present point, and publish this discussion to the world, to become a political text-book, instead of authentic facts and testimony. Something had been said in committee about large extra allowances to contractors in this neighborhood. This allegation he wished to inquire into. Suggestions, too, had been made of similar improprieties in the State he had the honor to represent. This matter he wished to know all about. He was anxious to know if there were any serious evil in the department; any thing seriously to militate against the passage of the post route bill, now, and last session too, before Congress. The department should, if possible, sustain its own weight. He was far, however, from believing that it ought to be looked to as a source of revenue. Intelligence, and the convenience of the people, were its chief objects. He was anxious that the post route bill should pass, and for one, if that measure were necessary, he would vote an appropriation to meet the expense. It was his wish that the new settlements of his own State should be supplied with the mail, and in that point of view felt an interest in the whole matter which others might not feel.

Mr. CLAYTON again took the floor. It is, said he, with unfeigned reluctance that I rise for the purpose of again engaging in a discussion of a resolution of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee. Laboring as I do at this time under considerable indisposition, it would be much more agreeable to my feelings, if consistent with my sense of duty, to suffer those who originated this debate to "form their political text-book for the year," as the gentleman from Indiana has phrased it, without any attempt on my part to mar its beauties or correct its errors; but the remarks which I had the honor to address to the Senate on this subject have been so grossly perverted, and the real state of the funds of the Post Office Department, as they appear from the documents before us, has been so incorrectly represented by the members from New Hampshire and Tennessee, [Messrs. WOODBURY and GRUNDY,] that I am again compelled to trespass upon the indulgence of this honorable body.

Before I proceed to discharge this necessary duty, suffer me, sir, briefly, to notice an observation which fell from the member from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON,] in the course of a debate on the salt tax, originated by him, and which you then pronounced to be disorderly. He was pleased to say that the Senate ought not to deny him a hearing on his important motion to abolish the duty on alum salt, while they so willingly consented to this investigation, "which engaged them as petty constables in ferreting out crimes of which they might afterwards become judges." There was nothing, sir, in the source from which this sprung, in the manner in which it was made, or in the occasion which gave it birth, that would have entitled it to any notice from me, but for the repetition of the argument involved in it, that the Senate ought not to inquire into impeachable matter. That argument, sir, has been urged by the Senator from New Hampshire, and supported by the gentleman from Tennessee, to deprive the committee of the power of ascertaining the principles upon which your Postmaster General has removed so many hundreds of officers from his department. If it has not been sufficiently met and answered already, it was because such an argument was not deemed worthy of any labored reply. It is not every hypocritical pretence which ingenuity can resort to for the purpose of screening guilt or condemning innocence; not the complaint of every sycophant who bends before power, and who would prostrate the dignity of the Senate while he affects to mourn over its fall, that merits an answer from me. But to the gentleman from Tennessee, who represents the highly respectable Legislature which elected him, and who doubtless thinks there is weight in this objection when he presses it, I answer that the object of the whole inquiry, as expressed on the face of the resolution, under the authority of which he and I are acting as members of a committee, is to enable us to legislate; that it was not instituted to lay the foundation for any impeachment; that the right which the Senate enjoys as a co-ordinate branch of the whole legislative power of the Union, involves the right to inquire into any and every abuse in all the departments of the Government which legislation can reach, and which Congress ought either to limit or prevent. The power to inquire whether a law be necessary, must be incident and subsidiary to the power to make it.

His reasoning to screen the Postmaster General from this investigation proves too much. It would prevent us from examining the conduct of all those subordinate officers of this Government, who are as liable to impeachment as the President or chiefs of departments. The gentleman from Maine has justly remarked that the Senate is, for some purposes, a judicial, for others an executive, and for others a legislative body. It exercises all the powers incident to each of these capacities, independently of others. Was it ever heard that the Senate forbore to counsel and advise the President in their executive character, because they might thereby prejudge matters which, by possibility, might afterwards be submitted to them as legislators? Should we refuse to hear a word to convince us of the necessity of passing an act to prevent, by increasing the penalties for extortion in our public officers, because we might be called upon to try them as judges? Did we refuse to decide in our judicial capacity a question of contempt, because such a bill as has since been introduced, to regulate the law of contempt, might be brought before us? The argument, if it deserve the name of one, would subvert the power, and obstruct the whole action of the Senate. In all such cases the objection of prejudg-ing is met and crushed by the antagonizing consideration, that our duty to the people, and our oaths to support the magna charta of their liberties, require of us to close every avenue against the possible abuse of power, and to expose and restrain every encroachment upon their rights. Sir, there are, perhaps, a hundred cases appearing on our records, in which inquiries have been made here into abuses of the Government, for the purposes of legislation; and it is not too much to say that this is the first time, in the history of this body, when such an objection has been advanced to screen a public officer from a fair and full investigation of the principles which have regulated his official conduct. It is no less striking than novel, too, that the friends of the Postmaster General should betray such great sensitiveness, lest the examination of the committee should lead to his impeachment. When that committee was appointed in the early part of this session, it was vauntingly urged by his friends here, that they defied the investigation, and courted the inquiry. Their cry was, "none but the galled jade winces." "Examine every thing, and you will find all right." The original resolution directing the inquiry into the entire management of the department, was adopted with an air of triumph, though the anxiety to avoid the scrutiny of a select committee did not very well comport, as I thought then, sir, with the lofty and sounding phrases which accompanied it. When the trial begins, we see that a new light is suddenly shed on the question then decided. A part of the power which was delegated on the committee, must be now revoked. The light begins to shine too brightly, and the cry is, we are afraid you will disclose impeachable matter. In other words, the fear is, that the Postmaster General has so grossly violated the law and the constitution, that if we suffer your committee to examine his principles of official action, with a view to restrain him, we may be compelled to try him on an impeachment! I will not deny this, sir, because it has, doubtless, been permitted to these gentlemen to learn much more of the secrets of his department than myself; and, as I do not love to contradict gentlemen when I can avoid it, I agree that the apprehensions they express may be well grounded. If the proof be not arrested, a scene of barter and juggling for office may be disclosed, the like of which never before disgraced this or any other country. It may be, that the people will stand aghast at it, and every honest man of the political party which has elevated the chief of this department to his present station, shall view this scene of political corruption with horror! Does the department cower under these charges, sir? Does it, in the face of an honest but deluded people, still shun the light under the hypocritical pretence that we cannot inquire into impeachable matter! Yes, sir, it dare do this; and it has found a supporter here, who, while he expresses his fears that we are ferreting out crimes of which we may afterwards become judges, denounces us as petty constables for our trouble. Yet, be it remembered that this comes from the chairman of the Committee on Executive Patronage; and, as the Senator from Maine, who was a member of it, has alleged, without contradiction, in the debate here, from the very author of the report of that committee, which, in 1826, examined every department of the Government for abuses, and reported six bills to check the current of Executive power, with a voluminous exposition of facts and alleged crimes, to lay the foundation of legislative interference. Look at the report! One of the bills contains a clause to compel the President to assign the causes for every removal from any office referred to in that bill. It was not only deemed proper, then, to disclose impeachable matter, but necessary to compel that disclosure for executive as well as legislative purposes. Now, the very course recommended at that time is right for no purpose. Another of these bills provided that no postmaster, where the profits of his office amount to a certain sum, shall be appointed to or removed from office but by the President and Senate. The argument in favor of this bill then pressed upon the people, was, that the influence and patronage of the department were so vast, that it had become one of the "arbiters of human fate" in this country, and could no longer be safely trusted to a single individual. The committee, instead of telling us they were afraid to ferret out crimes, say they "hold themselves to be acting in the spirit of the constitution, in laboring to multiply the guards, and close the avenues to the possible abuse of power;" and the impeachable matter which is now so objectionable a feature in this inquiry, was then so glorious a discovery, that six thousand copies of the report were printed by the Senate, and scattered throughout the country. We see here who were the "petty constables" of that day; and if a change of times has not produced a change of principle too, we shall now proceed fearlessly in ferreting out abuses of every description which we can reform or inhibit. If, for doing so, we receive the appellation of petty constables, let us rely for our reward on the approbation of our consciences and our country, taking care to merit no more humble title than that of honest constables, who never charge double compensation for their trouble.

But it is alleged that this question was decided by the Senate at the last session, when they refused to inquire into the causes which induced the President to sweep the list of civil officers, and the aid of precedent is invoked to effect a suppression of this investigation. Sir, I am not aware that this Senate has, in the gloomiest period of subserviency to Executive will, decided the abstract principle, that even the President is above the law, or that his principles of action, while administering the constitution, are not liable to investigation. I know well, that, in the executive sessions during the last year, inquiries, in particular cases of removal, were repeatedly refused, some thinking the inquiries inexpedient in those particular instances. The power of the representatives of the States was held in slight estimation by the advocates of Executive influence at that day, it is most true; but even then no man pretended that all the subordinate officers of the Government should be covered with the same ægis which protected their chief. The argument then was, sir, that the President was answerable only to the people who elected him at the polls, and not to their representatives—a distinction to which I never bowed with any respect, and which I still think is entitled to none. But the chiefs of departments are neither elected by the people nor the States, nor answerable to either in any other way than through their representatives here, by whom their whole powers are conferred. The Postmaster General, like the rest of these chiefs, is an officer unknown to the constitution, and the creature of the law only. Congress enacted the law which constitutes his whole authority for action. It made him. It can repeal that law and unmake him. Upon the very principles conceded by those who sheltered your President from scrutiny, the chief of this department is amenable, like every other creature of the law, to his creators. And if not, then is every other executive officer of this Government at all times, and under all circumstances, above the very law which established his office. You cannot, on this principle, investigate the conduct of the most petty officer in the customs, without invading the royal prerogative; and the principle that the "King can do no wrong," which even England knows only in theory, is here transferred to every subordinate of the Government, until every "pelted petty officer" becomes a tyrant, amenable to no human tribunal but the will of his political chief.

There does not exist in this Government a department which, by law, is held so irresponsible to Congress, or the people, as the post office. It disburses, annually, from its own funds, $1,932,000 among the people; of which $593,000 is paid to postmasters, all subject to be removed for a smile or a frown, at any moment, by its chief. The sum of $1,274,000 is paid for transportation of the mail, to individuals who are equally liable, for a smile or a frown, to be embarrassed by the regulations of the department, (such, for instance, as the loss of a single trip,) and driven from its employment. If a soldier of the revolution apply for a scanty pittance of one hundred dollars per annum, his claim must be scrutinized, and the will of Congress, tardily expressed, must sanction the compensation, or it is lost. But how many thousands are disbursed by the chief of this department, at his will, under the name of extra compensation to contractors and officers, of which no account is rendered to Congress or the people? The items composing the immense expenditure of $1,274,000, are no where laid before the public; and it is alleged that, in the disposition of it, the grossest abuses of unrestrained power have been committed. What check, what control do you, can you, now exercise over this vast disbursement of the public treasure? Is there any department, of this or any other Government, whose means of controlling public opinion are so ample, that it is subject to no check or limit? A nod from its chief now creates, at any moment, a new clerk, with a salary of a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, or drives him from office, and you are not even consulted as to the propriety of the measure; nay, you remain in utter ignorance of the fact, for the annual report does not condescend to give you a single item in the whole mass of these disbursements. In addition to all this, more than sixty-three thousand dollars are annually paid away, under the head of "Incidental Expenses," at the will of this chief of a department; and there is not a man on this floor who can state the number, and the substance, of even the principal items which compose it. All that you know of it is, that, in the report, a part of the mighty expenditure of nearly two millions of dollars, which this department annually lavishes upon twenty-six thousand officers and agents, is stated to be composed of "Incidental Expenses!" Sir, is it possible that it can escape a thinking intellect, how easy a part of these immense sums might be paid away to a hiring agent for an electioneering tour, under the pretence of public duty? Is it, dare it be, denied, that there are secret agents in the employment of this chief, whose compensation, defrayed out of the public purse, is regulated by his sole control, and whose services are never made known to the people, or their representatives here? Yet, in addition to all these expenditures, the department draws annually from the treasury the sum of sixty-one thousand two hundred and ninety-one dollars, to pay the salaries of certain officers and agents, and what are called "contingent expenses" of the department, making the whole actual annual disbursement of $1,993,993 95. And, to crown the climax, Congress is now asked (and a bill lies before me which has actually been reported for the purpose) to increase the pay of the present officers to an amount never known before, by more draughts on the treasury, and to authorize the present Postmaster General to create as many new clerks as he pleases, each with a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum, to be paid, not from the funds of the department, but from the treasury!* Is it not right to inquire, then, for what specific objects these expenditures have been made? why the same labor which was performed by the old officers, cannot now be done for the same compensation? and upon what principles the department has been regulated in constituting the recipients of its bounty, or removing the objects of its aversion?

* On the 26th February, the department sent into the Senate an estimate for extra clerk hire, amounting to twenty thousand dollars, which was inserted in the appropriation bill, and makes the draught on the treasury, to sustain the department this year, eighty-one thousand dollars.

FEB. 9, 1831.]

Post Office Department.

[SENATE.]

It so happened, sir, that, in the course of the few remarks which I yesterday found it necessary to submit in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, who introduced this resolution, and commenced this debate, I entered into some calculation of the state of the available funds of this department. I did so, as I then distinctly stated, with a view to explain the causes which had induced this investigation, and to exhibit the necessity of ascertaining the truth or untruth of what public rumor had most confidently alleged—that the declension of the public treasure there, was owing to the removal of so many experienced and faithful agents. To this course, sir, that unflinching champion and advocate of the department, the gentleman from New Hampshire, has taken great exception. He chooses to assume that I, by the mere statement of what appears on the official records, (for I did nothing more,) have charged the department with corruption and fraud. That is a result, sir, to which I might arrive by the aid of that evidence which the honorable gentleman has refused the committee to hear. I would not prejudice the whole case, however, while I rejected the testimony, or before it was heard. But, if the charge of an expenditure unprecedented in the annals of the department necessarily implies, as he seems to consider, a charge of fraud and corruption, then, sir, that charge is sustained by evidence which twenty times his force can neither suppress nor discredit. The official report shows the amount of expenditures for the last year to be $150,574 38 more than was ever expended in any previous year. To counteract the effect of this single fact, the member from New Hampshire boasts that the receipts of the department have exceeded those of the preceding year by the sum of three hundred thousand dollars. Now, sir, he who affects, with such an air of triumph, to call my attention to “dates and figures,” should be a little more careful in reference to them himself. The great difficulty with this sounding declaration is, that it is not true. The Postmaster General’s own report, in the first ten lines of it, proves how miserably the member is mistaken. The receipts for the last year were $1,850,580 10; those of the preceding year were $1,707,418 42; and the difference in the receipts is $143,164 68. The receipts for the year ending the 1st of July, 1828, were $1,598,877 95, a sum which is less than that for 1830, by $251,705 15 only. When the gentleman, in the excess of his zeal to lavish encomiums on the department, only doubled the real excess of revenue of 1830 over that of 1829, and supposed he was thereby casting the predecessor of Mr. Barry into the shade, we must, in charity, suppose that he had forgotten that the real ratio of increase of revenue, since the latter came into office, had fallen short of that of former years. I do not suppose, sir, that he wilfully stated one hundred and forty-three thousand dollars to be three hundred thousand dollars, but I do suppose that some one had informed him that this statement was correct. The fact is, the increase was two per cent. less than usual. In a country where the increase of population is so rapid as in ours, where the demand of all classes for intercourse through the mail is constantly growing, the revenue for postage must, and will, if proper attention be bestowed upon it, annually increase in a corresponding ratio; and a Postmaster General, whose advocate can rest his pretensions to public confidence upon no better evidence than that increase which must be inevitable, affords but slender cause for his advocate to shout victory before the battle is begun.

In connexion with this subject, the member then proceeds to reply to my remark, that, from the statement of the Postmaster General himself, the department is unable to meet the public demand for post routes; and that, if that statement be true, unless some change should occur in the administration of its affairs, it would soon reach the period of its bankruptcy. Now, sir, to substantiate my position, suffer me to refer the member to a few passages in only two of Mr. Barry’s communications to Congress, which cover the whole ground. In March, 1830, he writes to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, of the other House, as appears by the printed report of that committee, in vol. 3d of the reports of the House of Representatives, No. 361, that, on the 1st day of April, 1829, the available funds of the department amounted to two hundred and eighty thousand and sixty-five dollars, being the sum which he thus admits Mr. McLean had left, after paying all the expenses of the department during his administration;* and, at the same time, he admits that, during all former periods of its history, “all the expenses of transportation, and others incident to this department, have been defrayed by its own resources, without any appropriation, at any time, to meet them, from the treasury.” But, in addition to this, he admits that Timothy Pickering, Joseph Habersham, Gideon Granger, Return J. Meigs, and John McLean, had actually paid into the treasury of this nation the sum of $1,103,063, no part of which had ever been drawn by the department; but which had remained in the treasury to augment the revenue, and strengthen the arm of the Government. Then, in the same document, he informs the committee, that “now the greatest possible frugality is necessary in the management of the concerns of the department, and without any considerable improvement in mail facilities for, it is believed, at least three years to come, to make the department sustain itself in its present operations, without any increase in the number of mail routes!” He proceeds to inform them that the two hundred new mail routes, then called for, would cost eighty-six thousand dollars, (the treasury, of course, to pay for them, as the department could not,) and concludes the paragraph by saying, “It is not, however, apprehended, that the existing state of the department, and a continuation of the accommodations already in operation, though its expenses, for the present, greatly exceed its current income, will require any assistance beyond what will arise from its progressive increase of revenue; but, as before stated, with adequate vigilance, the resources of the department are believed to be equal to its present exigencies.” Here, then, we see that, in March last, such was the embarrassment of the department, that, for the first time in the history of its administration, its funds were equal only to its then existing exigencies, without a cent to defray the expense of the mail routes which were called for from all parts of the country. Before that time, we all know, that “all the expenses of transportation were defrayed (and promptly too) from its own resources.” Then it could only, by great frugality, “sustain itself in its present operations,” without being able to pay for any new mail routes or mail facilities for three years to come! After this, sir, comes the important question, have the funds of the department increased since the date of this document? So far from it, your Postmaster General, in his last annual report, tells you, that since that time, and during the year ending on the 1st day of July, 1830, its expenditures have exceeded its income $82,124 85; and the two hundred and eighty thousand dollars which his predecessor had left, were then reduced down to one hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars. From the Postmaster General's answer to a call of the other House, made last year, to ascertain the excess of expenditure which occurred in the three last quarters of Mr. McLean's administration, it appears, that the excess for the first quarter of the new administration, which commenced on the 1st of April, and ended on the 1st July, 1829, was thirty-two thousand dollars, which, added to the eighty-two thousand dollars, the excess for the ensuing year shows that, in the first fifteen months of his administration, the funds of the department were reduced one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars. I commend the gentleman of "dates and figures" to an examination of these stubborn facts; and when he has learned them, I may pray his opinion on the question, whether, from the records before us, the department is not verging to insolvency, and already rendered inadequate to the purposes of its creation. Sir, he, and his friend from Tennessee, may paint an inch thick, yet to this complexion it must come at last, unless they mean to contend that the Postmaster General has either wilfully or ignorantly misrepresented the state of the funds; and I leave them to choose which branch of this comfortable dilemma may to them appear most expedient to hang upon in his further defence.

* Mr. McLean, in his communication to the committee, dated February 26, 1831, states, that when he left the office, the surplus funds amounted to $289,140 17, making nine thousand dollars more than the amount stated by Mr. Barry. He also states the whole amount of the excess of expenditures above the receipts, from July 1, 1828, to April 1, 1829, to have been but $39,312 90, including $5,832 15 expended for the new post office building, which he says ought to have been a charge on the treasury. Mr. Barry states this excess, during the same time, at $42,863 95. See 4th vol. State Papers, 1st session 21st Congress, document No. 118,

At the same time, sir, let me by no means be understood to admit that the present Postmaster General's statement of the available funds left by his predecessor is correct. His predecessor stated the amount of these available funds to have been, on the 1st day of July, 1828, 332,000 dollars, after deducting all desperate accounts. But his successor, in his report to Congress, reduces this sum (by deducting for losses since ascertained, and for expenditures) to 280,000 dollars, on the 1st day of April, 1829. Whether this does not exhibit these funds at the time his predecessor left the office in an unfair light, yet remains to be ascertained. What these newly discovered losses consisted of; whether they had not been previously taken into the estimate by his predecessor, and upon what principle that estimate was made, all remain to be examined; and I hope we shall ascertain them yet, although the gentlemen from Tennessee and New Hampshire have, as we have seen before, refused to hear the evidence of the solicitor of the department on this important branch of the subject. If these funds have been incorrectly represented to Congress by the present Postmaster General, I shall not stop to inquire whether his diminution of them was made with a view to disparage his predecessor, upon whose official reputation he evidently put a slight estimate in his first report, nor whether he purposes to place the sum he has deducted from Mr. McLean's estimate futurally to his own credit as a financier; but if the funds do exist, in spite of his report to the contrary, why do all his friends in both Houses oppose the passage of the post route bill, on the ground that he has not the money to defray the expense of establishing the routes?

But further, sir. My position being fully sustained by the Postmaster General's own statements, I ask the gentlemen who undertake to decide the matter referred to us in his favor before the investigation is begun, why is it, that now, for the first time in the history of the department, it is unable to defray the expenses of mail transportation on the new routes, which the public have demanded by their petitions here, and which have swelled to about three hundred? It was boasted by the gentlemen, that the Postmaster General had collected more revenue last year than was ever obtained before in a single year. And the member from Tennessee dwelt with heartfelt delight upon the fact, that the present postmaster of this city, who was appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the removal of Mr. Munroe, had collected a larger sum in a given time, than the latter did in the corresponding time preceding it. This, sir, with deference to the gentleman, is so small a business, although the Postmaster General has, as we see, found a friend here to make the call for the information with a view to effect, that I should not notice it but for the imputation attempted to be cast upon the excellent officer who was removed. Here, as in all other cases where a victim has been singled out for proscription, the effort of the department is to destroy his reputation. And yet this statement of the Postmaster General has never been printed, nor in any other way has the proscribed officer been notified of the intended attack. But, saying nothing at this time of the truth of the statement, and leaving that to Mr. Munroe himself, who will defend himself against this or any other imputation, we cannot but reflect that, in every growing town or city, a concurrence of fortuitous and co-operating circumstances often produces a much greater revenue in one year than that of the preceding one. In 1829, when the new postmaster was appointed, this city was thronged with thousands of visitors and applicants for office, whose letter postage, in addition to that which the rapidly growing prosperity of the city produced, must have constituted a formidable item for the Postmaster General to exhibit, in contrast with that of the preceding year. I shall not stop to estimate postage on office-hunting letters at that day. The gentlemen on the other side have far better means of judging of this. Doubtless it was enormous. Nor shall I point the attention of the gentlemen to the many cases in which the revenue has declined, after the removal of good officers. But as this, and all like items, are embraced in the whole mass of revenue for the year, I answer all vaunts of this kind from the department, by inquiring, in turn—what have you done with the money? You tell us that you have expended about two millions of dollars, and abstracted from the funds, in one year, eighty-two thousand dollars besides. How have you disbursed this immense sum? And if your inability to comply with the public demand for mail routes, presenting, as you admit it does, an unexampled state of embarrassment in the administration of this branch of the public revenue, be not owing to the improper dismissal of meritorious officers, and the substitution of inefficient ones to fill their places, to what cause do you ascribe this state of things?

To this important question the gentlemen reply, first, that it is to be ascribed to the increased mail facilities which have been established; and they quote from the last report, that from the 1st day of July, 1829, to the 1st day of July, 1830, the transportation of the mail was increased in stages equal to seven hundred and forty-five thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven miles, and on horseback and in sulkies, to sixty-seven thousand one hundred and four miles. Admit this statement to be strictly true, yet they should have remembered that similar mail facilities have always been granted before; and they also should have read to us so much of the same report as states that "it is in part owing to these improvements that the amount of revenue is so much augmented." The necessary effect of these very improvements must be to increase the amount of postages, and to defray, if not all, at least a very large part of their expense. But if they had proved a dead loss to the whole amount of their cost, it would not account for one-half of your expenditure. We are told in the same report, the average expense of transportation by horse or sulky, is five cents per mile, and by stages thirteen cents per mile, in the southern division. Now, suppose these improvements, which have "so much augmented the revenue," did augment it to an amount equal to one-half their cost; and suppose that every mile of this increased mail transportation in stages cost thirteen cents instead of eight cents, (the mean difference between the cost of that mode of transportation and the transportation by horses and sulkies,) the expense of the whole seven hundred and forty-five thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven miles is but $96,949 71; and then adding $3,355 20 for the sixty-seven thousand one hundred and four miles of transportation by horses and sulkies, at five cents per mile, the whole expenditure is but $100,304 91; and the one-half of this we have supposed is paid by the increase of revenue it has produced! How does this account for the fact that one hundred and fifty thousand dollars were last year expended beyond the disbursement of any former year, and that since the resignation of Mr. McLean the whole annual revenue has been sunk, and one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars drawn from the funds he left?

But if this excuse be insufficient, say the gentlemen, we have another. There were new post routes established in the time of the predecessor of the present Postmaster General, a part of the cost of which has fallen on the latter. On this subject, sir, I think it can be easily shown, that the expense of establishing the new routes alluded to, amounting to something more than two hundred, did not exceed thirty thousand dollars. All the revenue which the routes established by the law of 1828 produced, was received by the present Postmaster General; not a cent of it by his predecessor. The whole expense of the first quarter after the routes were established, was incurred and paid before the 1st of April, 1829, out of the funds in the hands of that predecessor, forming, therefore, no deduction from the surplus of two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, which was left on the 1st of April, 1829. No law has passed since the present Postmaster General came into office, to compel him to establish a single new route. His predecessor established five hundred and fifty-three, including those enumerated by the act of 1827, paid the expenses of them all without calling on the treasury for a dollar, and left more than two hundred and eighty thousand dollars in the department! During all this time, too, there was a corresponding increase of mail facilities of every description. The following statement will show how little in his day the funds of the department were affected by such causes as are now assigned for their unprecedented decline:

By the acts of the 3d of March, 1823, and 3d of March, 1825, two hundred and seventy-nine new post routes were established, of which two hundred and fourteen were included in the last act. From the 1st of July, 1823, to the 1st of July, 1824, the transportation of the mail was increased four hundred and ninety-five thousand one hundred and eighteen miles, of which three hundred and seventy-four thousand two hundred and seventy miles consisted of stage transportation; the cost of all which Mr. McLean estimates at thirty thousand dollars in his report of 1824. By the report of November, 1825, it appears that, from the 1st day of July, 1823, to the 1st day of July, 1825, the increase of mail accommodation amounted to one million five hundred and twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-one miles, and during the same time one thousand and forty new post offices were established. "Yet," says the report of that day, "such has been the accession of receipts for postage, that the additional expenditure required by this extension of the mail will be met without difficulty; and if Congress should think proper to relieve the treasury from all charge on account of this department, the usual appropriations may be drawn from its own funds." In these two years, notwithstanding all these drafts on its funds, so vastly greater than those which have occurred since the 5th of March, 1829, at a period when the density and amount of population were far from conferring the same advantages for increasing its revenue, which now exist, the whole expense was promptly met by its own funds, and yet there was an excess of revenue for these two years of $29,177 99! The report of November, 1826, shows an augmented conveyance of the mail, since 1823, of one million eight hundred and fifty-seven thousand three hundred and forty-five miles, and an increase of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four new post offices. Yet the revenue was found sufficient for all these expenses, and there was an excess of it in that very year, over the expenditures, of $79,100 61! The report of November, 1827, shows an augmented transportation of the mail for the preceding year, of four hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and fourteen miles, in stages; and on horseback* and in sulkies, of fifty thousand and thirty-two miles—yet exhibits a surplus of revenue for that year, after paying all expenses, of $100,312! But more, sir. In this very report, Mr. McLean adds, "that the surplus funds exceed $370,000; that the means of the department are now ample to meet the reasonable wants of the country; and that a vigilant administration of its affairs, for a few years to come, will place at the disposition of the Government an annual surplus of more than half a million of dollars!" Yet, at this time, sir, when it is not able, by the declarations of its present chief, even to establish another mail route, its advocates and champions tell me there has been a most vigilant administration of its affairs! And I am even taken to task by a censor morum here for daring to inquire into its concerns.

I will now close the examination of these excuses for this department by one more brief statement of its former situation. In the report of November, 1828, it appears that the late Postmaster General had, since 1823, added,

In stage transportation,	1,949,850 miles;
In sulkies and on horseback,	1,658,949 miles;

Making an increase of	3,608,799 miles;
-----------------------	------------------

which improvements were "accompanied by great increase of expenditure on all the important routes; on many of them the mail being then conveyed at the rate of one hundred miles a day"—yet the amount of the funds during this time rapidly increased, and the surplus left (says the report) was 332,105 dollars and 10 cents. Let it be remembered, too, that the number of new post routes established from 1823 to 1827, was 553, and they were in the next year increased to 783. Now, mail facilities, amounting to less than one-fourth this amount have sunk the whole annual revenue, and reduced the surplus funds to 148,000 dollars! But, in addition to all this, the demands of this department upon the treasury have much increased since 1829. Your appropriation last year was $13,000 more than for the previous year, and $22,940 more than for the year 1824. In these days of economy, the old furniture for some rooms in the department must be reformed out, and the appearance of things rendered more suitable to the reigning taste of those who rode into power on the allegation of extravagance in their predecessors.*

Looking to the reasons pressed with so much earnestness by the gentlemen from New Hampshire and Tennessee, I ask them how they reconcile their argument with the Postmaster General's own statements of his great savings. In his report of November, 1829, (referring to these improvements in mail transportation, which they now tell us have sunk the revenue so much,) he says "the new contracts have been made, including all the improvements, for $19,195 37 per annum, less than the sum paid under the expiring contracts." If this, and the allegation of economy which his advocates have made, be true, what has become of the money he found there when he entered the department? Sir, these advocates may stifle this inquiry for the present, yet, unless they can render some better excuse for the abstraction of these funds than has yet been given, the public will say it is owing to a want of skill or

* The appropriation from the treasury this year, for the Post Office Department, made since this debate, is 20,000 dollars for extra clerk hire, of which 15,800 dollars is extra clerk hire since March, 1829. a profligate expenditure; and looking back to the days when John McLean administered its concerns, with the aid of all the able and faithful officers who have been since removed, they will demand an inquiry into the reasons which have occasioned their proscription, and those who represent them shall not dare to refuse it.

But, sir, I have used, it seems, an unfortunate expression. "Proscription" is itself proscribed. The gentleman from Tennessee, with his nine causes of removal, complains of the use of the word most grievously. His delicate organs, and the still more tender sensibilities of the Postmaster General, are not to be assailed by so unseemly a phrase, and he makes a hit at the Senator from Maine for daring to say "proscription." Sir, we shall hardly be driven from the appropriate use of the offensive phrase, even though the chief of this department should be subject to fainting fits at the sound. It is a word of such "exceeding good command," that he and his advocates must pardon me if I try how I can speak it in pure emulation of my friend from Maine, to whom the member from Tennessee, having most exquisite organs to judge between us, but not yet having given me a fair hearing, has awarded the palm for pronouncing it better than any other man in this nation. I say, then, in the name of an insulted and abused people, to this chief of a department, who has driven hundreds of better men than himself from the public service, that, although his advocate here has forbid our tongues to speak of "proscription," yet I would that every victim of his unmerited displeasure might find him when he lies asleep, and halloo in his ear "proscription."

"Nay, I would have a startling taught to speak
Nothing but "proscription," and give it him
To keep his anger still in motion."

He should be met at his incomings and his outgoings, and every honest man should ring it in his ears until the effects of his proscription are properly appreciated by him. And now may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, whose nerves are so sensitive on this subject, how, in his judgment, I pronounce the word proscription?

[Mr. GRAY—exceedingly well.]

Then the honorable member will, I hope, hereafter hesitate to decide before he has heard all the evidence. May the good word never be laughed out of countenance by any political wit snapper who may be displeased by its use. For the present, I fear much that the effect of the vindictive spirit which has actuated this department may not be properly appreciated, for it has been alleged here, that this proscription meets the full approbation of the President, and his name has been used as a political deantatur, to hush the inquiry into repose. This sounds the tocsin of party, and invokes the aid of that influence which can at all times successfully suppress truth and propagate falsehood. We may despair in such a contest, and be compelled to acknowledge that if he who presides over this republic has sanctioned all this proscription, we are too powerless to obtain redress. But it will be soon seen whether there be not one man in this nation able to breast its terrors when even the President hurls his thunders. There are hawks abroad, sir. Rumor alleges that the plundering falcon has lately stooped upon a full winged eagle that never yet flinched from a contest, and, as might be naturally expected, all await the result with intense interest. It is given out that the intended victim of proscription now is one distinguished far above all in office for the vigor and splendor of his intellect:

"Mient inter omnes
Velut inter ignes lunt minores"

One who has been a prominent member of the party which gave power to our modern dictator, is to feel the undying vengeance which can burst forth after the lapse of twelve years, for an act done, or a word said, in a high official station, and under the solemn obligation of an oath. But if that energy and firmness which have hitherto characterized him through life, do not now desert him in this his hour of greatest peril, we may yet live to see one who has been marked out as a victim, escape unscathed even by that power which has thus far prostrated alike the barriers of public law and the sanctity of private reputation. In the mean time let it not be forgotten, that the injuries inflicted by that proscription which levels first at the office, and then at character to justify the blow, is not less severely felt because the sufferer has not moved in a splendid circle. The "beetle" we tread upon may feel a pang as great as when a giant dies; and, looking to the case to which I have alluded, may not the hundreds who have felt the sting of unmerited reproach fairly invoke the sympathies of others who are now made the objects of an attack not less unmerited and unrelenting in its character than that which their humbler efforts may have been unable to resist?

[It being now half past four o'clock, Mr. C. yielded to a motion for adjournment. On the succeeding day he proceeded as follows:]

Mr. President, however offensive it may be to the members from New Hampshire and Tennessee, to observe that they have played the advocates of the Postmaster General, I must be permitted to repeat that remark in sheer compliment, when I see the dexterity and adroitness with which they have defended him. They represent themselves as being in a minority of the committee, when, according to my view, on all important questions, they, with the member from Indiana, are certainly in the majority. But these two gentlemen object and cavil at every step we take; they even seek to stifle the inquiry by an appeal to the Senate; and, to crown the climax, they attack the witness who is brought before us, as soon as he makes a disclosure of the indebtedness of the Postmaster General to the Government. Nay, they go further: they provoke a debate here, in which the committee is involved, to the great obstruction of the inquiry, and in the very commencement of that debate they attack the gentleman from Maine violently, for daring to ask a question which they are fearful the witness should answer, but which they say is unbecoming, and intended to make false impressions. Going beyond the whole question here, too, a blow is levelled at all those who wish to obtain light. The very judgment of the Senate, in commencing the inquiry, is impugned. These are the tricks of certain advocates when defending a desperate cause. It is the usual subterfuge of guilt, first to impeach the witnesses, and then to intimidate, or denounce in advance, the jury and the judges. But why and how does the honorable member from Tennessee attack Mr. Bradley? In the first place, to introduce the subject, he volunteers the new information, that the committee has inquired whether the Postmaster General be indebted to the Government, and states a case in reference to which the Senate ought not to be called on to form any opinion until the evidence is before us. He says, Mr. Fowler, of Kentucky, had given a bond as postmaster, in which Mr. Morrison and others were sureties; that, afterwards, Mr. Fowler gave a new bond, in which Mr. Barry was a surety; that while Mr. Meigs was Postmaster General, the first bond was given up by Mr. Meigs, or, as the honorable gentleman was pleased to insinuate, by Abraham Bradley, the Assistant Postmaster General, and he denounces the giving up of this bond as the greatest enormity that ever occurred in this or any other country. He even volunteers as a witness, and gives hearsay evidence in behalf of the distressed Postmaster General, whose cause, it seems, already requires all kinds of evidence to help it out. Now, sir, I must acquit the honorable gentleman from Tennessee of any design wilfully to calumniate Mr. Bradley. He has been misled by others. I pretend not to impugn his motives in debate, because it would not comport well with what I feel to be due to my station here. But if the Postmaster General has misled the member on this subject, and directed his defence here to be conducted by this stale and miserable subterfuge of attacking the character of the witness in advance, let me tell him, in advance, he cannot screen himself by such an effort. When the question of his own indebtedness comes to be understood, as it will be by an intelligent public, it will wear a very different complexion from that which the honorable gentleman has represented. But we have not taken half the testimony of this witness; and in this state of the investigation I will not follow the example of the member from Tennessee, by prejudging the liability of Mr. Barry on this post office bond. It becomes my duty, however, to expose the motive of the department for this attack on the witness. The gentleman from Tennessee has mentioned a certain letter, which Mr. Bradley addressed to the President, and attempts to forestall public opinion on the subject of the contents of that letter. He will pardon me, then, if I exhibit to the Senate the head and front of Mr. Bradley's offending, premising that his life and character* have, in the estimation of all men, stood above reproach, until the breath of proscription endeavored to taint it, and that his oath to the truth of the matters stated in this letter was first taken in the committee, after which the letter was rejected, and refused to be received as evidence by the majority of the committee, the Senator from Maine and myself dissenting. I ask the Secretary to read the letter:

The Secretary accordingly read the following letter:

[Letter of Abraham Bradley, late first Assistant Postmaster General, to the President, to the truth of the facts contained in which, his oath was taken by the special committee of the Senate.]

"CHEVY CHACE, (MD.) October, 1829.

"The President of the United States:

"SIR: It is not without reluctance and anxiety that I venture to press upon your consideration the subject of the following remarks. I am aware that he who comes forward as an accuser, does not always excite our better feelings; but I am aware also of the rights and duties of a citizen.

"I address you as the chief of the nation, as one the aim and object of whose life must be to adorn his station by a just and impartial execution of the laws which are the safeguard and protection of all, and by a wise scrutiny into the acts, capacity, and fitness of those whom you have appointed to administer the details of those great concerns which are of vital importance to all.

"Not knowing your particular feelings towards the individual whose conduct and character have furnished the occasion of this address, it may be my misfortune, in addition to the distrust with which such communications are too often read, to have to contend with the predilections of a friend; if so, it will occasion me regret, but will not diminish the confidence with which I rely on a patient perusal and mature consideration of what I shall say.

"I proceed, sir, at once, to lay before you the following charges and specifications against William T. Barry, Postmaster General of the United States:

"CHARGE 1st. That he is indebted to the Government.

"Specification. In the year 1818, John Fowler, then postmaster at Lexington, Kentucky, was indebted to the

* Mr. McLean, the late Postmaster General, in his letter to the committee of the 26th February, 1831, says: "Respecting Mr. Bradley, I have to state, that from the time I became intimately acquainted with him, I have had the highest confidence in his integrity. During my connexion with the department, his time was faithfully and assiduously devoted to the public service. In private life, Mr. Bradley is without reproach."

General Post Office. His sureties were applied to—they begged indulgence, proposed to pay a part of the balance then due—that a new bond should be given, and the old one should be cancelled. This was done. The new bond was joint and several.

"William T. Barry, now Postmaster General, was one of the sureties in the new bond. Mr. Fowler fell in arrears to a greater amount than ten thousand dollars, which was the amount of the new bond. These sureties had been repeatedly called upon, and at last suit was instituted against them, and among them against Mr. Barry. All this will appear by the books of the department, and by letters there filed. By the former it will appear that Mr. Barry is now indebted to the United States to the amount of ten thousand dollars.

"Remarks. It is said that the money paid by Mr. Fowler after the new bond was given, was applied to the extinguishment of the old debt, but should have gone to the credit of that under the new bond.

"And that the suit against William T. Barry was decided in his favor by the court.

"Independent of the known rule of the common law, that when a man is indebted on two accounts, and pays money to the creditor, without directing to which account it shall be applied, the creditor may apply it to which account he pleases, it has been the usage of the General Post Office to apply moneys paid by a postmaster to the extinguishment of the balance first in order of time standing against him on the books.

"Again: It appears, by the certificate of the clerk of the court in which the suit was brought, that although it was in the first instance decided upon the demurrer by the defendants in their favor, yet the judgment was afterwards opened, and the suit dismissed, so that the United States might begin de novo; and the indebtedness of the party still remains evident from the books and records of the department over which he now presides.

"CHARGE 2d. That he has paid money in advance, contrary to law, for work to be done.

"Specification. Some time early in the present year, Duff Green made a draft on the Postmaster General for fifteen hundred dollars, payable ———. Mr. McLean, then Postmaster General, accepted it, to be paid when printing to the amount should be completed by the drawer, for the use of the department. The draft was cashed by one of the Washington banks. At maturity it was presented to me for payment. I presented it to Mr. Barry, and stated that nothing of moment was due to the drawer; and that there was a law prohibiting the payment of money in advance, and making it imperative on the President to remove any officer who paid any sum beyond the amount earned, or the value of work delivered. Mr. Barry prohibited its payment, and it was refused. I was afterwards informed that he said this was done without his knowledge. I went to him and recalled to his memory the conversation we had had, and that I had followed his direction in refusing to pay it, and then read the law to him; he also read it himself, and said Green was wrong, and it could not be paid.

"Not long afterwards it was again presented to Mr. Barry, the Postmaster General; he said something about the law, and his engagements to Green, and finally ordered it to be paid—this was done.

"Remark. The law says, in such a case, the President shall remove such officer from office. That officer was not ignorant of the law, nor did he misapprehend it; for he had not only refused to pay this in the first instance, and confirmed it a second time, but there had been several other instances of a similar character, in which payment had been refused. The books of the department will show, I believe, four other cases of advances of large sums made by his particular order, but I have no memorandum of them, and one instance is sufficient.

"CHARGE 3d. A disregard to the economy of the public funds under his control.

"Specification. In the early part of the year 1828, Mr. Harrell, who carries the mail in stages between Georgetown and Charleston, South Carolina, was required by Mr. McLean, Postmaster General, to start from the former place at 3 A. M. instead of 5 A. M., and to arrive at Charleston at 3 P. M., instead of 5 P. M., having in either case twelve hours to perform his route through a smooth and champaign country. After having made the change as required, he charged the department one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars a year for three additional teams said to be required in thus expediting the mail, and demanded that sum. Mr. McLean refused to make the allowance. Harrell procured a representation from several gentlemen, to the effect that he had put on three additional teams in consequence of the increased expedition, and that the amount charged was not too high, and a certificate from Mr. McDuffie, that, although he was not acquainted with the facts, he knew those gentlemen were respectable and entitled to full credit. Mr. McLean directed me to return for answer, that, as the contractor had the same length of time to perform his route in, the law did not authorize him to make any allowance. Afterwards Mr. Harrell came to the office, applied to Mr. Barry, who directed Doctor B. to write to Harrell that he should be allowed nearly one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars for that increased expedition, from April 1st, 1828, until the end of his contract, and ordered the pay to be made for the past year. Thus more than five thousand dollars has been paid or engaged to be paid, without sufficient reason, and contrary to law.

"2d. Messrs. Mallets carry the mail from Fayetteville, North Carolina, to Camden, South Carolina. They applied to Mr. Barry for an increased allowance of five hundred and fifty dollars a year, which he ordered to be made, without assigning any reason, which is required by law in cases of increased allowances. Application had been made to the late Postmaster General, but he declined making any, not seeing any ground or cause for such allowance. I am also informed by my brother, Doctor Bradley, that other increased allowances were made by him to these gentlemen, amounting with the above to three thousand dollars a year, no adequate grounds existing for such allowance. But as I have no access to the books of the department, I will not make a specific charge of that fact, but merely state it as a subject worthy of inquiry.

"3d. The mail is carried between Mobile and New Orleans, partly in stages and partly in boats, three times a week, and costs six thousand dollars a year.

"Applications were made to have this mail carried in steamboats; the distance is called one hundred and thirty-four miles. He had it advertised with that view. Between New York and Albany, one hundred and fifty miles, the mail is carried six times a week during the season in steamboats for four thousand dollars a year. Between Baltimore and Philadelphia, nearly one hundred and twenty miles, steamboats and stages daily at 5,000 dollars, during the year.

"Mr. Barry has made a new contract for this route of one hundred and thirty-four miles only three times a week, stipulating to pay twenty-five thousand dollars a year. By this contract the mail will arrive at New Orleans one day earlier than it did before. But there are three other expensive routes leading to New Orleans: these already more than absorb the proceeds of the post office, which are less than twenty-five thousand dollars a year. In the four years for which the contract is made, it will cost the public seventy-six thousand dollars more than it would to carry it as it is now carried, and no material advantage is to be gained.

"Specification 4th. The law requires the advertisements inviting proposals for carrying the mail to be published for twelve weeks at the seat of Government, and the usage has been to publish them once a week in two papers. The advertisement of this year is a short one, and would have cost for one paper once a week from six hundred to eight hundred dollars. The proprietors of the National Intelligencer publish a daily and tri-weekly paper, and publish the advertisement in the latter several times without any additional charge. But, in order to swell the amount, Mr. Barry employed the Telegraph to publish it every time in the daily paper, every time in the tri-weekly, and every time in the weekly paper. Thus the public pays for publishing it ten times a week, in what is in fact the same paper something modified, useless to the public and a nuisance to the subscribers. Shame seemed to restrain the proprietor from taking the full price, and he reduced the continuances after the first three in each paper from thirty three cents to twenty-five cents each square. Still making the whole cost over 2,200 dollars.

"5th. He has employed extra clerks and agents when the business of the office was as well and promptly done before, and when it did not require others, and has expended money in alterations, ornaments, and what he considers improvements in the building for the General Post Office, without any appropriation or warrant of law. I cannot specify the extent of the cost: the books of the office will show.

"Remark. By these means, through his own indebtedness, and by payments and engagements made without reason, the department is involved in a loss of nearly one hundred thousand dollars, and he has been in office but six months.

"CHARGE 4th. His ignorance of, and inattention to, the duties of his office.

"Specification 1st. The power of removing and appointing postmasters is one of great trust and importance, and requires vigilance, care, and judgment.

"This he had virtually yielded to C. K. Gardner, before my removal from the office. He is my successor, and I know not how it is now arranged. While in that business, the papers relating to one office were arranged in one bundle; and, instead of giving a brief of the charges against the individual, and the answers of the applicants and their supporters, he merely endorsed a suggestion on the papers that such an one should be removed and such an one be appointed, and the Postmaster General endorsed "approved," or "let it be done," or words to that effect. And C. K. Gardner thus made the removals and appointments.

"I would not be understood to state that Mr. Barry never examined the papers; he doubtless did in some instances read them, or a part of them, and the more important appointments were made upon advisement.

"2d. I will illustrate the effect of this—the postmaster at Poughkeepsie, New York, an office of some importance, rendered more so by the interest made for his removal and retention in office, who had opposed the late administration strenuously, and advocated the present, had, it seems, voted for his friend Judge Thompson as Governor. He wrote to me repeatedly about the efforts made to remove him. He also wrote to Mr. Barry. I took a letter to me into Mr. Barry's room, and told him its contents. "Sir," says he, "we have fully considered that case, he will not be removed—you may write him so." I thought it better, from my knowledge of the manner in which such business was done, to apply to Gardner. I did so, and found that a new appointment had been made the day before.

"3d. For some time he attempted to open the letters addressed to him, a paramount duty one would think, and to distribute them among his subordinates. He found himself incompetent even to this. While he did attempt it, he did not peruse them further than to ascertain it was an account, a contract, &c., so that he might send it to somebody who had charge or connexion with the branch to which it belonged.

"Instance.—On one occasion he received a long letter from a man named Howard, abusing, and I believe preferring charges against me. Without reading it, he sent it to Mr. Coyle, who brought it to me. I advised him to carry it to Mr. Barry, and tell him what it was. He did so; Mr. Barry said, at first, he had never seen it—then, that he supposed it related merely to a clerkship, and did not read it. Mr. Coyle asked if he should not show it to me; he said no—he had great confidence in me—it was of no consequence.

"Specification 4th. His substitute for Mr. McLean's plan of accounting for newspaper postage.

"Forms which relate to a business in which more than ten thousand persons are engaged are very material, and should never be changed without great consideration, and very clear advantage. They should be brief, plain, and attended with as little expense or labor as practicable.

"Under the old form, every postmaster was furnished with a blank account, in which was a column for letter postage, one for newspaper postage, and another for free newspapers; a column for the day of the month, and for the office or mail from whence received. On the arrival of the mail, the postmaster counted the chargeable newspapers at one and a half cents, at one cent, and number of free, and marked the number and amount on a post bill coming with the mail. Also the same with respect to magazines and pamphlets; from these, when his account was made out, the aggregates were carried out into the columns mentioned in the blank account. This plan was plain, simple, and intelligible. Judge McLean adopted a new plan, and Mr. Barry substituted the following, as nearly as I can understand it:

"The postmasters are, as soon as a mail arrives, to separate the newspapers into as many parcels as there are papers of different names. The name of the printing office, and the number from each, with the rate of postage, is to be set down in an account kept especially for that purpose. There are probably, in the United States, nearly four hundred newspaper establishments. During the session of Congress, here and at some of the large offices, papers are received from almost every establishment in the country. Supposing papers to arrive only from one-half of these, on any one day, it would require the writing of two hundred lines, or four pages of large paper, before the newspapers would be in order for delivery. This would occasion so much delay that the public would not submit to it—it is therefore impracticable. I send herewith the form and instructions, that you may see that it is as unintelligible as it is impracticable, marked No. 1.

"It may be wrong to call this Mr. Barry's plan; it was at least adopted by him, and shows his inattention to, if not ignorance of, the details of his office.

"Specification 5th. His circular to postmasters.

"The first object assigned for its publication, is the embarrassed state of the funds of the department, and it concludes with the same. And it is to be inferred that that great object, the replenishment of the funds, is to be attained in part by preventing the abuse of the franking privilege, and by carefully charging double, triple, and other letters, to the full extent of the law, and by the non-reduction in cases of excess, in those respects, unless the letters were opened in the presence of a postmaster or his clerk.

"Every one at all acquainted with the subject knows that those abuses never went to any important extent. The President, and higher officers of the Government, whatever exuberance there may be in the expressions, will not believe it intended for them. The postmasters are, as a body, men of honor, integrity, and standing in society, whose oath of office is a sufficient guaranty against such an abuse.

"The second is a strained and improper construction of the law regulating postages. The origin of that law was this: A postmaster had been threatened with a suit if he did not abate the postage on a letter delivered from his office, averred to be overcharged, which the postmaster doubted. He applied to the Postmaster General, (Mr. Granger,) who directed the abatement, but, when the law was revised, in 1810, had the clause (misconstrued by Mr. Barry) inserted, in order to protect postmasters from suits. Such was the construction given to the law at that time, and the practice since. Mr. Barry has, in his circular, made the postage marked on the letter and the post bill exclusive evidence; whereas the law only makes it conclusive in cases of prosecution, the opening in the presence of the post officer excepted. The postmasters always exercised a discretion, and denied or granted the abatement, as they believed or doubted the man claiming it, or other evidence he might produce.

"But the true object of the circular was to convey an idea to the public that the office was distressed and embarrassed in its funds by his predecessor. This was not true, as the books will show, and Mr. Barry might have ascertained, if he had not been ignorant or inattentive to the duties of his office.

"CHARGE 5th. His incapacity.

"A man in the high and important station of Mr. Barry has frequently cause to analyze and investigate. I have lent my attention in vain, on various occasions, to discover these capacities; and I cannot doubt that the want of them has frequently been obvious to you. No greater evidence need be given of these deficiencies than the specifications mentioned under the third charge.

"I have rarely seen a man occupying any thing more than an ordinary situation in society so ignorant of the geography of the country. A Postmaster General uninformed on its topography, a knowledge essential to the office, of the courses and characters of its waters, of the ranges of its mountains, but even of the particular relations of its principal and prominent places to each other, would seem to be equivalent only to something monstrous in natural economy. Yet this might be remedied if he could apply himself, with the zeal, fidelity, and perseverance of his predecessors, to the broad field of the whole country, and not weary himself by a narrow and contracted view of some particular portion of it.

"Of some of its important statistics, the population, the character and pursuits of the people in various parts, essential to estimate the necessity or importance of a mail, and the frequency or expedition with which it should be carried, he is entirely ignorant, and has no quality of the mind suited to the acquisition of such information. His memory is defective, or of a character which I will not offend you by speaking of: he frequently forgets important transactions, executed under his immediate direction, soon after he has given the order. He cannot even recollect upon what ground the suit against himself, on Mr. Fowler's bond, was decided. Witness, also, the refusal of payment to Duff Green, the order to Mr. Coyle, and the Poughkeepsie case. No property of the mind is more essential in such an office as his, than this one of memory.

"2. He permitted an inferior clerk in the department to devise and write the circular alluded to, and then copied, and showed it in his own hand, as his own production.

"3. The reasons assigned for the removal of Mr. Hawkins, the postmaster at Frankfort, Kentucky, is a striking instance of that want of reflection and judgment which has characterized his official life.

"For the act he is responsible to you alone, and I do not profess to know the real causes which led to it. I leave it, without comment, to your decision. But the circumstances arising out of it are material; and, although it may require some detail, I must beg, sir, your indulgence while I relate them.

"After Mr. Hawkins's removal, Mr. O. B. Brown, one of the clerks of the department, but on a different branch of business, directed a clerk, whose duty it was to make out statements of postmasters' accounts for suit, to make out that of Mr. Hawkins. In execution of this order, he met with the usual mark of a draft for a considerable amount, credited in pencil to Mr. Hawkins; and, as he doubted, not finding in whose favor the draft was made, he applied to Mr. Brown for instructions. Brown directed him to omit it, and to make out the account as posted in ink. Johnson did so. Brown directed him to bring it to me for my signature; and, upon Johnson's answer to my inquiry it was all correct, I signed it. Johnson gave it to Brown, who forwarded it to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, who, as he says, put it into the hands of the Marshal for suit. There is in the office a lawyer, who is charged with the duties of a solicitor for the office for all the debts of persons whose employments have ceased. All this Mr. Barry was privy to. Afterwards, I discovered the account was erroneous, and conferred with Mr. Barry on the subject. The whole of this seems to have been a device of Mr. Barry and Co. to justify the removal of Mr. Hawkins, by making him appear a great debtor, and that it was necessary to the security of the public to sue him immediately; thus wielding the public force for the gratification of his revenge. It was with difficulty I persuaded him to let it rest until time should be given to adjust the accounts, to furnish him with a copy, as in other cases, and to make a call for payment. I could not persuade him to agree that a draft should be made for the amount; but he insisted he should pay by a deposit in a bank thirty miles distant, and otherwise inconvenient, upon a short notice; and yet he not only retained Mr. Brown in high favor, but rewarded him with the appointment of chief clerk. If he had reflected, and had not wanted judgment, he must have been sensible that this was a device, the effect of which, when exposed, would be injurious to himself and to the Government. He compromised his own dignity and his official station, by permitting the Fourth Auditor to interfere in the concerns of his department; he inflamed the minds of Hawkins's friends; he weakened the public confidence in the department over which he himself presided; he alienated others from the Government, by exhibiting false causes for removing an officer under his control. Taking all these things in connexion with his advance to Duff Green, his allowances to mail contractors, his employment of agents and clerks, and his Mobile contract, and I think the charge is fully sustained.

"CHANCE 6th. His want of integrity and veracity.

"Specification 1st. On the 10th of June last, Mr. Barry came into my room for a check for his salary, and, without any previous remark leading to the subject, said, 'I am surprised to find, by the receipt of letters almost every day, from almost every quarter, wishing your continuance in office, that an apprehension has gone abroad that there was an intention to remove you. I can assure you that I have long been advised of your faithful services, and such a thing as your removal has never once entered my head. You may be assured that your continuance in this office will be as permanent as my own—that is, I have no suspicion that any adequate cause will arise; for that there may be exception. You, therefore, may be perfectly easy on that account.' These assurances were repeated through others, as I was advised, by his direction; and, from his deportment and language, I had no reason to doubt them, until I received the following note:

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Sept. 14, 1829.

"Sir: I have appointed Colonel C. K. Gardner my assistant, and do not require your services any longer in this department.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"W. T. BARRY."

"MR. A. BRADLEY, Present."

"On the 15th September he requested my son 'to assure me that he had the highest respect for me, and the utmost confidence in me.'

"Specification 2d. Mr. Coyle had been chief clerk in the Post Office Department, and was removed to make room for the author of Mr. Barry's circular. After his removal, he published several letters addressed to Mr. Barry. The latter informed my brother that two of the clerks in the office had undertaken to answer Mr. Coyle. The second of these answers contained a side attack upon me. As soon as Mr. Barry came to the office the morning after its publication, I told him it was an entire misrepresentation of facts as it respected both of us. The case was this: Mr. Scott, a clerk in the office, had been very ill last year. He came to the office late in the fall, excessively pale and emaciated; and stated that his illness had impoverished him, he had spent all that he had, anticipated all he could; winter was fast approaching, he was destitute of food, proper clothing, and fuel; that, while the salaries of other clerks of his standing had been raised to one thousand dollars, his had not been raised. Judge McLean concluded to make him an allowance of one hundred dollars, which I paid him.

"A list of clerks and their accounts was made out for Mr. Barry, and that sum nearly appeared against Mr. Scott. He died leaving his widow in great distress. Her friends applied to Mr. Barry to pay up his salary to the end of the month, which he directed should be done. Mr. Coyle applied to me in behalf of the widow for the pay. I showed him the balance, and told him it could not be paid until it was squared—advised him to apply to Mr. Barry for an order for the proper credit, and to state the subject distinctly. He returned, and said Mr. Barry had directed him to make the credit. I asked if he was sure he understood it. He said he appeared to do so. I told him I would go myself, two witnesses were better than one. Mr. Barry denied having given the order. I then stated the case fully, as far as I recollected it at the moment. He told me I might tell Mr. Coyle to enter the credit. Instead of this, I called him in, and Mr. Barry gave the direction to him again. Mr. Coyle made the entry agreeably to this order.

"The answer charged the payment as being made in advance, (intended for me,) and a credit by Mr. Coyle as an act out of his line of duty, and for base motives, without any authority from the Postmaster General. After recalling these facts to his memory, Mr. Barry said if I would write a note to him in explanation, he would have it published. I prepared a note expressed in the mildest form, with which he appeared pleased. A few hours after, he informed me Mr. Green declined publishing any more on the subject.

"Specification 3d. His conduct in relation to my removal.

"On the 14th September last, soon after I went to my office in the morning, a servant placed upon my table the note, a copy of which I have already presented to you, dismissing me in a very uncourteous manner from my office. In a few minutes after I had read the note, the servant came and informed me it was left by mistake, and Mr. Barry wished its return. Not long after, he returned again with the note, and said, 'Mr. Barry says it is of no consequence, as you have read it; he did not intend to send it until evening.' I immediately put up such of my private papers as were convenient, and retired. In the course of the day, some of my friends called at my house, and strenuously advised me to tender the keys of the post office treasury to Mr. Barry, they being apprehensive, unless it was done, I might be attacked in the Telegraph; that my old friends were too much shocked to do much work, and this might be attributed to my having the keys, &c. Under these circumstances, I was induced to have the keys offered to Mr. Barry, the moneys being untold, not imagining he would accept them. He did take them, and the same evening delivered them to my successor.

"I reflected on the subject, and it seemed so reckless of my own character to run the risk of his accepting them in such a circumstance, that the reflections, you may be assured, were unfavorable to sleep. As soon as the morning dawned, I sent a duplicate key, (which had been overlooked,) to my sons, in town, requesting them to go as soon as the office was opened, count the money, and deliver it over to Mr. Barry. My eldest son did go to the office for that purpose; after waiting there until half past eleven o'clock, he went to Mr. Barry, and told him it was my request that he should count and deliver over the money, and delivered him the duplicate key. Mr. Barry replied, it is all perfectly right.

"Thus, Mr. Barry, instead of refusing the keys, as he should have done, took them; instead of retaining them in his own possession until he saw me or some one in my behalf, put them into the hands of a person of whom I will not permit myself to say one word, and to my authority to my son to count and deliver over the money to him, gave an evasion.

"On the 19th, a clerk called upon me, and proposed to count the money on the 22d; that is, after it had been in their possession eight days. On the 25th of September, I received a note from two of the clerks, stating that they were directed to give me notice that they were authorized to count the money on the 28th, that is, after it had been out of my possession fourteen days nearly; of these I took no notice. I conceived it to be a mockery and an insult to send a notification after the answer Mr. Barry had given, through my son. Yet, notwithstanding all this, Mr. Barry authorized the publication of a vile paragraph in the Telegraph on the 28th of September, giving a false coloring to the transaction, and not alluding to the interview between my son and himself on the 15th September, in which he was informed that I desired the money might be counted that morning.

"I stand prepared to make good every charge and specification I have presented to you: that he is indebted to a large amount to the very office over which he presides: that he has wasted the public funds: that he has paid money in advance contrary to law: that he is ignorant of and inattentive to the duties of his office: that he wants capacity for the office which he holds: and I impeach his integrity and veracity.

"I have but one particular more to notice. The letter by me to him, and published in the Telegraph, was intended to be private, and put him on his guard.

"It contains no threat, but plainly tells him what I intended to do, and believed I could do. It does not contain a syllable disrespectful towards yourself; but expresses a firm reliance on the propriety with which you will inquire and decide against him. It puts him on his guard against any reliance on your too favorable opinion of him, for I thought it a paramount duty in you to disregard such opinions; and, in the present excited state of the country, so firmly am I convinced of being able to sustain the charges I have made, I believe it would lead to unpleasant measures as it respected yourself. Such a communication I should not have made to you, I have not made to the public; if there was any thing offensive in the letter, it only became so by its publication, for which Mr. Barry alone is responsible.

"I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

"ABRAHAM BRADLEY."

"Since writing the foregoing, I have been informed of allowances made to two contractors for merely expediting the mail, to the amount of nine thousand dollars a year; the alterations would not be estimated of the value of from one-fourth to one-third of the sum, and of little importance to the public."

MR. CLAYTON resumed. You see, sir, from this letter, how necessary it is, for the very existence of the persecuting power exercised in this department, that Mr. Bradley should be crushed. If he stands, it must fall. Bradley has encountered the strife, though he well knows the fearful odds against him—for he has to struggle against more influence, more patronage, and a spirit more vindictive than exists in any other department of this Government. Yet, relying on the justice of his countrymen alone, he bares his head, now grown grey, after more than thirty years' faithful public service, before the storm, and defies its vengeance. A private citizen, he can no more be driven from office; on the verge of the grave, he can never expect to be again employed in the public service. Yet, as an honest man and a patriot, he feels it to be his duty, when called upon by a committee of this Senate, to lay bare the transactions of this department; and I will venture to predict, that in future history his character shall stand brightly out, while those of his designing calumniators shall be remembered only to be despised.

It is unnecessary to stop to inquire why the President refused to hear Mr. Bradley in corroboration of the statements contained in this letter, though we know from the oath of the witness that he offered to prove every part of it. If inquiry is now to be suppressed, we can readily understand why it was then avoided. Some excuse has always been devised whenever investigation has been sought, and, until a change of times, it will always be so. Thus, even at this day, no answer has been returned by the department to any one of all the numerous interrogatories which the committee addressed to it on the 24th of December last. Yes, sir, nearly six weeks have elapsed, and the receipt of that communication has not even been acknowledged. Yet I thought, while on this subject, the member from Tennessee sought to implicate me as chairman of the committee, for withholding communications from the department.

[MR. GRUNDY here explained, and disclaimed any such expression or intention.]

The gentleman's explanation has saved me some trouble. Yet, sir, it may be well now to put a stopper forever on all such wretched surmises, by making a brief statement of what has occurred. Three letters were addressed to the Postmaster General by the committee—one on the 24th of December last, being the most important, and that which inquired into most of the concerns of his department—another on the 18th, and the third on the 27th of January. That of the 18th of January also contained several important inquiries. Like its predecessor of the 24th of December, it remained unanswered and unnoticed until the 31st of January, when the letter of the 27th, inquiring only as to the single point of the Postmaster General's indebtedness to the Government, was answered by one letter, in which an attempt was made to throw the blame of the loss of the sum of $10,000 (the amount of Fowler's bond) on Meigs, or some other person, because Morrison's bond had been cancelled and given up to him; and the receipt of the letter of the 18th was barely acknowledged, but that of the 24th of December, the most material of all, was entirely unnoticed, although he had been particularly requested to inform us whether he had received each of them. [Here Mr. C. read the letters.] Thus, you see, sir, with what justice I complain of the refusal even to notice the receipt of the most essential interrogatories. The acknowledgment in his letter of "interrogatories formerly submitted," admitted nothing as to the letter of the 24th of December, though the gentleman from Tennessee has emphasized the word formerly, as if, in his opinion, that was a recognition of that specific letter. The Postmaster General might now safely deny having ever received that communication, because his expression is fully satisfied by referring to the "troublesome" interrogatories in the letter of the 18th of January. After a month's silence on his part, the question was put to him on the 27th ult.—“Have you received the letters of the 24th of December and of the 18th of January? If so, acknowledge it.” The answer is—“I have received your letters of the 18th and 27th of January!” It is necessary only to add, that the two brief communications from the Postmaster General, received on the 1st of February, were mentioned to the committee at our first meeting thereafter, on the next day were laid before them, and that their whole contents were fully stated on the day after they were received in the public debate here, which the gentleman from Tennessee introduced.

Now, considering this extraordinary state of things, in which we can get no information from the department, is it not surprising that the gentleman should still insist, when we propose to examine a witness, that we should inquire first of the department? A letter was put into my hands by the Senator from Virginia who sits near me, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] from a citizen of that State, whose character as a most respectable man was vouched for by that Senator. That letter now lies before me. It contains plain, unequivocal charges of “partiality, mismanagement, fraud, and corruption,” in the southern contracts made during last October, for transporting the mail, alleging that higher were preferred to lower bidders, without cause, and thus offering to account in part for the waste of the funds. The writer desires that the committee should investigate the matter, and offers himself with the names of some half a dozen other most respectable men, living in Virginia and North Carolina, whom he desires us to send for as witnesses, to substantiate the charges. The letter is laid before the committee. The charges are so strong that it is considered by the committee necessary to ask for power to send for persons and papers. The power is granted by the Senate; and as soon as the committee meet to exercise the power in the very case which induced them to ask for it, the members from Tennessee and New Hampshire, joined by the member from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] resolve that we shall call on the department, to see if we cannot find in the Postmaster General's own hands sufficient affidavits and correspondence to substantiate these charges against him; and that, after we have ascertained that we cannot find the proof there, we may send for the witnesses. This is determined when it is certain, from the distance of their residence, that any delay in sending for the witnesses must effectually prevent our obtaining their attendance. At the same time, objections are made to the taking of any depositions. The gentleman from Tennessee and myself are appointed to call on the Postmaster General, to learn if he will not convict himself without more proof, and, as he [Mr. GRUNDY] has stated in debate here, whenever I requested him to go, he always informed me the Postmaster General was sick and could not see us. So we did not go. In the mean time it became useless to send for the witnesses. We were within a few days of the end of the session, and thus, by a slight exercise of ingenuity, this part of the investigation was effectually suppressed.

[Mr. BENTON here called Mr. C. to order, and insisted that the proceedings of the committee should not be stated in debate.

The CHAIR decided that Mr. C. was not out of order, and that he had a right to show the proceedings which had been so often referred to by all the members of the committee who had spoken before him.

Mr. BENTON appealed to the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY said, he and all the other members of the committee had commented as fully as they pleased upon the proceedings.

Mr. BENTON withdrew his appeal.]

Mr. CLAYTON proceeded. It would be well, Mr. President, for all such as wish to suppress debate as well as inquiry, to bear in mind, before they attempt it again, that the whole discussion is not one of my seeking; that, like the resolution before us, which of itself discloses some of the proceedings of the committee, it had its origin with those only who desire to arrest these proceedings. And I will add, that the attempt is but another evidence of that disposition to prevent information on these subjects, which I was proceeding to expose.

It has been stated, that, when a proposition was made in the committee to send for Mr. Hand, the solicitor of the department, to give testimony as to the state of the funds, the proposition was rejected. This officer has the collection of all the outstanding balances, and, of course, could have shown us better than any other person what part of these funds are available. He could have produced his estimate of those funds at the time of the resignation of the late Postmaster General, and we should then have been enabled to judge whether the statement in the late reports of losses on these balances be true or false. But here was danger, sir. What was the result of the apprehensions it excited? Why, it was determined by the gentlemen from Tennessee and New Hampshire that Mr. Hand should mind his business, and that the information ought to come from the Postmaster General himself. [Mr. C. here read the journal of the committee on this subject.] Thus, you see, sir, while the Postmaster General is withholding all information from us until some few days before the close of the session, when we cannot even examine his communication, we are, by the votes of these gentlemen, prevented from seeking information from other sources.

I shall not dwell, sir, on the rejection of Mr. Bradley's letter—on the opposition of these gentlemen to his examination—on the numerous objections which they have taken to his evidence at different stages of the inquiry, and which will prevent us from ever closing his testimony, or taking any part of that of many other witnesses who remain to be examined. But I will venture to predict that, at the close of the session, and at a moment when it will be impossible for any one to examine his communication, Mr. Barry will report, and not till then.* But it is my duty, foreseeing, as I do, this result, and having observed all the shuffling which has occurred, to say now that as no man can be condemned without a trial, so, too, there can be no acquittal without it.

It has been told us by the gentleman from Tennessee, that, should this inquiry proceed, Mr. Barry will refuse to answer it. It may be so, sir. We have indeed fallen upon evil times. Yet I doubt much whether any chief of a department dare refuse to answer to the Senate while that body retains the spirit to vindicate its rights. And if the day has indeed arrived when our power can be so contemptuously slighted—when we can be braved by every chief of department or petty executive officer, it is time that we should leave our seats, and suffer the people to send men of sufficient energy to represent them here, who will ascertain the means by which every puny whipster gets the sword and defies them to take it from him. Sir, I cannot yet believe that we have fallen so low. It is true that the Postmaster General did, for nearly one whole year, omit to notice the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. BENTON,] inquiring into the matter of the mail contracts. But after this debate arose, and the refusal to present his answer

* Mr. Barry's report did not come in until the first of March, when, of course, it could not be even read by all the committee, and it contains no answer whatever to any of the interrogatories in the letter of the 19th January, respecting the number of removals and the practice of removing without notice to the accused—nor any to the question whether the revenue had been anticipated by over-drafts on postmasters. It offers only an excuse for not answering the question in the letter of the 24th December—“What was the state of the funds on the 1st of October last?” and alleges that the question, “What are the improvements or other causes which have caused the increased expenditure of 150,000 dollars more than was expended last year?” put to him on the 24th of December last, cannot be answered this session for want of time.

Post Office Department.

became the subject of complaint, we find that it has been paraded with much of stage effect on the table before us. The gentleman from Tennessee points to it as a very monument of human industry. It contains, he says, work enough to make a volume. By examining it, it will be found that three-fourths of the whole mass consists of printed bonds and contracts; and the residue of the answer to the inquiry which the Senator from Ohio made, might be performed by a tolerable clerk in six weeks. It has not been denied, you observe, that the information as to the contracts of Mr. McLean was, last year, inserted in the resolution by the request of the present Postmaster General; and his own answer to his own question, made with a view to excuse his own allowances by the example of his predecessor, has caused by far the greater part of the labor which that resolution has imposed. Sir, the Postmaster General may safely send here any information, while the gentlemen from Tennessee and New Hampshire stand ready to protect it from examination. This very mass of labor, which it has taken nearly a year to prepare, as the gentlemen would have us believe, after undergoing the careful supervision of all concerned during that time, comes here, and when a motion is made to refer it to this committee, which is examining the subject of these contracts, the gentlemen move its reference to another committee, which it was well known did not intend to examine it, and the whole subject is thus snatched from the investigating committee. Strange, indeed, that an apprehension should be entertained, that in three weeks impeachable matter might be discovered, among a mass of papers, which they say it required nearly a year to prepare. This, sir, is what I term stifling inquiry; and with what countenance these gentlemen can complain of a charge made here, that they have stifled it, after this let the Senate and the public judge.

And now, sir, to return to the resolution. It is declaratory of the limits of the commission under which the committee act, by its very terms. It affirms what is untrue, that we have no power, under our commission, to make this inquiry. The original resolution directs, as we have seen, an inquiry into the "entire management of the Post Office Department." Why do not gentlemen say in terms, that their aim and object is to repeal a part of the powers originally conferred? Why not boldly avow at once, that the boastful defiance of inquiry, at the commencement of the session, when the committee was appointed, was but an empty vaunt, which it is now found necessary to retract? The gentleman from Tennessee says, that he can supply us with all the information on the subject of the causes of removals. He enumerates nine of these: 1st, Intemperance; 2d, Delinquency; 3d, Prying into letters; 4th, Concealing or withholding letters; 5th, Habitual negligence of duty; 6th, Incompetency; 7th, Refusal to comply with the regulations of the department; 8th, Discharging the postmasters' duties by deputies under age; 9th, Living off the post routes. And the honorable gentleman sums up this list of causes with the sweeping declaration, "that he has no doubt there has not been a single instance of removal but for one or other of these causes!" Sir, are we to suppose that the Postmaster General instructed him to make such a declaration? The honorable member can know but little on the subject, of his own knowledge. He lives in a district whose political sins have not demanded such expiation as this of removal from office. But we who live north of the Potomac know, sir, that his enumeration of causes is a gross insult to hundreds of our worthy citizens, who have been removed without any other transgression than that with which, according to the orthodox creed emanating ex cathedra here, is denominated political heresy. In the mean time, sir, this declaration of the gentleman shows us how just were our suspicions, that the files of this department have been filled with groundless accusations against the victims of its proscription, which may sleep there unrefuted, because they remain unknown until, in the lapse of time, when the men have been laid in their graves, these receptacles of filth may be opened by the hand of malevolence, to tarnish the memory of those before whom, while living, the accusers dared not show their faces. His very statement of causes, therefore, exhibits the strongest reason for demanding an exposition of the facts. But, sir, the blow is not merely levelled at the hundreds of removed postmasters. It strikes directly at their late chief, who retained them all in office. The declaration thus made boldly to the world is, that he kept in office some five or six hundred men, who were either drunken, or were prying into correspondence, or were guilty of some other of the enormities enumerated in this list. The answer to it all, is, look at the state of the money chest now, and remember what it was when John McLean was compelled to leave it, or surrender his independence as a man, and become the tool of this proscriptive and arbitrary power.

But the Senator from Tennessee finds another cause for suppressing the inquiry, in what he calls the verdict of the people. The gentleman from Maine had complained of the removal of some twenty-five postmasters in one of the counties of that State. The Senator from Tennessee says he has no right to complain, because the people there have sanctioned the proscription by giving their vote for the administration. Sir, I pretend to know nothing of the case. But I may ask, did the people act with a view to all the subordinate officers of the Government, when they merely approved of the general acts of the President? The conduct of these subordinates was probably no part of the issue joined before the people. From the nature of things, we must believe it could not have been so. So far from passing sentence on the removed officers by their vote, the people probably were engrossed by what they deemed more important considerations affecting the general welfare of their country. But, sir, if they had acted with a view to these offices alone, would it have been quite fair to have urged the force of their verdict upon us? It would not sound well, in any supposable case, to offer bribes or threats to any part of the jury, and then plead their verdict in justification of the act; and the very evil complained of being the influence of Executive patronage on the elective franchise, I do not hesitate to say, without reference to the people of Maine, or any other particular State, that if you can find a case which has been decided by the influence of that patronage, you might as well boast that you had embraced a jury, and point in justification to the verdict, as to plume yourselves upon the effect which that patronage has produced. And if the argument has any weight, what shall be said of those verdicts which the people have rendered in other districts of country, where the proscription has been equally extensive, and where, in defiance of your patronage, the decision has been against you?

There is no department of this Government, sir, in which the people take so lively an interest as the post office. It should be so conducted as to secure their perfect confidence. It should, therefore, have no party character whatever. So anxious was Mr. Jefferson to deprive it of all political connexion, as we learn from his memoirs, that he prohibited the employment of any printer in the department, even so far as to be concerned in the transportation of the mail. Suppose that, in his day, or that of any former President, it had been charged with operating on the elective franchise, and the rights of the States, through the immense influence of an army of dependents, amounting to more than ten thousand men, with subsidizing the press, establishing a system of espionage, and wasting the public treasure in disbursements to political favorites—I ask, would any party, at any former period, have had the hardihood, after an investigation had been set on foot to ascertain the truth of such conjectures, to suppress the investigation, or to restrict it in any particular, for the purpose of preventing a complete development of all its operations? Yet such charges are now loudly proclaimed against it; such an investigation has been called for, and the very object of the resolution on your table is to close the door against inquiry.

Sir, I have done. In the fearless discharge of my duty here, I may have drawn down on my own head the vengeance of a power, more terrible than any which all the other authorities of this Government combined can wield; but I should have proved a faithless representative, and recreant to the interests of the intrepid people who have never yet bowed to the terrors or the allurements of Executive influence, if I had shrunk from its performance.

Note by Mr. C.—The following is an extract from the letter of the honorable John McLean to Mr. Barry, laid before the committee by their order:

“WASHINGTON, March 31, 1829.

“I cannot, in justice to myself and the public service, refrain from recommending the continuance of the Assistant Postmasters General, who have been long identified with the department, and have been faithful to the trust reposed.

“I name those gentlemen to you, because I have understood that efforts are making to remove one or both of them. I should extremely regret such a step, as well on your own account as that of the public. With the operations of the department, I am well acquainted. I am anxious that its reputation shall be sustained, and I am convinced that this cannot be done if the above gentlemen be removed. This remark is made with a perfect knowledge of the facts.”

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to withdraw the bill, which was laid on the table the other day, for the abrogation of the duty on alum salt.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the occasion to say that, after mature examination and deliberation, he was satisfied that he had erroneously decided that the abovementioned bill could not be received. He considered that it was at the disposal of the Senate, as other bills were.

Mr. BENTON then gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a similar bill with some modification.

THOMAS JEFFERSON AND HIS DAUGHTER.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to ask leave to introduce the bill of which he yesterday gave notice. He said that, observing in the Telegraph of this morning, in the report of the proceedings of the day before, an error, by which it appeared that he had presented a memorial from Martha Randolph, the daughter, and only surviving child of Thomas Jefferson, deceased, it was due to the sensibility of that lady, as well as to himself, to state, that, in giving notice of his intention to introduce a bill concerning the only surviving child of Thomas Jefferson, he was actuated solely by his own views of the high obligations of duty, and a desire to rescue the nation from the imputation of a want of gratitude to a departed statesman, who had so largely contributed to the establishment of this Government, and the free institutions under which we live. No memorial was either received or presented on this subject. No intimation whatever has been made of a desire to bring this question under the consideration of Congress by the individual named in the bill, which he had asked leave to introduce. He had no doubt that the error noticed was unintentional on the part of the editor of the Telegraph.

You will perceive, Mr. President, continued the eloquent Senator, that I have brought before this honorable body a proposition calculated to animate the patriotic feelings of every American citizen; a proposition which has too long slept in the bosoms of those who administer this Government. The name of Thomas Jefferson is identified with the independence and glory of this country. His eulogy is written in the pages of faithful history, and deeply impressed on the hearts of his countrymen. I will not deface the sublime and beautiful picture by any attempt to retouch it with the pencil of an unskilful artist; but it shall be my humble part simply to bring to the recollection of this honorable body the high claims of this eminent philosopher and statesman to the gratitude of the generation who survive him, and leave to others, better qualified for the task, the pleasing duty of illustrating the merits and distinguished services of one whose equal has seldom appeared on the great theatre of the political drama of the world. Washington, Lafayette, and their companions in arms, wielded the physical force of the colonies in our revolutionary struggle. Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, and their compatriots in the cabinet, fought the great moral battle of their oppressed country at that memorable epoch. They boldly asserted those rights and principles, which vindicated our cause throughout civilized Europe, and brought into action the invincible energies of the American people, by whose perseverance and valor the chains of tyranny were broken, and the mercenariness of the tyrant driven from the land which they had dared to invade and desolate with conflagration, robbery, and the sword. Under the influence of feelings honorable to our national character, which have been, on many occasions, signally manifested, the Congress of the United States, a few years past, by an almost unanimous vote, made a voluntary gift to General Lafayette, of the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, and a further donation of a township of land equal in value to the additional sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This liberality to the hero who fought our battles, who espoused our cause, and shed his blood in our defence, and who has been the uniform friend of liberty in both hemispheres, met the approbation of the people at large. It has never been complained of by the most vigilant guardian of the public purse. Our national gratitude to this distinguished man was due to his disinterested services and sacrifices in the great cause of freedom, and the emancipation of these States from the galling yoke of despotic power, wielded by the unrelenting arm of the British monarch. It has imparted a lustre to the American name far more precious than the price at which it was obtained. Actuated by the same lofty considerations which governed the National Legislature on that occasion, let us not forget the testamentary bequest of the great author of the Declaration of Independence to his beloved country. Jefferson, whose name must be ever dear to the friends of human liberty throughout the world, in the last hour of his existence, bestowing an expiring thought on the political connexion which had so long existed between himself and the American people, and feeling the pressure of his pecuniary circumstances, and the embarrassed condition of his affairs, consoled his agitated spirits by the confidence which he reposed in the justice and benevolence of this nation; and, with his last breath, bequeathed his daughter and only surviving child to that country which he had so faithfully served, and of which he was the pride and ornament. Shall we then fold our arms in cold indifference, and, unmindful of him, whose enlightened mind and unbought patriotism gave impetus to the ball of the revolution, and fixed the great principles of this confederated republic, treat with unkind neglect the object dearest to his heart, which he had so confidently committed to our generous protection?

Shall we limit our liberal donations to Lafayette, and a few others, and permit the only surviving child of Thomas Jefferson to linger in poverty in her native country, while every page of its history points to the glory which has been shed over it by the acts of her illustrious father? I hope not. The ingratitude of republics is the favorite theme of tyrants, and of all those who urge that man is incapable of self-government. The despots of the world taunt us with this insulting epithet. We have shown them in the case of Lafayette that we do not deserve the foul imputation. Let us follow up the good example by an equal liberality to our own, our venerated Jefferson, and this stain on the fair fame of the republic will vanish into thin air, and be remembered among the fables of a deranged imagination. I now move, Mr. President, that leave be given to bring in a bill according to the notice which I gave yesterday, and that it be referred to a select committee.

A bill "concerning Martha Randolph, the daughter and only surviving child of Thomas Jefferson, deceased," was then presented by Mr. POINDEXTER to the Chair, read a first and second time, and referred to a select committee, consisting of Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. BEET, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. TYLER, and Mr. HAYNE.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate again took up the resolution concerning the examination of witnesses as to the causes of their removal from office.

Mr. CLAYTON concluded his speech against the resolution.

Mr. BENTON then rose and said, that he did not appear on the floor for the purpose of joining in the debate, nor to express any opinion on the truth of the allegations so violently urged against the Postmaster General. He had no opinion on the matter, and did not wish to have one, except it was that presumptive opinion of innocence which the laws awarded to all who were accused, and which the pure and elevated character of Mr. Barry so eminently claims. If impeached, it might be his duty to sit in judgment upon him—or, if he had an opinion in the case, to retire from the judgment seat; as he could neither reconcile it to the dictates of his conscience, nor the rights of the accused, to take the oath of a judge, with a preconceived opinion in his bosom, to be dropped out as soon as the forms would permit. He rose, he repeated, not to accuse or absolve Mr. Barry, but to express his opinion of the character of the proceeding which was carrying on against him, and to intimate an idea of what might be proper to be done hereafter in regard to it. He then affirmed with deep and evident feeling, that he looked upon the whole proceeding, from its first inception to that moment, as one of eminent impropriety, compromising the judicial purity of the Senate on one hand, and invading the privileges of the House of Representatives on the other. The Senate, under the constitution, tries impeachments—the House of Representatives prefers them. Each has its assigned part to act, and it is an invasion of privilege for either to assume the part of the other. If the tenth part of the matter so furiously urged against Mr. Barry was true, or even founded in probability, he might come before the Senate for trial; and it would be a horrid mockery of judicial forms for his future judges to take the lead in the case of accusation, and to excite, promote, foment, and instigate charges against him. To the House of Representatives belonged that part of the painful business; and the present proceeding in the Senate must appear to them as an invasion of their privilege, and an implied censure upon their negligence. It did seem to him that the House of Representatives might take notice of the proceeding, and feel itself bound to vindicate its rights; and the two Houses thus be brought into serious collision. To avoid these consequences, as well as to escape a compromise of the judicial character of the Senate, he was decidedly of opinion that the debate and proceedings should terminate immediately. This would save the further evils to the Senate itself, which might ensue. As to the past—the proceedings already had—he declared that he thought them a fit subject for that operation which had been performed upon the record of Wilkes's expulsion from the British House of Commons—upon the record of the Yazoo fraud, in the Legislature of Georgia—and upon the record of the Massachusetts General Assembly, which declared it to be unbecoming the character of a moral and religious people to rejoice in the victories of their country. He declared it to be his deliberate opinion that the history of the whole proceeding against Mr. Barry ought to be expunged from the journals of the Senate! Total expurgation from the journals was the most appropriate means in the power of the Senate to restore its own injured character—to make atonement to the invaded privileges and insulted feelings of the House of Representatives; and what, perhaps, was still more important, to prevent this evil example, this horrid combination of the accusing and trying function, from being drawn into precedent in future times when the party in power, and predominant in the Senate, might want the spoils of a victim. If the American Cato, the venerable MACON, was here, it would be his part to become the guardian of the honor and dignity of the Senate: in his absence, that high duty might devolve, at an appropriate time, upon some aged Senator. If none such undertook it, it might become his part to consider how far their places ought to be supplied by a less worthy and less efficient member.

Mr. WOODBURY then again rose. He regretted, he said, the course pursued by the gentlemen from Maine and Delaware, especially by the latter. It had compelled him again to trespass on the indulgence of the Senate, during the discussion of this resolution, although the subject must have become irksome. But new positions had been assumed—new insinuations uttered—new and extraordinary accusations rung in the ears of this body and of the whole community. Silence under them might be construed into approbation. In repelling them, he disclaimed all that part of the compliment bestowed upon him, in connexion with his friend on the right, [Mr. GRUNDY,] that they were "most dexterous advocates of the Postmaster General." He, as an individual, was in this body the advocate of nobody. He acted in his station as a Senator, and only as a Senator; and whomsoever in a public station, he might be called upon, in the course of official duty, to vindicate or condemn, he should endeavor to do it in a manner becoming that public station, and with a single eye to the public interests. In the discharge of what had devolved on him, as a member of the special Post Office Committee, in relation to the present debate, he had used, and should hereafter use, no dexterity beyond a dry appeal to our own congressional documents, and to such mathematical computations on their contents as every gentleman could disprove or verify for himself.

Poetry had never before, but once, he believed, been brought in aid of an examination into any of our fiscal concerns; and though that was done by the head of a department, he should beg leave to decline following both that example and the example of the two gentlemen opposed to this resolution, in preferring figures of rhetoric to figures of arithmetic. Nor should he willingly follow the last speaker in making political prophecies, whether as to men or measures. He felt much veneration for religious prophecies; but as for political ones, when uttered by politicians, who had made arrangements to bring about the events foretold, and were endeavoring, he hoped in vain, to verify their own predictions, he cherished not sufficient respect for such prophecies as to imitate such an example. The grave character of this body demanded of us to consider that we were in fact examining the conduct of one of the most elevated officers of the Government; an officer who, from his public station as well as his high personal character, was entitled to at least ordinary comity, and an adherence, on our part, to a fair, manly, and liberal course of investigation. We were carrying a scrutiny into the receipts and expenditures of nearly two millions annually; and we should do it, he trusted, on the same just principles, and the same settled rules of evidence, as governed us in relation to similar subjects in other departments, and in other periods of our history.

How had we got involved in this wide and desultory debate? Assuredly by a marvellous departure from the language and spirit of the resolution itself, on the part of its opponents. The resolution proposes simply to check the inquiries of the special committee into the causes of removals in the Post Office Department. This is a single and a fair proposition for the decision of this body. The committee being divided, an appeal was made to you, as you are the authors of the reference, and have power to construe, amend, or abolish it altogether. In favor of that proposition, the minority of the committee believed that the Senate had pronounced an opinion the last winter, after very full debate, and, therefore, not "carefully avoiding," as the member from Delaware alleges, an argument on the construction which might be given to the words of the reference independent of that opinion; but contending that, after such an opinion, the Senate could not intend to have a construction placed on the reference hostile to their own decision, the minority opposed going into an inquiry of the special causes of removal. They believed, also, that we ought not to embark in that inquiry, because all admit the Postmaster General has both the legal and constitutional right to displace any of his deputies. The right or power being conceded, there is no law nor sense in making him amenable, in the first instance, to the Senate, for any supposed abuse of that power. For such abuse he is responsible only to the other House as the impeaching body, or to the President, who can control or remove him at pleasure; but we, the Senate, can neither impeach nor remove him; and, as a legislative body, have no more right to investigate the particular motives which influenced him in any removal, than we have the motives of a collector of the customs, or a marshal, in the removal of their deputies. The general course of administration in respect to removals, it might be proper to ascertain, as once before remarked, with a view to legislation. So might it be in respect to the fiscal concerns of the department, with the same view; and the latter investigation might be pushed further, into the smallest minutiae, to see if any departure had been made from the acts of Congress about receipts and expenditures; and, if any departure, what remedies might be proper to prevent a recurrence of the mischiefs. But, in relation to particular removals, the law had entrusted the Postmaster General with unlimited discretion and power. Such a discretion could not be violated. There would not be, in any removal, a departure from the law, because there existed no law restricting him; and hence an inquiry into particular cases was unjust, useless, and improper.

So much for the direct merits of the resolution. But mark the ingenuity of our opponents, in getting up the rest of this extraordinary debate! The Senator who has just addressed you, avers, that the moneyed concerns of the Post Office Department are "rapidly verging to insolvency;" that this has been caused by the misconduct of faithless and fraudulent officers recently appointed; and hence, that you ought to permit the committee to ferret out the causes of the removal of their predecessors. To reach his inference, it will be seen that the gentleman has been obliged to resort to "two assumptions of fact, if not of doctrine," in the language of Colonel Lawless. If either of those assumptions fail him, in the proof or investigation, his inference against the check contained in the resolution has no foundation to stand on. Like the Indian philosophy as to the foundation on which the earth stands, he may rest some of his positions on the elephant, and the elephant upon the tortoise; but on what does his tortoise stand, if the department is not, in truth, verging to insol-veny? Or, if embarrassed, it has not, in truth, become so by neglect and corruption, but by your own system of legislation, largely increasing its expenditures? The gentleman, likewise, has indulged in these two assumptions, at the very moment when the committee were inquiring into the real condition of the funds of the department, and when his questions about removals might have been judiciously postponed, it is believed, till the truth of the assumption, as to insolvency, on which his other questions rest, were fully ascertained. But no; this did not suit the zeal and impatience of the prosecution. It was thought better to guess at the fact of insolvency, or attempt to show, from imperfect and perverted circumstances, than to wait a few days for decisive evidence, one way or the other—evidence, too, within our own reach, and which we were collecting by interrogatories to the department, access to its books, and the unlimited power conferred on us by the Senate to send any where for persons and papers.

The Senate will now understand the occasion, preface and unnecessary in his opinion, for entering this last wide field of accusation; and, considering the excitement accompanying it, they would excuse the trouble he must give them, while meeting the chairman on the different grounds travelled over. To save time, he would avoid, as much as possible, any recapitulation of any thing before offered by himself or the member from Tennessee.

In the first instance, the chairman asserts the department "is rapidly approaching the period of bankruptcy;" and that this has all happened under its present head, from the removal of worthy officers, and the appointment in their stead "of factious, brawling partisans, with no other merit than voting for the present chief magistrate."

Pray let me ask what evidence, beyond his naked assertion, has the gentleman condescended to lay before the Senate in support of these extraordinary positions? Does he point to a particle of testimony collected by the committee, except the deposition which has been read by the Senator from Tennessee about Fowler's bond? and which deposition proves mismanagement, if at all, under the administration of Mr. Meigs rather than of Mr. Barry. So far as the imputed indebtedness of Mr. Barry, as one of Fowler's sureties, bears on the present funds of the department, it is enough to say that, from that deposition, it appears our own courts, after a full hearing, and under a former administration, have rendered judgment in his favor. Although a new action might have been instituted, they never attempted it. It would seem, therefore, uncharitable, unjust, and, indeed, illegal, now to pronounce him a debtor, with our own records, and the conduct of our own public officers, standing unreversed in his favor. But the great reliance in support of the charge of bankruptcy is, that, from our documents, it can be gathered, that the present head of the department has, in his first year, "sunk," as the gentleman calls it, $114,000; that, of the surplus funds left in bank by his predecessor, he is alleged "to have spent the whole;" that "large sums besides have been drawn from the treasury;" that the balance against him is almost $100,000; and that, without the interposition of Congress, the operations of the department must soon entirely cease.

Now let me invoke the Senate to a close examination of these alarming assertions and inferences, to ascertain whether there be any thing of fallacy or falsity in any of them; or rather to see if they be not all utterly groundless. If I have any knowledge of the history of that department, and any judgment to understand its administration, it will soon be seen whether it is not now in a financial condition highly prosperous; whether it has not, during the last two years, eminently fulfilled the public expectations and designs in its establishment; and whether its prospects in future, unless blasted by our own legislation, were ever more encouraging or brilliant.

As to its general financial condition at any period, every person who reflects a moment must be conscious that it will mainly depend on the course of our own legislation. It is well known that not a dollar can be received or paid but by authority of law; and that while the officers in it conform to the law, the balances, whether for or against the department, depend on ourselves. It differs but very little from the Treasury Department, where the balances for or against the Government depend on our laws making appropriations and raising revenue, and never upon the officers in the department, while they merely fulfil our legislation. But who ever heard of criminating the officers in the last named department, because our own appropriations had caused the expenditures to exceed the revenue? A little further attention to the history of the balances, and the payments into the treasury from the Post Office Department, will show the folly of this mode of reasoning urged against us, merely from the balances, and will demonstrate to the public, that, if such reasoning be correct, the worthy predecessor of the present incumbent, whom none profess to impugn, is much more censurable than the present incumbent himself.

Allow me to read a few passages from official records on this point. Under the administration of Mr. Osgood, the balance in favor of the department, was

Under Mr. Pickering,	-	-	$15,392
Habersham,	-	-	84,594
Granger,	-	-	432,909
Meigs,	-	-	509,360
McLean,	-	-	499,008
	-	-	152,000

Thus it appears that, under Mr. McLean, the balances "sunk" from about half a million to only $152,000. But does any one, save the chairman, and he only by the analogy of his argument as to Mr. Barry, contend that this falling off arose from profligacy or fraud in either the then head of the department or his subordinates? Did any body deem it an evidence that the department stood on the brink of bankruptcy? Look again for a moment to the payments into the treasury from the post office.

Under Mr. Osgood,	-	-	$000,000
Pickering,	-	-	47,499
Habersham,	-	-	368,310
Granger,	-	-	291,579
Meigs,	-	-	387,209
McLean,	-	-	13,466

Thus, under Mr. McLean, the payments diminished from over a third of a million to only $13,466. Did he squander the difference on parasites and political partisans? Yet the gentleman's course of reasoning as to Mr. Barry on this subject much more deeply brands and defames his predecessor in these respects. No, sir; the explanation lies in the compass of a nut shell, and it is wrong and ungenerous to mislead the public, who may not critically examine our history on this point, into any injurious impressions against either of those faithful officers from these or other balances to which I will soon advert. In the earlier operations of the post office, it was, among other uses, deemed a proper engine to increase the revenues of the country. With a heavy debt, small population, and large annual expenditures, it was not our policy as a Government to establish any mail route which was not likely to yield a nett income; and whenever it was ascertained that any route run the department in debt, it was customary to discontinue it by an act of Congress. In this way the balances were easily increased, till they amounted in all to $1,693,958. Of this amount there was paid into the treasury, and devoted to the general expenditures of the Government, $1,103,063.

But since the last war, and the extended improvements and intercourse in every quarter of the country, which commenced a few years after the war, the call increased for new mail routes, and for greater expedition, and more frequent trips on old routes, and for more safe conveyances by covered carriages. To answer this call absorbed much of the increasing revenue, which otherwise would have swelled the balances and payments into the treasury under Mr. Meigs, and especially under Mr. McLean. Yet, still, late as A. D. 1827, the annual income exceeded the annual expenditure; and, but for a more decisive change of policy and legislation, which occurred the next year, Mr. McLean's balances and payments into the treasury would probably have equalled, though in office a shorter time, those of his immediate predecessors. In his annual report of November, A. D. 1827, he invites the attention of Congress to the subject of the surplus balances, and suggests the expediency of applying them all in aid of the great objects of the post office establishment, rather than paying them as mere revenue for general purposes into the public treasury. Among other objects, he reminds them the surplus might be expended in making or repairing post roads.

What did Congress do on this new suggestion? They at once seemed to adopt the theory, that the department should no longer be treated as a source of general revenue for general objects; but, rejecting the proposal to repair roads, they appear to have thought that all its funds should be expended in extending the advantages of the mail to all parts of the country, as widely, safely, and efficiently as practicable. Instead, therefore, of appropriating them to make or mend highways, and instead of leaving them to be paid into the general treasury, they passed a new law, (May, 1828,) creating over two hundred new routes, and discontinuing only four old ones; and they did this, although only in March, 1827, they had created two hundred other new routes without discontinuing one. To show the difference between this and the former policy, since Mr. McLean entered into the office, no new routes had been established for two years, instead of one year, before those in A. D. 1827; and when the former ones were established, (March, 1825,) some old ones were discontinued, and a general clause enacted to authorize the discontinuance of more if unprofitable. Two years, and not one before that time, (viz. in March, 1823,) ten old ones were discontinued, and only about sixty, instead of two hundred, new ones established.

Revert now a moment to the first effect of this change of policy after the suggestion of November, A. D. 1827. Congress, in the ensuing session, having proceeded at once to pass the act of May, 1828, although only the former year they had passed a very expensive act, and having thus indicated their intention to have the facilities and advantages of the department extended so as to engross all its income, the Postmaster General followed up the spirit as well as letter of this change in policy, and not only put into operation, between July, 1827, and July, 1828, the new and expensive routes in the act of Congress of March, 1827, but expedited and improved the transportation on the old routes many hundred miles; and, coupling both together, caused an increased expenditure for that year of between two and three hundred thousand dollars.

What was the consequence to the annual balances, about which we have heard so much? Mr. McLean forthwith fell in arrear, July, A. D. 1828, $25,015. But was this any evidence of unfaithfulness? He continued in office till the ensuing March—made the expensive contracts under the new act of May, 1828—put the routes into operation January, 1829—continued to improve the old routes—paid one quarter of the burden of the new ones, being about $25,000, and left the year to be closed in July, 1829, without any material changes as to expenditures being made by his successor, from April to July. The whole of this year was then virtually Mr. McLean's; and how did its balances stand? The department fell in arrears almost three times as much as in the preceding year, having a balance against it of $74,714. Was this, however, waste and corruption in Mr. McLean? Yet, forsooth, if the next and only year of Mr. Barry has a balance against the department, it is urged as evidence of incapacity, extravagance, and bankruptcy. But let us probe to the quick the next year, which wholly belonged to Mr. Barry. The balance against the department is less than eight thousand dollars above Mr. McLean's last year, being merely eighty-two thousand one hundred and twenty-four dollars. There was only this small excess, although there had been flung upon it the great extra expenditure of three quarters instead of one quarter of the new routes under the act of May, 1828, equal to about $75,000, and flung upon it besides, in the desire of the Postmaster General to advance the public accommodations, the expediting and improving of old mail routes, to an expense exceeding $100,000, and to an extent exceeding eight hundred thousand miles beyond any former year. There is no mistake, as the chairman supposed, in computing the cost of these improvements, because part of the stage routes had before been horse routes, and therefore should not be estimated at full thirteen cents per mile. No, sir; the horse routes are still left extensive as before, and sixty-seven thousand one hundred and four miles added; and the new and entire addition of stage conveyance is seven hundred and forty-five thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven miles.

But how would the two years have compared without the burden of the act of 1828? Mr. McLean's deficit would have been about fifty thousand dollars, and Mr. Barry's only about seven thousand dollars. How would they have compared, if you proceed and deduct also the amount voluntarily expended in each year for expediting and improving old routes? By the annual report of November, 1829, it seems you must, on that account, take $67,383 from Mr. McLean's expenses, which would leave a balance in his favor for that year of about seventeen thousand dollars; while pursuing the same course, and deducting the one hundred thousand dollars thus expended the last year, it would leave a balance in favor of Mr. Barry of ninety-three thousand dollars. Yet gentlemen talk of balances, as confirmation strong of waste, corruption, and incompetency in the present administration of that department.

Turn to another test of its administration. The chairman has to admit that the revenue has increased; but he says he feels no surprise at this, and that the credit of it is due to the increase of correspondence. But has he forgotten the other part of his argument, that the officers of this department are corrupt, negligent, and wasteful? If so, how does it happen they collect the revenue so amply, and account for it to a much larger amount than before? An amount, sir, during the past year, about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars larger than the highest revenue under any former administration. In this city, likewise, an improvement in revenue was still continuing, notwithstanding the inauguration, and other circumstances named by the chairman, are gone by; and the former had, in fact, gone by before the change. It still exceeded, in the last three quarters, by the return in his hand, more than double the revenue before 1829. To show what fidelity exists in the expenditure of the increased revenue here, and in the department at large, let it be remembered that we do not present to the Senate only the old items of expense, and the rest squandered or unaccounted for, but we present from documents, besides all the old payments, the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars advanced on new routes, and one hundred thousand dollars more advanced on improvements in old routes.

So much for the past. If we look forward to the close of the present year, what are the inferences justly to be drawn from what we already know from the printed documents before me? A large class of contracts has been renewed, and at an annual saving, on the face of them, of twenty-five thousand dollars. In addition to that, improvements have been contracted for, and put into operation, costing forty-five thousand dollars more, and are included in the same contracts, without diminishing the nominal gain of the twenty-five thousand dollars. The department will also be relieved from all the expense connected with the commencement of the new routes under the act of 1828; and thus we have decisive data from which to infer, that it is neither verging to bankruptcy, nor needing the aid of Congress to rescue it from ruin. So far from that, it never, as a department, accomplished so much. It never had the annual ability to accomplish so much; and, unless we ourselves break it down by the imposition of new and aggravated burdens, its prosperity and its balances bid fair to be every thing its warmest friends may desire. These are not only my own deliberate opinions, from a careful examination of official records, but they are fortified by the views given us in the last annual report from that department, and by the matured opinions of a committee of the other House the last session, after a full and able investigation.

A word or two as to the state of the department, even if a further annual balance against it should accrue the present year. Has it, as is intimated, no means of payment without invoking us? Has it wasted all the surplus left under its administration for forty years? The Senate will recollect, that the surplus of balances exceeded the payments into the treasury during that period, something like five hundred and forty-one thousand dollars. The bad debts and losses, during the forty years, reduced that amount to what Mr. McLean, in July, 1828, considered available funds, that is, to three hundred and thirty-two thousand one hundred and five dollars. This last sum has been further reduced by the old causes, by corrections of errors, and by the new annual balances against the department, to about one hundred and forty thousand dollars. But there still remains one hundred and forty thousand dollars under the control of the department, to meet any future annual deficiency; and so far from being insolvent, or from imploring us for relief, it is manifestly in a safe condition, and implores only our forbearance to throw upon it too great additional burdens. The whole basis, then, of the chairman's argument vanishes. There is no foundation for his inference that the insolvency of the department has been caused by the removal of faithful officers. The insolvency exists only in his imagination.

But, for mere argument's sake, suppose the operations of the department were embarrassed, and its means deficient, is there a particle of proof that this has been caused by misconduct in its present officers? Did not the change of policy, which led to its present condition, commence under Mr. McLean? and were not its consequences developed during the whole two last years of his administration? and did not the change happen by our legislation, and in the fulfilment of our own policy? And is Mr. Barry to be censured for it any more than his predecessor? We, ourselves, wisely resolved that the current revenue, and the surplus funds, should all be expended in new routes and improvements. We, ourselves, created, within fourteen months, the unprecedented number of over four hundred new routes, costing over two hundred thousand dollars; and, in furtherance of the same new policy, the public called for the improvement of old routes, to the extent of some millions of miles. We have been promptly seconded in our policy by both the past and present Postmasters General, so that the number of post offices since 1825 are nearly doubled, and the distance of transportation is increased over three millions of miles. The Senate are hardly able to comprehend the extent of the improvements in that department, without some analysis and illustration. In twenty years, from a revenue of about half a million, it has swollen to almost two millions; from only about two thousand post offices, they have multiplied to over eight thousand; and from an annual transportation of the mail of about five millions of miles, it has reached fourteen and a half millions. This now averages a daily transportation, incredible as it may seem, equal to nearly twice the circumference of the earth. Yet a department, so prosperously administered, and so largely contributing to those beneficial results within the last year, as well as in the two preceding years, it is now the policy of the opposition to misrepresent, vilify, and attempt to put down, by the "starling," or rather the parrot and cuckoo cry of proscription! proscription! Thus successful and efficient, it is to be denounced as unfaithfully administered; and this groundless accusation is wantonly to be imputed to the appointment "of brawling sycophants, with no other merit than a support of the present Chief Magistrate." Fearing, doubtless, that he might be driven from this position, by the want of evidence to support the assumption on which his strongest inferences rested, the chairman next resorted to a series of strictures on particular acts of the Postmaster General—to strictures on a majority of the special committee—to strictures on the Senate—and, finally, capping the climax of reproach, to strictures on the people of Maine and New Hampshire, who have approved of removals.

The task of following the gentleman in this species of debate, is by no means agreeable, either in reference to the topics themselves, to my own taste and habits in public speaking, or to the personal collision it may seem to produce between us.

But, with my present strong convictions of the injustice which has been done to the head of this department, and to a portion of my constituents, by these strictures, it would be dishonorable not to repel them. Hence I do not choose to leave them unnoticed, as otherwise they might be, provided they were all true; because they possess no bearing on the propriety or impropriety of passing the resolution under consideration. Let us look at these, then, in their order, apart from their utter irrelevancy to the question. Not a particle of evidence, has been cited to justify the strictures on Mr. Barry, but the single affidavit before mentioned, about the Fowler case. That affidavit has been fully scrutinized and explained by the Senator from Tennessee; and, I will only add, it shows Mr. B. honorably discharged in one trial about his indebtedness, and so strong a conviction in the past administration of the correctness of that discharge, as to have prevented them from any new attempts to render him liable. Next, we have against Mr. Barry the famous letter introduced and read with so much formality, though it is no part of the evidence before the committee, but has been entirely ruled out. If the examination of the author of it, on other points in the letter, turns out like his examination about Fowler's case, nobody but the writer will have much to fear from its contents. Mere letters, it is true, have their value; but, coming from an avowed opponent, and after a proposition for a confidential compromise, are not, it is presumed, in this experienced body, to be deemed evidence against even the humblest citizen in the smallest accusation. But what are the other charges contained in the letter, as it has been read and relied on? That Mr. Barry was probably incompetent to write a mere official circular, and hence resorted to a clerk. This, too, is advanced against a gentleman of acknowledged natural talents, of finished education, and of distinguished professional attainments. The very statement alone stamps upon the charge reprobation and extreme folly. What next? That the printing of advertisements in this city, from his department, had been needlessly expensive; when I now hold in my hand an official call, and an official answer to it, on this very point, at the last session, by which it appears that the printing for A. D. 1829, of the above character, was from three to four thousand dollars less expensive than it had been in either of the two preceding years. Extravagance in repairs and furniture: when, in the same document, all can read a full and satisfactory explanation on that point. That he has paid money in advance to a political partisan: when, from the same document, it appears that the draft for the money was drawn and accepted under his predecessor, and was not paid, when it fell due, by Mr. Barry, until taken in discharge of new services. That mismanagement existed in making a contract to carry the mail to New Orleans: when the same document clearly explains the groundless character of this imputation; and when experience under that contract has shown a regularity and improvement on that great commercial route, which is invaluable to the community, and which will soon augment the revenue in that quarter more than enough to meet all the increased expense. Next, a new arrangement of duties to the clerks, and unnecessary expenses in extra clerk hire: when, on the very next page of this printed document, all can read and see that the new division of duties introduced promises, like that of labor in manufactures, to make the discharge of them more perfect, and to cause a greater amount to be performed by the whole.

In relation to the expenses of clerk hire, which has figured on other occasions, as well as in this letter, I will give the Senate fuller and satisfactory explanation in a few moments. But, from these examinations and answers of the accusations in this celebrated letter, is not the questionable character of the whole manifest? And is it not demonstrable that the letter itself has been in other hands before this winter, and all its contents then deemed worthy of notice made the foundation of calls on the department? And have not those calls all been promptly met a year ago? Any gentleman who has the curiosity to compare the whole together, will find the document in No. 136, the 21st Congress, 1st session.

But one step further. Not satisfied with causing the whole letter to be read in the Senate, after the answers returned last winter on every point then deemed material, the chairman himself enters the field of denunciation against the Postmaster General. On his own personal knowledge, he accuses him, not, to be sure, of the high misdemeanor of wasting the public funds, or making groundless and corrupt removals, but of an unpardonable incivility, or of a heinous neglect to acknowledge the receipt of his communications forthwith. Next, he is condemned for delaying, without cause, a reply to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, and a reply to the first nine interrogatories of the chairman. In no very measured language, he is arraigned, also, as fearing an investigation, as thwarting legitimate inquiry; and is told that he "dare" not do this, and he "dare" not do that, from a dread of consequences. It is added that the complaints made by the chairman on last Saturday forced or compelled the Postmaster General to send in his answer to the first call. This is modestly said, although one would charitably think the probability is, the answer, amounting to five or six thousand pages, had been preparing for more than six months, and, having for a week or two been understood to be nearly completed, was sent in whenever finished, and because it was finished. Possibly, too, when in a few days the answer comes to the nine interrogatories, which has also been preparing about two months, and after the call was "immediately commenced," as the letter to the chairman shows, we shall again be told that that answer likewise has been forced in, by the fulminations cast again upon the Postmaster General to-day, for his delays and evasions. Pardon me, sir, if I remind the member from Delaware that these extraordinary attacks are made upon an honorable man, during his absence, and in a place where he cannot be present to meet them in person, and vindicate his conduct. Pardon me, sir, if I remind him that this high officer of the Government is no less pure in character, or elevated in feeling, than the loftiest of his accusers; that, so far from timidly shunning inquiry in proper cases—so far from being dragooned by threats, to acts of shuffling and intimidation, he invites all due investigation; he discharges his trusts from principle, and not fear; and will be found, at all times, and by all persons, to "dare do all that doth become a man." Does the gentleman, after reflection, seriously believe that the Postmaster General, if present, would not have been quite as much amused as offended with the supposed effect of certain menaces in expediting his movements? Would the Postmaster General not have smiled at that bold assumption, as a little too much in "the Hercules vein?" And might he not possibly have been tempted to repeat, in reply, the anecdote of the mechanic, who was employed to manufacture thunder for a storm, in a play, to be performed on a certain stage? The storm being over, and the thunder having been good enough of its kind, it happened, in all the subsequent parts of the play, when any fine sentiment or fine acting produced applause, the manufacturer of thunder could not avoid exclaiming to those near him, "See the effect of my thunder!"

But how stands the naked facts about the seasonableness of the answers, and about the accusation concerning unnecessary expenses for clerk hire? Not only has the current business of the office been performed during the last nine months, but the answer has been made to the call of the member from Ohio, filling, I believe, more than a ream of paper; and the answer far advanced to the call of this committee. The last, a call not trifling in its nature, and requiring little of either labor or examination, as intimated by the chairman, but one resolution alone of the nine, requiring every item of incidental expense to be stated for each year, in the department, since 1826. Another, requiring every allowance on contract to be detailed, during this administration, when the allowances probably amount to many hundreds. But thus much has been accomplished, sir, under circumstances when the current business of the department is constantly and largely increasing; and when in our official documents we are informed it has augmented full one-third, within only four years, by the increase of routes, trips, and offices. Did not Mr. McLean understand this subject as well as Mr. Bradley, as the chairman, or any of us? and yet he, with an increase of clerks from only seven in the year 1800, to thirty-eight in 1828, was obliged to appeal to the Committee of Ways and Means for a still further addition of clerks, and observed, "the business increases as rapidly as the operations of the mail are extended, and the public interest requires that the force of the office should be augmented." Whereupon Congress made provision for five additional clerks in May, 1828. Yet, in 1829, not one year afterwards, what said Mr. McLean again as to the pressure of business, and the necessity of still employing extra clerks? Not what the immaculate letter writer brings as a charge against Mr. Barry, that "he has employed extra clerks and agents, when the business of the office was as well and promptly done before, and when it did not require others." But Mr. McLean stated frankly and officially, "that during the last year, (1828,) he had expended for clerk hire, beyond the amount appropriated, $3,653 11, for which an appropriation was not asked at the last session. It was deemed better to defer any application on this subject until the ensuing session of Congress, when the increasing business of the office will require a more permanent provision by authorizing an additional number of clerks. The increase of business is such in this department, that any number of clerks sufficient at this time, will not be able to perform the labor six months hence."

Who could have expected, after all this, all this too printed and published in our public documents, and accessible to every one, that the letter should be read here, impugning Mr. Barry for the employment of extra clerks in 1829?—And that in 1831, after three times “six months” had elapsed, and a number of laborious calls had been made for information, Mr. Barry should be here severely arraigned and censured for not having been able to give to those calls an immediate answer?

But in the chairman's sweeping invective, his own committee, or at least three members of it, came in for a share of accusation. He says, it is true that he will not impute to them corrupt motives; yet he will state facts, showing "the suppression of inquiry," and other grievous misdoings, and leave the Senate to decide on the motives. For one of the three, I return him all the thanks which this kind of courtesy merits; and must add, that in the member from Indiana, though often acting with the chairman and opposed to myself and the member from Tennessee, in some material points, I have witnessed nothing but perfect fairness of mind, and in no instance any uncharitableness towards his brethren.

The gentleman from Maine likewise, though differing toto celo from us in opinion, has expressed no illiberality; and the remarks of even the chairman himself, I am willing to attribute chiefly to great zeal and ardor in his own views, and to less experience in having those views criticised or overruled, than has fallen to the lot of his colleague on the committee near him, [Mr. HOLMES,] in a longer course of public life.

But to return to the accusations. It is said part of the committee has attempted to break down and discredit Mr. Bradley from fear of his potent letter; as if that letter was so new and astounding; as if it had now fallen upon us like an avalanche, and had not been fully answered a year ago by an official call; and as if any body had done so much to break Mr. Bradley down as he himself had. It is he, who has voluntarily made his letter public property. In relation, however, to Mr. Bradley's character, I shall forbear to make a single stricture--and have adverted only to admitted facts, until his testimony, after the close of our investigations as a committee, may come under the consideration of the Senate. In the next place we are charged with evading inquiries, by addressing them, in the first instance, to the head of the department rather than to some of his subordinates; as if this course was not most decorous, and was not likely to ensure at the same time the most prompt and full reply. The censure would rather have been due, had we pursued a different course. When the replies come, should they not be satisfactory, the chairman has been repeatedly assured that any further application to other quarters for proper information would never be refused.

Again: we did not, upon the receipt of Mr. Gholson's letter concerning partiality in a mail contract in Virginia, send at once thither for persons and papers. This is called "refusing inquiry." Now mark the real transaction. Being informed the same subject matter had been under investigation in the department on an old complaint from the same quarter, we merely directed, that, before sending to Virginia, the correspondence and evidence on file should be asked for by a sub-committee, of which the chairman was a member.

Was not this judicious, in order to shape our inquiries properly in Virginia, and to ascertain whether foundation enough probably existed in favor of the charge, to render the expense and trouble of sending to Virginia justifiable? The chairman having neglected to obtain that correspondence and evidence, and the inquiry having thus and thus alone been delayed, I have obtained them for my own satisfaction as a member of the committee; and if any gentleman wishes to peruse the papers, he can see how proper it was they should be examined before incurring the costs and inconvenience of a mission to a distance.

Again: it is cast on us as a reproach, that we refused to allow witnesses to be examined when before us. Yes, because we objected to administer an oath just so long as was necessary to inquire whether the examination related to points within the subject matters referred to us, and not a moment longer, this general and grave accusation is rung in our ears. Once for all, behold an illustration of the temper in which the investigation is conducted. Are we to be told as lawyers, or as law agents, that any court or committee of limited powers should make investigations or take testimony on subjects not within their jurisdiction? Yet a preliminary inquiry on that point, as well as our other proper precautions, are imputed to us as attempts to stifle the truth, and exclude light.

It is confidently believed that no unjaundiced eye can discover any circumstance in them beyond due courtesy to the head of a high department, a due regard to economy in the exercise of our power to send for persons and papers, and a commendable dislike to encroach upon the limitations which the Senate, by a fair construction, seem to have imposed on the inquiries referred to our examination.

But enough of this. A similar accusation is hurled even against the Senate for referring the answer to the call of the member from Ohio to the standing committee, rather than to the special committee, on the post office. It was done, says he, to create delay in our inquiries, and to smother investigation; when the chairman should know, for it was assigned as a reason at the time, that the reference was thus made to enable the gentleman, friendly to the chairman, and on whose resolution the call was ordered, first to examine the answer. That gentleman was on the standing, but not on the special committee, and now, as propriety dictates, has the papers in his individual care, willing, without doubt, that any member may refer to them in elucidation of our researches.

But I have done with these details, tiresome, I fear, to the Senate, and exceedingly unpleasant to me. From the specimens given, the flimsy character of the whole charge is manifest. Yet a duty to the public as well as myself, a duty of a character neither to be sought nor shunned, has been discharged in the discussion of them: and I shall here close—after a few comments on the charge of bribery flung by the chairman on such part of the people of Maine and New Hampshire as have approved the removals made in those States in the Post Office Department. [Mr. CLAYTON here rose, and observed, he did not mean to make any charge against the people of New Hampshire; and only said as to those in Maine, that, in returning their verdict for the administration, the verdict was entitled to no more weight than that of a jury, who had been bribed or embraced.] I accept the gentleman's explanation to a certain extent. But though my immediate constituents may now be considered as not directly implicated, yet an indirect implication is still left upon their principles, and a most derogatory stricture made upon some of their brethren of a sister State, which I may be pardoned for noticing. That gentleman knows full well that the receivers of a bribe are as guilty as the givers, and that this accusation, however softened down, or construed into a mere comparative and political charge in the warmth of debate, is not one entirely to be overlooked. Since the explanation, I have no right to doubt the charge was intended only in a comparative and political sense; and in that sense alone, with no unkind spirit would I rejoin, that though the accused may not feel under the highest obligations to him for his compliment to their intelligence and virtue, yet I should do them wrong to say, I believed them alike indifferent to his censure or his praise. On the contrary, there is a class of politicians in this country, whose praise on political subjects they would generally think much more to be deprecated than their severest censure.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

DUTY ON ALUM SALT.

Mr. BENTON, pursuant to his notice of yesterday, asked for leave to introduce his bill for the gradual abolition of the duty on alum salt. He asked for the yeas and nays on his motion.

VOL. VII.—13

Mr. FOOT intended to have given a silent vote against the introduction of the bill; but the gentleman's insisting on having the yeas and nays on the question, brought to his recollection that a bill of similar import was before the Senate. Although the Chair had reversed his decision on the subject, he still considered that the question of order was involved in it, and that it should be decided by the Senate, for a close observance of their rules was an actual saving of time. He would ask if the economy of their time would not be entirely forgotten, if every Senator might introduce bills of the same nature of others previously brought in, by a mere change of a partial description, but where the principle was the same? If this were tolerated, their whole time might be consumed by their consideration, although they might afterwards be rejected.

Mr. DICKERSON was opposed to the introduction of the bill, because he considered it one of too much importance to be brought in at this period of the session, for there could not be sufficient time for its consideration. He was also opposed to the granting of leave, inasmuch as he considered it a bill which interfered with the revenue, by providing for the charge of a tax of so much for a given time; and to the Senate did not belong the right of originating bills which went to levy or continue an impost in which the revenue of the country was concerned. It was also a bill which only related to a particular description of salt, and the bill introduced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] embraced salt in general.

Mr. BENTON said, that as to the question that it originated a measure connected with the revenue, he would simply ask, had or had not the bill already before the House the very same tendency? The question of order he would submit to the Chair.

The Chair could not change the decision already given, but proceeded to take the sense of the Senate on the granting of leave.

A division was then had, when leave to introduce the bill was refused—the yeas being 17, the nays 27.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. GRUNDY's resolution.

Mr. WOODBURY concluded the remarks he commenced yesterday in support of the resolution. [What he said on both days is embodied unbroken above. After he concluded—]

Mr. SPRAGUE followed. He declined entering into any discussion on its fiscal concerns, but stated his objections to the resolution, as tending to impeach the veracity of individuals who had been dismissed from office in the capacity of witnesses before the special committee.

Mr. GRUNDY explained, and said, that this nothing was further from his intention, and he had no objection so to modify his resolution, as to do away with any erroneous impression in that respect which might be formed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said—I gave my vote for the resolution under which this committee was appointed, but most certainly not with the intent of vesting them with the power which their chairman contends they have a right to exercise. What is that power? One, sir, that the Senate has solemnly declared, after the fullest investigation, that the Senate itself had no right to exercise; a debate in which the honorable chairman of this committee strove with his usual earnestness, with unusual eloquence and ingenuity, but strove in vain, to establish a right in the Senate to call on the President to give his reasons for such removals from office as the Senate might deem improper. Sir, the honorable chairman needed not to have assured us that he was tenacious of his purpose when he thought that purpose right; the perseverance with which he clings to the doctrines which he on that occasion so ably advocated, is a proof of this. Now, sir, how does the interrogatory proposed to be put by the committee, and the argument by which that right is attempted to be sustained; how do these differ from the inquiry then urged to be proper, and the arguments which were then used, but which failed to convince us? The Postmaster General is an officer appointed in virtue of a law which prescribes his duties and designates his powers. His great duty is to secure the transmission of the mail, and the security of the revenue to be derived from that source. The essential power given to him for the performance of these duties, is the appointment of his deputies, and, as a necessary consequence, their removal, whenever they do not, in his opinion, properly perform their duties; they are answerable to him in the same manner as he is to the President—as the President may remove him in the exercise of his legal discretion, so may he remove the deputies whom he has, on his own responsibility, appointed. All the arguments used against the interference of the Senate with the removals by the President, apply with the same force to any intermeddling here. I will not fatigue the Senate by repeating those arguments; they were deemed conclusive then. Circumstances have not changed; nor have the members of the Senate changed. Whether any arguments now addressed to them by the chairman of the committee can have operated any change in their opinion, I should be very much inclined to doubt, because I have heard none now that I cannot recollect perfectly to have heard on a former occasion. Sir, they are old acquaintances, and though they, like old friends, sometimes put on new faces, and trick themselves out in the new dresses that they borrow from eloquence and talent, yet it requires no great stretch of memory to recollect them. I will simply ask the honorable chairman what practical good he expects will result from the inquiry? Let us suppose it proper, and pursue its course; a discarded officer of the department is called before the committee: “Sir, you were a deputy of the Postmaster General; for what cause did he dismiss you?” “Sir, it is impossible for me to tell; I was a most meritorious officer, regular in rendering my accounts, punctual in my payments, diligent in the duties of my office.” “Call in the Postmaster General: Why did you dismiss this man?” “Because he was totally unfit for his office; he never attended to its duties; his mails were rarely made up in time; and the mail-carriers were detained for hours at his office.” “Can you bring proof of these charges?” “Easily; you have only to send for the mail-carrier between Memphis and New Orleans, and for eight or ten of the inhabitants of the village where he lives; the distance is not much above two thousand miles, and you may have them here certainly in a year.” The report must be made in three weeks. Here is one case, and a probable one: How many such in the five hundred cases of removal? Take another: “Why, Mr. Postmaster General, did you dismiss A. B.?” “Because, sir, I had no confidence in him; a discretionary power was given to me, which I have exercised in all cases according to the best of my judgment.” Then I think that inquiry must end. But suppose, in another case, the suspicions which have been expressed, or rather the positive charge, that has been repeated till the echoes are tired with it, that the removal should have been of a person hostile to the election of the present Chief Magistrate, and that another, of opposite politics, should have replaced him; suppose this to have happened in three hundred out of the five hundred removals, what is to be the result? Why, the honorable chairman has long since anticipated it. Such conduct is corruption, and corruption is an impeachable offence. To this result, then, we come at last. A committee of the Senate, members of the high court for the trial of impeachments, are to be employed in finding materials for the accusation of an officer whom they, in the performance of their high functions, are to try; but this seems to offer no serious objection to the two members of the committee who have argued against the resolution; they think, and no doubt conscientiously, that it is part of the duty delegated to them, to inquire and pronounce upon this branch of the accusation against the Postmaster General. Nay, sir, they have gone further; they have entertained, and think it their duty to pronounce on accusations of fraud, malversation, and corruption. I did not understand them to say that these charges were true; but I did distinctly understand them to say that they were made, and that the committee were inquiring into their truth; and, unless I am greatly deceived, it was added, that they were supported by high evidence. Further, sir, the written allegation of some of these charges was laid before us; was read at the request of the chairman, in the shape of a letter from one of the officers who had been dismissed. Now, sir, against all this proceeding I deem it a duty solemnly to enter my protest. Every member of this body must pursue that conduct which is dictated by his own sense of propriety and duty. I have no doubt that the honorable members who differ from me on this occasion, are so guided. Far be it from me to inculcate them. But I too must follow mine; and my sense of imperious duty urges me not only to dissent from this doctrine, but to point out the consequences of what I deem a most dangerous assumption of unconstitutional power. Do we not entirely disregard the allotment made to us in the distribution of the powers of Government? Do we not encroach on those of a co-ordinate branch? and, by assuming powers not delegated to us, render ourselves incompetent to the performance of those that are? We appoint a committee for the purpose no doubt of inquiring whether any legislative measure is necessary to give greater effect to the Department of the Post Office. To give it any other construction would be to suppose it an unconstitutional measure. This committee asks for power to send for persons and papers. With confidence in the correctness of their course, we give it to them. And, under this delegation, it is contended they not only have a right to do that which the body, of which they form a part, has solemnly resolved it has no right to do; but, sir, that it is their duty to inquire into charges of fraud and corruption in the exercise of his official duties, by an officer upon whom, if he should be accused, we are afterwards to sit in judgment. Not only is this inquiry pursued in the committee; not only are its members forced to pre-judge the case, but the charge is uttered in the assembled Senate; all of us are to have our judgments warped and poisoned by hearing evidence and arguments to show the guilt or to prove the innocence of the accused. And then, with our passions inflamed with the warmth of debate, with minds perverted by ex parte evidence, and the mixture of political feeling that has been introduced into the case, we are to take our places beside you, sir, in the august tribunal where we had so lately sat, and we are to call God to witness that we will decide coolly, and dispassionately, and justly, between our country and the officer accused. How, sir, are we preparing ourselves for this duty? By violent philippics against the man who, if the opinion of those who utter them is well founded, must appear at our bar to answer them! by arguments which those who believe in his innocence feel bound to use in his defence! by the excitement which zeal and eloquence must naturally produce in the minds of their fellow-judges, to whom they are addressed. In our zeal for political reform, or for the advancement of justice, we forget what we are. We assume the accusing, when we have only the higher, the judging power. If one “twentieth part the tithe” of the accusations that have been uttered on this occasion against this gentleman be well founded, he ought to be impeached; those who believe them to be true ought immediately to produce the charges before the accusing power, not to reiterate them within these walls, where no voice ought to be heard in cases of alleged criminality but that of calm deliberation.

Sir, whether the charges are true or false, I will not inquire, until they are constitutionally made and legally proved. Until then I am bound to believe him innocent, not only by duty, but because I believe him, as far as my observation has gone, to be an upright, able officer, and that, under his administration, the department has greatly extended its usefulness. But, although this opinion may make me require and scrutinize proof before I condemn, it will never, if I can confide in my own judgment, swerve me from duty, if that proof should, contrary to my belief, be produced. Nor, on the other hand, can the misplaced invectives, the violent, acrimonious, and repeated charges that have been made, bias me against the man whom I esteem. The honorable chairman of the committee may, as he says he will, "teach his starling to cry proscription" until all the prating party parrots of the country can repeat it. He may, as he says he will, find his victim "when he lies asleep, and in his ear may halloo proscription!" He may make the Senate resound with this catchword of a party until he is hoarse with the repetition. Yet, sir, I trust the members of that august body will be calm; they will not suffer themselves to condemn or acquit but in the performance of their constitutional functions, nor suffer any delegated power to transcend those limits which they have determined to be the boundary of their powers.

Before I conclude, let me ask the honorable Senator from Delaware, whether he thinks his favorite word might not be with some propriety applied to the hearing ex parte accusations of fraud, corruption, and other misdemeanors against a high officer, repeating them in the highest council of the nation, and speeding them on the wings of his eloquence through the land, before the accused has even answered to the charge. The good feelings which I know that Senator to possess, will, unless I greatly mistake, in his moments of calm reflection, lead him to regret the course which an honest but mistaken zeal has led him to pursue on this occasion.

The observations, sir, of the Senator from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] are correct. The resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee does not go far enough. I offer the following amendment: Strike out from the word "to," and insert—"make inquiry into the reasons which have induced the Postmaster General to make any removals of his deputies;" so as to read—

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the fifteenth day of December last to inquire into the condition of the Post Office Department, are not authorized to make inquiry into the reasons which have induced the Postmaster General to make any removals of his deputies.

Mr. GRUNDY accepted the modification offered by Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. HOLMES then again rose. Sir, said he, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] stepped out of his way to catechise the Senate for instituting this inquiry. It appears, by a speech of his published this morning, that the proceedings on this subject are so unparliamentary, that they ought to be expunged from the journal; and, on another occasion, his remark was, that we were acting as petty constables to ferret out offences which we may be called on as judges to decide. Should the Senate obsequiously obey the mandate of that Senator, and apply the sponge to the whole procedure, it becomes necessary for me to proceed in the debate, and to preserve my own record of what I shall have done and said.

Sir, I have before shown, to say nothing of "petty constables," that, from our complex character, our legislative and executive duties may conflict with our judicial functions; but, that this may be the result, is no reason why we should perform no duty at all. As a further illustration—suppose the bill to regulate the mileage of members of Congress to be under consideration, would we be restricted from inquiring what reason there was to pass the act? Suppose members had charged double, or nearly double their distance, and received their pay, which, if not ground of impeachment, would be certainly good cause for expulsion—could we not inquire into the fact, as evidence of the necessity of a remedy? Now, expulsion is a judicial act; and will any one pretend that here legislative functions must be suspended, lest they should conflict with the judicial?

Suppose, further, that a member should institute a prosecution against an officer, either personally or professionally, and thus disqualify himself from sitting as a judge, all the evil that would result would be, that he would be excused from taking the oath. If this objection had not originated in the Senate of the United States, I do not hesitate to say that I should pronounce it a miserable subterfuge.

But the "dignity" of the Senate is thought to be in danger by this inquiry. Sir, if every member respects himself, acting neither the tyrant on the one hand, nor the sycophant on the other, but proceeding right on, and fearlessly performing his duty, the "dignity" of the Senate will be in no danger. And, sir, if we should retrench upon the rights of the House of Representatives, I trust that there is sufficient independence, and patriotism, and intelligence there, to sustain and defend their own rights and privileges.

Mr. President, the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLAYTON] was called to order by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON,] for disclosing what had occurred in committee, after he had patiently endured the disclosures of two other members, [Messrs. GRUNDY and WOOLBURY.] The decision of the Chair was against the call; he made an appeal, but withdrew it. If the Senate approves this interruption of such a Senator as the chairman, who never violates the most rigid rules of decorum, I can only say that such approbation bears melancholy testimony of a deterioration of the dignity of this Senate.

It is again urged upon us that our dignity will be compromised, because the Postmaster General may refuse the call. How? Does the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] anticipate that the Postmaster General will refuse to answer a call of this Senate? A Postmaster General—a green attaché of a "cabinet"—a thing not known to the constitution—refuse to answer an interrogatory of this Senate! Is this the degradation which that Senator predicts? And what then? It would seem to me, with all due deference, that the probability that the Postmaster General would not answer the inquiry put to him, would be the best reason in the world why we should inquire elsewhere. Can that Senator be serious that, because the Postmaster General was not obliged to answer the queries put to him, we ought not to inquire of any one else! I am really lost and confounded; I cannot for my life see, if the Postmaster General is not obliged to answer the queries put to him, why it follows, that the same or similar queries may not be put to the witness. There may be great weight in this argument of that Senator; but, humiliating as it may be, I am free to acknowledge that it transcends the limits of my understanding. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOOLBURY] disposes of the point differently; he takes what he calls the "broad principle," that the conduct of this officer is subject to the inspection and scrutiny of the President alone. This "broad principle" is strictly military. Each executive officer is answerable to his superior, and to no other power. So long, therefore, as the President approves the acts and deeds of the Postmaster General, no other constitutional power can reach him. This is, indeed, a broad principle—broad enough for the basis of the most relentless tyranny which ever scourged mankind.

But, since we have so lately tried a judge, impeachment is all the while running in our heads. The Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from New Hampshire, and even the Senator from Missouri, seem excessively delicate lest this examination of a witness into the causes of removal from office might at the same time disqualify us to try some one for some high misdemeanor, on an impeachment. And this urged, over and over again, with a gravity that provokes a smile. We have asked them, and we repeat the question, why then are not the other inquiries directed by the resolution equally objectionable? This question remains unanswered. Do the friends of the Postmaster General believe that in this particular branch of the inquiry there is to be found impeachable matter, and therefore we ought to arrest it? Have any members of the committee had the confidence of the Postmaster General so far as to learn that it is best to say nothing on the subject? If so, they, according to their own course of reasoning, are already disqualified to try him on an impeachment. But it does, however, sir, appear to me, that this is "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel." Both the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire have argued the Postmaster General's case with all the zeal and energy of advocates for their client. At the very threshold of the inquiry, they not only pronounce him innocent of every charge, but endeavor to demonstrate his innocence to the Senate. And even the "candid" Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENRICKS,] while he is willing to proceed in the inquiry, does it with a strong conviction that every thing will be found correct. Here, then, is the ludicrous predicament into which the Senators have placed themselves; they dare not inquire, lest they should become disqualified to try the Postmaster General on an impeachment; that is, the mere inquiry would disqualify them. Yet, nevertheless, they can, without any danger at all, argue the cause of the officer who is the object of inquiry, with impassioned zeal, and even attempt to impeach the reputation of a witness under examination. There is in this neither fiction nor poetry—these are the words of truth and soberness. Here is a glass that reflects their own faces; and one would suppose that they would startle at their own distorted features.

The Senator from Tennessee, in this preliminary stage of the inquiry, avers that an unpaid bond for ten thousand dollars was given up to the sureties by Mr. Meigs, and the whole sum was lost to the Government. But no such losses have occurred under this administration. Now, sir, the facts, as far as disclosed, are these: Fowler, the postmaster at Lexington, Kentucky, had failed to make his remittances; doubts were entertained of his solvency, and new bonds were required. These bonds were procured, and the present Postmaster General was surety, jointly and severally, with the others. After these new sureties, Fowler paid in enough to discharge the first bond. The account with Fowler was kept on at the department, and, as soon as the first bond was paid, it was delivered up to the sureties. The application of money, not directed otherwise by the debtor, is presumed to be applied by the creditor to pay the oldest debt. This is not only the principle of law, but it has been testified that this is the practice of the department, and that no direction had been given by Fowler or his sureties to apply the payments to the discharge of Barry's bond. Money had been paid in enough only to the discharge of one of the bonds; and if properly applied to the discharge of the first, the Postmaster General is now a defaulter to the Government to the amount of ten thousand dollars; and, according to the existing laws, his salary ought to be withheld until he shall have paid this debt to the Government. It has, however, appeared further in evidence, that a suit was ordered against Mr. Barry on this bond in the circuit court of Kentucky; that, on an issue in law, judgment was rendered for the defendant, but that a new trial was granted, the cause opened for trial, but that afterwards it was discontinued or dismissed—for what cause, does not appear. Now, inasmuch as a judgment, on discontinuance or an entry of neither party, is no bar to another action for the same cause, the demand is still good, if not paid. It rests, then, upon two questions: the one of fact, whether any direction was given by Fowler, or his sureties, to apply the subsequent payments to the last bond; and, if not, the other question of law, whether the Postmaster General ought, or ought not, to have applied the payment to the discharge of the first bond. Now, if, on a full inquiry, it shall appear that no direction was given by the principal or his sureties to apply the payments to the discharge of the last bond, and that it has been the constant practice of the department to make the application to the discharge of the oldest debt, it would seem to me exceedingly difficult to come to a conclusion that a former Postmaster General had lost ten thousand dollars, any other way than by neglecting to collect it of the present Postmaster General. Now, the inquiry into this affair is still pending. Until all the evidence is out, I give no opinion. I only say, that, standing as the case now does before the committee, so far from its implicating Mr. Meigs, it fixes the delinquency upon Mr. Barry, the surety upon the last bond. I mean nothing more than that the burden of proof is shifted.

It seems to me surprising, indeed, that, in this incipient stage of the testimony, when the aspect, to say the least, is unfavorable to Mr. Barry, why his advocates should decline further facts, and demur to the evidence. If, upon full investigation, it shall appear that Mr. Barry's bond is paid, and the other is still due, and was, consequently, wrongfully given up, then Mr. Barry is not a defaulter. But if, on the other hand, it shall appear that the money paid by Fowler was applied, as was usual, to the payment of the first debt, without any direction of Fowler or his surety to the contrary, then the first bond is discharged, and it is of no importance who has it, and Barry is a defaulter to the amount of the second bond, viz. ten thousand dollars.

Another circumstance in this same case seems to me also very extraordinary. Strong insinuations are thrown by the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire against the witness, Mr. Bradley—that he fraudulently gave up Fowler's first bond to the surety. Mr. Bradley's character is known to the public; and as nothing has yet appeared before the committee to warrant even a suspicion of such a fact, it appears to me that the opinion thus advanced is as premature as it is gratuitous. A great sensation is excited in the minds of these gentlemen at the giving up of this bond. It is true that Mr. Bradley tells us that it was not usual to deliver up the bonds after they were paid, but it had been done in other cases, and that this was delivered up by the direction of the Postmaster General. Now, if this bond was paid, whatever may have been the practice, there was certainly nothing wrong in giving to a debtor his obligation after he had paid it. Very few debtors are willing to leave the notes or bonds which they have discharged in the hands of the creditors, though cancelled. They prefer to have them themselves; and it was so in this case, as Mr. Bradley tells us. There was quite a controversy between the Postmaster General and the surety before the bond was delivered. Now it seems to me that here also the Senators are prejudging not only the case, but the character of the witness. There was nothing wrong in giving up this bond if it had been discharged, and this is a question which we had just begun to examine.

Gentlemen protest that they are not the advocates of the Postmaster General, but surely their professions conflict mightily with their practice. Even their language often betrays the character in which they act. "We have proved," "we maintain," &c. when, in fact, the committee do not pretend to "have proved" any thing definitely, nor to "maintain" any thing positively. I did not understand the chairman to take any different ground. I agree with him perfectly. From what appears prima facie, it is the duty of the committee to prosecute the inquiry. We had no concern in bringing the subject before the Senate. We think it an extraordinary—an unprecedented procedure. With any thing personal said to that gentleman, I need have no concern. He is amply able to take care of himself. I trust he is, in this affair, far above the reach of their censure. His conduct in this investigation is as irreproachable as his reasoning is unanswerable.

Sir, the Senator from New Hampshire, who is so exceedingly apprehensive lest the inquiry should commit us on some supposed future impeachment, is, nevertheless, very ready to aver, and attempt to prove to the Senate, that the department is not verging to bankruptcy, and, if it were, the removing from office is not the cause. There may be consistency in this; it may be that an opinion formed, and become deep-rooted by urging it upon others, would not disqualify a judge or juror from deciding the same cause, and that an inquiry into the facts in a case, without forming an opinion, would disqualify. But I confess it puzzles me exceedingly to perceive how any rational, impartial mind can arrive at such conclusions.

Suppose, sir, that the Postmaster General should be tried here on a charge of wasting the funds and deranging the affairs of the office, by wantonly and wickedly removing experienced and faithful men from office, and supplying their places with ignorance and irresponsibility, and that Senator should be called on to take the oath impartially to try him, would he not have prejudged the case? He has already arrived at a settled decision, and enforced it with all his powers, that the funds of the office have not been squandered, and that the removals from office have worked no public injury—that all is right and prosperous. Sir, do gentlemen perceive the palpable absurdities to which their measures and their reasonings bring them?

If the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire do indeed intend to smother the inquiry, and the Senate intends to sustain them in it, then they will, as the most effectual means, pass this resolution. If it is found that things there, in the department, will not bear the light, the sooner this inquiry is suppressed the better. I do not say that these Senators have, or have not, better means of information than the rest of the committee. If they are in frequent communication with the Postmaster General, and obtain their information from him, they ought to recollect that this may not be from the most pure and impartial source.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire attempts to illustrate one of his arguments by an anecdote. It seems that some writer had invented a play, or some theatrical performance, in which there was a thunder scene, and he applied to a mechanic to invent the thunder: the exhibition went off very well, and the thunder manufacturer ascribed all the popularity of the piece to his thunder, and would, whenever he heard the piece praised, exclaim, "it all comes from my thunder." This was probably the intended application. In reply to the suggestion that the Postmaster General might not condescend to answer the inquiry, the chairman had said, very properly, but not in the language of menace, that the Postmaster General dare not refuse to answer the inquiry sent by a committee from this Senate, and superadded that this very discussion might have expedited the answer to a call of last session, made by a resolution offered by a Senator from Ohio, [Mr. BURNET] adding, also, that the number of folios in that report might be calculated, if not intended, for effect. The Senator from New Hampshire talks loud of the moral courage of the Postmaster General, comes back to his figure, and denies that it was the chairman's thunder which produced the effect. It appeared to me that the illustration and application were very awkward and remote. But I can well perceive another very appropriate application. We have heard the thunder of the eloquence of these two Senators in behalf of their friend, before they have heard his case; and they are, as his advocates, urging the Senate to acquit him before they try him. If they succeed, he certainly will feel exceedingly grateful to them, and will stand on high influential ground. Should, then, the Senator from New Hampshire become a candidate for some high office, (say minister to the Sublime Porte,) and should he need the aid of the Postmaster General to further his claims, he would remind him of his obligation by the admonition, "remember my thunder."

Should the Senator from Tennessee become a candidate, say for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, an office for which he is so pre-eminently qualified, and he should need the aid of influential friends, (as I think he would,) he would say to the Postmaster General, "remember my thunder." This thunder, sir, is the very thing which is to be the means of rewarding these two gentlemen for all their patriotic labors. Their claims have been delayed—their hopes have been long deferred. But this acquittal of the Postmaster General, before they have examined his case, this exuberance of charity, will, if there is any gratitude extant, entitle them to this officer's entire and profoundest devotion.

[Here, at a late hour, Mr. HOLMES gave way; and, on motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate adjourned.]

NOTE.—Mr. HOLMES would not knowingly add any remark in reply to any Senator which he did not make in the Senate. But he will be pardoned for noticing in the printed speech of the Senator from Tennessee, what that Senator did not say in the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee has (very modestly) quoted from his own speech of last winter on Mr. Foot's resolution. It seems, then, that a Senator from South Carolina had quoted some denunciation of a clergyman of New England, during the late war, consigning those who aided and assisted the Government to James Madison, Felix Grundy, and the devil; that, in the debate on Mr. Foot's resolution, Mr. Holmes had remarked that he had no doubt that had the reverend gentleman alluded to thought of him [Mr. H.] at the time, he would have added him to the copartnership. The Senator from Tennessee, in reply to Mr. H., observed that he would propose, as Mr. Madison had become old, to substitute President Jackson, and add Mr. Holmes, and then divide: Himself and the President, and Mr. H. and his Satanic Majesty. Mr. H., in reply, stated that he was much obliged to the Senator from Tennessee for the compliment he had paid him; that though he would have nothing to do with the concern, yet he admitted the justice and equality of the division, for the Senator had put himself and the President on an equality with Mr. H. and the devil. Mr. H. added, that he was not disposed to question the justice of this division. He, however, did not believe that the administration could do without his Infernal Majesty, for he had done most of their business. It was then believed by Mr. H. and his friends, that the wit, if any, had been fully met, and that, to say the least, the account was balanced. It seems, however, that the Senator from Tennessee was so delighted with his own wit, that he has quoted it in his written speech, though he did not quote it in the Senate. Now, if the Senator from Tennessee has set up for a wit, and is in danger of failing for want of stock, Mr. H. has no objection that he should use this specimen until it is threadbare and out at the elbows, provided he will do it at a time and place where Mr. H. can have an opportunity to reply. It may, however, be well to remark, that when one is so pleased with his own wit, that he is induced often to repeat it, he may possibly get into the mistake that the people are laughing at the wit, when, in fact, they are laughing at the author.

Again: The same Senator, in another note, has stated that by Mr. Bradley's evidence it appeared that when he left the department there were forty-two clerks, a large majority of whom were opposed to the present administration, and that he was authorized to say that but three clerks had been removed by the present Postmaster General. Authorized! How? "Never heard him" (the Postmaster General) "express or intimate a wish or opinion upon the subject," and yet he is "authorized" to say this. The public would have been better satisfied that the Senator had not been in close connexion with the Postmaster General during this investigation, if he had informed them from whom he received this authority. Mr. Bradley is still under examination, and thus far no such fact appears as is stated in this note. When Mr. Bradley's examination is closed, we shall see the substance of his testimony. As it now stands, no such fact is proved, and this report of the testimony, on this point, is about as premature as the rest of that Senator's facts and reasonings. Thus far, it does appear, that when Mr. Barry took the office, of the forty-three clerks seventeen were believed to have been for General Jackson, twenty-one for Mr. Adams, and five neutrals; that, since that time, several have been removed; and that all the principal officers, including the two Assistant Postmasters General and the chief clerk, have been removed. So the evidence now stands. Is it possible that a member of a committee of inquiry of the United States' Senate into the conduct of a United States' officer, has reported to the Senate and the world the testimony of a witness before it was finished, accompanied by a declaration of the officer accused as proof of his innocence?

One word more in reply to what the Senator did not say. He did not threaten us with the interposition of the President to suppress this inquiry. No such language as this was used, or, if used, was not heard by Mr. H., viz. "I have said that I thought that neither the Senate nor the committee have the constitutional right to make this demand. Should the Chief Magistrate think so, of one thing I am certain, that he who never suffered his own private rights, or the rights of his country, to be invaded, will not permit an encroachment upon the right of his official station." Here is a plain and unequivocal avowal of the power of the President to suppress an inquiry of the Senate into the official conduct of the Postmaster General; and, had it been spoken and heard in the Senate, Mr. H. would have been unpardonable to let the speaker off without the severest animadversion. Of the President's prohibition in this case, that Senator is "certain," and the inference is, of course, that he speaks "by authority." It would seem then that this resolution emanates from the palace, and is an injunction upon the Senate to stop their "encroachment upon the rights of his official station." In brief, that the President has the right not only to shut the door of this department against the Senate, but to suppress even an outdoor inquiry.

It is moreover due to the chairman and to the people of Maine, that one word should be added in regard to the reported speech of the Senator from New Hampshire. Mr. H. was in the next seat to the chairman when the remark was made, which the Senator from New Hampshire construes into a charge of bribery, and he is sure that the chairman intimated no such thing. The two Senators from New Hampshire and Tennessee had exultingly said that a verdict both in Maine and New Hampshire in favor of the removals of the Postmaster General had been rendered. The answer was, that this very exercise of the removing power might sometimes influence a verdict; and the chairman introduced the analogy of a verdict obtained by improper means, for no other purpose but to enforce and illustrate his position as to the general effect of Executive patronage on the elective franchise.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

After disposing of some private bills and other morning business—

The eclipse having reached the greatest obscuration of the sun about this time, and the Senate appearing indisposed to go on with business—

A motion was made and carried to adjourn.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be required to inform the Senate whether the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," passed the 30th March, 1802, have been fully complied with on the part of the United States' Government; and, if they have not, that he inform the Senate of the reasons that have induced the Government to decline the enforcement of the said act.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate resumed the resolution of Mr. GRUNDY, as modified by Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. HOLMES, being in possession of the floor, then rose, and observed, that though he fancied himself well prepared to go on with the discussion on the subject of the inquiry, yet, as he had been given to understand that the gentlemen on the other side were quite willing that the discussion should here, for the present, have an end, he was not indisposed to adopt that course, as he believed enough had already been said by himself and the chairman of the special committee [Mr. CLAYTON] to convince the gentlemen that they were on the wrong side. [No, no, from Mr. GRUNDY.] Well, then, continued Mr. HOLMES, if we let the discussion here drop, I can assure the gentleman it is not because we are not well prepared for the subject on our side, for I myself have taken some pains to prepare myself, and have no doubt but I might be able to enlighten the gentlemen something further in a good round speech, if they were so inclined; but I shall content myself, since it seems to be the opinion that the matter has been, on both sides, sufficiently discussed, by moving that the resolution be laid on the table, with the understanding that the sense of the Senate, without further discussion, be taken on it to-morrow at one o'clock. The motion prevailed.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

FORT DELAWARE.

Agreeably to notice yesterday given, Mr. CLAYTON asked and obtained leave to report a bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of Fort Delaware; which was twice read, and referred.

On introducing the bill, Mr. CLAYTON briefly remarked that the officers and soldiers, during the conflagration of the fort, principally exerted themselves to save the public property, in consequence of which they had little or no time to save their own. No fire engine had been provided for the protection of property in case of fire, and the destruction was in consequence the greater. Under these circumstances, he considered the individuals concerned entitled to relief.

THE INDIANS.

The resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, was then taken up.

Mr. BENTON objected to the form of the resolution, and wished it so modified as to make the call more simple.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was willing to modify, but should have been pleased if the gentleman from Missouri had stated in what respect he desired the modification. He could then be able to give a proper answer. After a few remarks from Mr. F. in favor of his resolution, and a description of the views of the present Executive in relation to the Indians,

Mr. HOLMES addressed the Senate, and, in the course of his remarks, made allusion to the assumption of certain powers by the President on the Indian question, as encroaching on the legislative power and jurisdiction.

Mr. BELL asked for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution, and they were ordered.

Mr. FORSYTH had hoped that the two Houses of Congress were done with the Indian discussion, more particularly as the matter had been brought before the Supreme Court.

Mr. NOBLE said a few words as to the oppressive nature of the laws of Georgia relative to the Indians within that State, and made some reference to his vote of last session on this interesting question.

Mr. PRELINGHUYSEN said he had presented this resolution for the purpose of certainly ascertaining the views and purpose of the Executive in respect to the Indian relations of the Government. We cannot, said Mr. F., officially rely upon any report or information but that which comes to us under the official sanction of the Chief Magistrate. And, sir, the Senate and the nation have a right to know his policy. I am aware that the Secretary of War, in his report to the President, of December last, has undertaken to dispose of the intercourse law of 1802, by a very short process. He has, indeed, cut the gordian knot. He assumes the whole ground of the Indian controversy; takes as established, without argument or proof, the whole matter in issue, and then very gravely draws out the conclusion, that this law is unconstitutional, and ought not to be executed. He asserts the red men to be citizens of the States, and inquires, as if surprised at the necessity of asking the question, whether a sovereign State has not the right to legislate over all her citizens, white and red? Sir, he has not even undertaken to show how the red men, the Cherokees, for example, became citizens of Georgia; and yet the suggestions of his report are put forth as a serious exposition of public law.

A brief reference to the provisions of this law, and the causes which led to its enactment, will shed very clear light upon its nature and obligation. Until the year 1796, the relations of the United States with the Indian tribes chiefly rested upon the stipulations contained in our treaties made with these nations, and the principles of general law. About the time first named, our Government considered this subject to be of sufficient importance to engross the distinct deliberation and legislation of Congress, and accordingly, in the session of '96, the Congress of the United States raised a committee on regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers. While the matter was subsisting before this committee, a communication was made by the then President, (General Washington,) which, while it illustrates the character of that exalted statesman, affords a very valuable portion of history, that will refresh the hearts and encourage the hopes of every friend of the Indians. After the treaties made by the United States with the Cherokees in the years 1785 and 1791, usually known by the names of the treaties of Hopewell and Holston, intrusions were repeatedly meditated upon the territories of that nation, and Governor Blount, of the territory south of the Ohio, in 1796, apprised President Washington of these designs; upon which he addressed a message to Congress, as appears in the following extract from the journals of the House of Representatives:

"TUESDAY, February 2, 1796.—A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Dandridge, his secretary, as followeth:

"UNITED STATES, February 2, 1796.

"Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives: I transmit herewith a copy of a letter, dated the 19th of December last, from Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, stating the avowed and daring designs of certain persons to take possession of land belonging to the Cherokees, and which the United States have by treaty solemnly guaranteed to that nation. The injustice of such intrusions, and the mischievous consequences which must necessarily result therefrom, demand that effectual provision be made to prevent them.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

Here, said Mr. F., the principles and spirit of Indian intercourse are traced up to their head spring. We rejoice to find their origin in the spirit of unbroken faith and sacred honor that sheds its radiance over this Executive document. Sir, this record of other times, now, when to break faith with an Indian is construed down into something short of dishonor—now, when the clouds are gathering over and around the hopes of these forsaken people—at this gloomy epoch in their history, to look upon this solemn acknowledgment of all their rights as "a nation," and our sacred obligations by "treaty," and under Washington's own hand, is a grateful subject for consolation. Would, sir, that General Jackson might be persuaded to put away from him all those hasty, ill-considered counsels, that are leading him away from the broad and luminous path of illustrious precedent.

But to proceed with the history. This message and the letter were, in the first place, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and afterwards to a select committee of sixteen members, composed of Mr. Hillhouse, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Findlay, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Harper, Mr. White, Mr. Abiel Foster, Mr. Dearborn, Mr. Malbone, Mr. Back, Mr. Patten, Mr. Milledge, Mr. Greenup, and Mr. Crabb. In the selection of this committee, we perceive the importance that was attached to the subject-matter of General Washington's communication, and the principles that should regulate our Indian affairs. A committee of the first names in Congress, members from the different States, and Georgia of the number, took up the treaties made with these tribes, and the duties, rights, and privileges that grew out of our relations, and reported to Congress the first intercourse bill, which became a law in May, 1796, and which, in all its material provisions, is now the subsisting and un repealed law of the land.

These treaties, said Mr. F., had, amongst other things, traced and settled the boundary lines of territory between the United States and the Indians. And in the few sections of this law, to which I shall invite the attention of the Senate, they will perceive that in the Congress of 1796, of 1799, and of 1802, the several periods when this law came under public consideration, these boundaries specified in the treaties were recognised and adopted, and became the governing line of territory, in the first section of the bill. This law, like the treaties, runs the broad line between the State of Georgia and the Cherokees, and recognises it as the boundary between separate and distinct nations—between "citizens of the United States" and "the Cherokees," in specific and appropriate terms. No one of all the enlightened and exalted men who filled the seats of power, and aided in the councils of the country in 1796, entertained the notion for a moment, that Georgia had even the color of a claim to the property or persons of these tribes of free, and, as to her, independent people, and they legislated concerning them accordingly. After thus fixing the boundary, the second section of the law enacts, "that if any citizen of, or other person resident in, the United States, or either of the territorial districts of the United States, shall cross over or go within the said boundary line to hunt, &c., or shall drive or otherwise convey any stock of horses or cattle to range on any lands allotted or secured by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribes, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months. And by the fourth section it is further enacted, that if any such citizen or other person shall go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging or secured by treaty with the United States, to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crime, against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which would be punished if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, against a citizen of the United States, &c., such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months." Sir, who can fail to perceive how perfectly palpable is the distinction between the jurisdiction of any State of the United States, and the territory of the Indian nations? Every provision of this law is based upon this distinction, and would be absurd and incongruous without it.

Again, sir, the fifth section provides "that if any such citizen or other person shall make a settlement on any lands belonging, or secured or guaranteed by treaty with the United States, to any Indian tribe, or shall survey or attempt to survey such lands, or designate any of the boundaries, by marking trees or otherwise, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment not exceeding twelve months: and it shall moreover be lawful for the President of the United States to take such measures and employ such military force as he may judge necessary to remove from lands belonging or secured by treaty as aforesaid, to any Indian tribe, any such citizen or other person, who has made or shall hereafter make or attempt to make a settlement thereon." Here, again, the unambiguous principles of our national policy are developed too plainly to be mistaken, or misunderstood. A policy, thus sanctioned by the concurrent opinions of six successive Presidents, and by the harmonious legislation of Congress for the last thirty-five years, is suddenly assailed by the opinion of the Secretary of War, and sought to be frustrated and avoided—and for what, sir? For what? To enable the State of Georgia to break over this boundary—this sacred boundary—to invade the possessions of our allies—and deprive them of their property and liberties.

Let us for a moment review some of the features of Georgia legislation. Our act, be it remembered, prohibits all surveys or attempts at surveying of Indian lands, by any citizen of the United States, or other person. Georgia has, by a late act of her Legislature, resolved to survey the Cherokee country—now listen—

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall, by force, menaces, or other means, prevent, or attempt to prevent, any surveyor or surveyors from running any line or lines, or doing and performing any act required of him or them by this act, shall, on indictment, and conviction thereof, be sentenced to the penitentiary, at hard labor, for the term of five years. And the following section still further discloses the nature of the proceedings in that State, of which we complain.

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all white persons residing within the limits of the Cherokee nation on the 1st day of March next, or at any time thereafter, without a license or permit from his Excellency the Governor, or from such agent as his Excellency the Governor shall authorize to grant such a permit or license, and who shall not have taken the oath hereinafter required, shall be guilty of high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary, at hard labor, for a term not less than four years: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not be so construed as to extend to any authorized agent or agents of the Government of the United States, or of this State, or to any person or persons who may rent any of those improvements which have been abandoned by Indians who have emigrated west of the Mississippi: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to extend to white females, and all male children under twenty years of age."

Sir, said Mr. F., the crisis has arrived, when this conflict must be decided. Here is direct repugnancy between the legislation of the United States, and that of Georgia. Where is the Executive arm of the General Government to protect our laws and our treaties from violation? I cannot, sir, anticipate that the President will refuse to execute the laws of the land. I must hear it from himself. I maintain it, sir, as one of the soundest principles of our constitution, that the Executive does not possess the tremendous power of dispensing with the enforcement of public statutes. If a constitutional scruple shall affect the mind of a President of the United States, in respect to any act of Congress, he must get rid of his scruples, or he may lay down his commission: but while he holds the office, he must faithfully execute every law. It is absolutely imperative. The people of this country will jealously watch over this branch of Executive duty. They will expect its fulfilment, sir, to the very letter. Of all the men in this nation, the President is the last who should pause upon the requirements of any statute. He, at least, should be exemplary in obedience.

It may be, and has been said, that the opinions of the President may be inferred from the report of the Secretary of War, made on this subject, and by the President communicated to Congress. I know, sir, that a conclusion might be drawn from the silence of the Executive. But, on so momentous a question, I can leave nothing to inference. I submit, sir, that it is just and fair to the Chief Magistrate to propound a direct inquiry, and obtain from him a direct reply.

After some further discussion on the form as well as the substance of the resolution,

Mr. BENTON moved to lay the resolution on the table, to give the Senator from New Jersey an opportunity to modify it so as to call for certain specific information as to the Indian intercourse law of 1802; but the motion was negatived—16 to 25.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, Troup, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury.—43.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate then took up the following resolution of Mr. GRUNN, as modified by Mr. LIVINGSTON, viz.

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the fifteenth day of December last to inquire into the condition of the Post Office Department, are not authorized to make inquiry into the reasons which have induced the Postmaster General to make any removals of his deputies.

Mr. NOBLE made some remarks in opposition to the resolution; when the question was taken on its adoption, and carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, Livingston, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury.—24.

[SENATE.]

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

The Senate then took up the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. LIVINGSTON:

"Resolved, That a committee, to consist of three members, be appointed to prepare and report, at the next session, a system of civil and criminal law for the District of Columbia, and for the organization of the courts therein."

On this resolution a debate took place, which lasted until near three o'clock, in which Messrs. LIVINGSTON, CHAMBERS, WEBSTER, FOOT, FORSYTH, HAYNE, BIBB, and NOBLE, took part.

After so long a discussion, the debate was arrested by Mr. FOOT, who read a paragraph from Jefferson's Manual, to show that, after an adjournment of Congress, no committee could sit in the recess, the two bodies being dissolved. He moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion prevailed.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

NATIONAL ROAD.

Mr. BURNET laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, transmitting a law passed by the General Assembly of the said State, entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the United States' road" within the limits of that State.

Mr. B. remarked, that the first section of that law, and the first clause of that section, declared that the act should not take effect, or be in force, until the consent of Congress had been obtained; that, by the general provisions of the law, the Governor was authorized to erect toll-gates within the State, on such parts of the road as have been, or might hereafter be, finished, at distances not less than twenty miles; that the law established a rate of toll; that it required the money collected to be paid into the State treasury, and kept in a separate fund, to be called the United States' Road fund, the whole of which was to be expended in the repair and preservation of the road, and for no other purpose whatever, and that no more money should be collected than might be necessary for that purpose. He also said, that the rights and privileges of the United States, and of every individual State, were secured by the provisions of the law; that the mail was to pass free; that all persons in the service or employ of the United States, or either of them, and all property belonging to the United States, or either of them, was to pass free of toll; and that the law contained provisions for the punishment of persons who might be detected in the perpetration of malicious mischief, injurious to the road. Mr. B. moved that, for the present, the document lie on the table, and gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill declaring the assent of Congress to the law which he had presented.

The act was accordingly laid on the table.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia was then taken up for a third reading.

When the bill had been read through,

Mr. HAYNE remarked that he had not paid that attention to the bill which would justify his acting upon it. He thought, however, that he heard the Clerk read a clause (in the 12th section) making it a penitentiary offence to send a challenge to fight a duel. He asked that it might again be read.

[After the reading of the 12th section of the act, which ranks duelling with forgery and other infamous crimes,]

Mr. H. said he was no advocate of duelling. He would be very glad if any means could be devised to put an end to the practice. But his experience had taught him that every attempt to legislate unreasonably upon that subject had only tended to make the matter worse. To class it, as the present bill did, with the crime of perjury and its kindred offences, it seemed to him, would be productive of more evil than benefit. Under these circumstances, he moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to give an opportunity for its revision in this particular.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that there was another clause in the bill which to him seemed rather extraordinary. It was that which made the offence of gambling punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. He wished, if the bill should be recommitment, to draw the attention of the committee to this clause.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, the clause alluded to by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] that of duelling, had met the attention of the committee, and the force of some of the objections had been felt. In his own view of the subject, the most objectionable clause was that in relation to testimony in relation to duels, where witnesses were called upon in cases of prosecutions for duels. He could not say that this was entirely reconcilable with his views of right; but, with regard to classing this crime with others of an infamous character, it was conceived that the most effectual way of destroying those fatal ideas which honorable and high-minded men entertained of the practice, was to degrade it, and place it on a level with crimes of the most infamous hue. This course, it was believed, would do more to exterminate this fell evil from the land than any other. It was designed to assign it that low and degraded rank, in crimes, which should make it infamous, and thus save the honorable and high-minded portion of mankind from participating in it. It was evident to the committee that nothing but public sentiment could correct this great evil; and if it was the sense of the Senate that the provision of the bill was inexpedient, it would be shown by voting for its recommitment.

The view taken by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] on the penalty for certain kinds of gambling, also deserved some consideration. He could, however, inform that gentleman that the provision was not entirely a new one. He instanced a case in his own State, (Maryland,) where an individual had been incarcerated in the penitentiary for this crime. In relation to the evidence of this crime, also, it was well known that it was difficult to procure it by any other means than through those who were themselves the victims, and were entrapped in the coils of the gambler.

Mr. C. said, if it was the sense of the Senate to recommit the bill, he should not strenuously oppose it, though he thought, as the subject was now before the Senate, its features could be regulated there.

Mr. WOODBURY said, in relation to the clause which he had alluded to, that of making gambling a penitentiary offence, he would only remark, that in the State which he had the honor in part to represent, and, indeed, in all the Eastern States, where it was conceded that the people were as strict in their moral views and feelings as in any part of the world, the crime in question was only punishable by fine. It might be, that in other parts, where the evil was more prevalent, stronger punishments were requisite. Of this he would not pretend to judge; though, in most of the constitutions of the Eastern and Northern States to which he had adverted, a clause was inserted declaring that no new or inordinate punishments should be inflicted.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that he was not an advocate for duelling. He referred to the laws of the several States upon the subject; to those of New York, Virginia, and, he believed, North Carolina. In those States the penalty for duelling was disqualification from office; and officers were required to take an oath that they had not been, and would not be, engaged in a duel. This was as far as any of the States went in their enactments on the subject. The honorable gentleman from Maryland, said Mr. P., must be aware that the most distinguished, the most honorable, and high-minded men in this or any other country had been involved in duels; and he asked if there was not reason to fear that the suppression of the practice would lead to a worse result, the introduction of the stiletto. If duelling were rendered infamous or impracticable, would not men find it necessary to wear a dirk to defend themselves from insult? If a man of independent mind and honorable feelings partook of none of the characteristics of a bully, he would still defend his honor at any hazard. He asked if such a result had not been seen in Virginia, where penalties had been imposed upon the practice. He did not advert to that State with any feelings of disrespect; far from it; for there were men who held it creditable to be tenacious of their honor. But he believed that the enactment of severe penalties would have the tendency of compelling men to resort to the knife to redress their personal wrongs. In legislating for the District of Columbia, Congress should not go further than any of the States have gone. He was in any event opposed to ranking this offence with the most infamous of crimes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he should oppose the recommitment of this bill. If no other consideration had done so, the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] had convinced him of the propriety of its provisions. He was ready to grant that high-minded and honorable men had given countenance by their example to this barbarous usage. But would any man, in this age, contend that it was essential to resort to the pistol or the stiletto to avenge personal injuries? He approved of this bill, and this mode of legislating upon this subject. It was saying to these high-minded and honorable men, if you persist in this infamous practice, we must show you that there is a power stronger than your false notions of honor. It is found in the laws of your country; and the result of your perseverance must lead to disgrace, degradation, and infamy.

Mr. F. said he was about to state, before he heard the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] what his own experience had taught him on this subject. In the State which he had the honor in part to represent, the only way to put down the practice had been found to be to brand the act with infamy. Such measures had been taken, and it had had the desired effect. It would doubtless have the effect here; for when the legislators of the country put their seal of condemnation upon it—when the youth saw that their fathers and legislators were bent on putting it down, it would soon grow into disrepute, and fall under the predominance of correct sentiments. In trying the experiment in the State of New Jersey, it was, indeed, found necessary to show that the pains and penalties enacted against the offence were meant to be enforced. But when this was discovered, and the brand of infamy was affixed to the crime, it had, in a measure, ceased to exist; it had had the effect of correcting the public sentiment. It is such an evil, said Mr. F., as every good man should unite his influence and his interest in correcting. Mr. F. said, in commencing the operation of the corrective in New Jersey, fears of some of the evils predicted by the gentleman did seem to be justified. But now, since it had been rendered infamous, if the crime was ever committed, it was done by stealth only.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, the difficulty here encountered in this bill was a proof that it had been hastily drawn, and had not received that attention and digestion which it required. Of this he was before fully aware, when he had submitted his proposition of yesterday, which had been laid upon the table. He had not intended, however, to have interfered with the progress of the bill by making a single remark. But since a motion had been made, on which he must give a vote, he would make a few explanatory observations.

Mr. L. said there was, perhaps, no subject in criminal jurisprudence, on which so many inconsiderate steps had been taken, as that now under discussion. Existing laws punish all such offensive words as come under the appellation of libels and slanders, but not those minor offences under the denomination of insults. In one case, the person aggrieved brings his suit at law; in the other, he sends a challenge. The reason is obvious; for these are the only remedies in his power.

Mr. L. here introduced a letter on this subject, referring to the effects of the course pursued by the State of Virginia, and an advocacy of that policy which renders duellists incapable of holding office. In this, Mr. L. said there was high authority for the belief that the enactments of Virginia had been highly beneficial. Mr. L. said he differed from his friend from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] in the idea he had advanced that the suppression of duelling would introduce the use of the stiletto. It was not in the nature of the American people to resort to such instruments. It did not belong to them. But there was another evil to be feared. It was that of impunity; the difficulty of procuring testimony in cases of duels, and the strong feelings entertained by jurors themselves in exculpation of offenders. The reason of this was obviously that the punishment was altogether disproportionate to the offence. Such he conceived to be the case in the present bill. He would favor the plan of disfranchising offenders, and thus affecting their pride and ambition, as the surest mode of preventing the commission of the offence. He should therefore vote for recommitting the bill.

Mr. TYLER said, he confessed he had not before understood the full force of this particular provision in the bill. For his own part, he was fully persuaded of the inefficacy and inadequacy of all legislation upon this subject. The idea of preventing duelling by punishments was a futile one; and enacting laws providing for shutting a man up in the penitentiary for the offence, was an absurdity. Why, said Mr. T., the very motive of the offender laughs at your bolts and bars; and shall he be deterred by such a motive, while he braves the hangman's halter?

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had attributed the decrease of the practice of duelling in his State to the enactments of the Legislature; but if that gentleman would seriously reflect upon the matter, he believed he would coincide with him in attributing the effect to a deeper cause than any influence of law. He must also reply to an observation of his friend from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] who supposed that the people of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, were driven to the use of the stiletto in consequence of the enactments against duelling.

[Mr. POINDEXTER explained. He believed the instances were rare.]

Mr. T. said they were extremely rare; he had known of none since the enactments of the law against duelling. At the time of its enactment, such anticipations had been harbored, but they proved to be mere creations of the imagination. No such results had flown from it. The operation of the law had had directly the opposite effect; and this was felt by those whom it operated on. The fiery spirit of the South would sometimes manifest itself, said Mr. T., in their young men, and result in a challenge to fight a duel. His experience taught him that the consequence was a greater degree of urbanity in the intercourse of individuals, and he could safely say there were less personal difficulties or broils existing in the circles of society among his constituents than could be found elsewhere. He could attribute it to no other cause than the one he had adverted to. If you would put down this evil, said Mr. T., think not to do so by means of punishments. Attack the standing of the individuals in their eligibility to office, and you come nearer to the root of the offence. He agreed with the gentleman from Louisiana, that to shut the door to office, honor, and emolument, to the participants in the offence, was the most effectual method of correcting it. Do this, and your work is accomplished.

FEB. 18 to 21, 1831.] General Appropriation Bill.—Turkish Negotiation.—Internal Improvements.

[SENATE.]

Mr. T. said he should have been willing to have let the provision stand in the bill as it was reported, but it certainly went further than he was aware of.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, from his present situation in relation to this bill, he felt somewhat embarrassed and restrained in relation to his action upon it. The question certainly involved a great principle; and in order that the views of gentlemen might be deliberately made and calmly expressed, in order to give ample time for its consideration, he would move to lay the bill on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to; and,

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate went into the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. BURNET asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, therein recited; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. WOODBURY gave notice that he would, to-morrow, introduce a joint resolution, relative to a subscription, on the part of Congress, to a stereotype edition of the laws of the United States.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION, BILL.

The Senate then took up the general appropriation bill, together with the amendments reported by the Committee of Finance of the Senate.

The sixth amendment was as follows:

"For the outfit and salary of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; for the salaries of a secretary of legation; of a drogoman and a student of languages at Constantinople, and for the contingent expenses of the legation, $74,000; that is to say, for the outfit of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, $9,000; for salary of the same, $9,000; for salary of a secretary of legation, $2,000; for the salary of a drogoman, $2,500; for the salary of a student of languages, $1,500; for the contingent expenses of the legation, $50,000.

["For compensation to the commissioners employed in negotiating a treaty with the Sublime Porte.

"To Charles Rhind, an outfit of $4,500, deducting therefrom whatever sum may have been paid to him for his personal expenses.

"To Charles Rhind, David Offley, and James Biddle, at the rate of $4,500 per annum for the time that each of them was engaged in the said negotiation.

"For compensation to the commissioners employed on a former occasion for a similar purpose.

"To William M. Crane and David Offley, at the rate of $4,500 per annum for the time that each of them was engaged in the said negotiation."]

Mr. TAZEWELL moved to strike out the part above included in brackets, and this motion gave rise to a debate which occupied the Senate until past four o'clock, in the course of which allusion was made to the Panama mission, and the power of the President denied to appoint commissioners to conclude a treaty without submitting to the Senate the appointment, for confirmation, at the next ensuing session after the appointment. The gentleman who participated in the debate were Messrs. TAZEWELL, CHAMBERS, SMITH, of Maryland, BELL, KANE, KING, and SANFORD.

To give an opportunity for Mr. TAZEWELL to reply to gentlemen opposed to his motion to strike out that part of the amendment before noticed,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

The Chair presented a letter from William A. Davis, of Washington, in which he proposes to furnish five hundred copies of the laws of the United States, in seven volumes, including those relating to the District of Columbia, and the various treaties made by the United States with foreign Powers, as well as with the Indians, at twenty dollars per set, or one thousand copies at eighteen dollars per set; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BARNARD presented two memorials from upwards of five hundred citizens of the city of Philadelphia, engaged in the manufacture of iron, praying that the duties on foreign iron may not be reduced or rescinded; which was referred.

THE TURKISH NEGOTIATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments to the general appropriation bill—the question being on Mr. TAZEWELL's motion to strike from the sixth amendment of the Committee of Finance the compensation proposed for the negotiation of the Turkish treaty.

Mr. TAZEWELL was entitled to the floor; but, with his consent, Mr. ELLIS moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, with a view to going into the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked, that there would be no money to meet demands at the treasury until the bill passed.

Mr. ELLIS withdrew his motion.

Mr. KANE then submitted an amendment, to the following effect:

To strike out the items proposed by Mr. TAZEWELL to be stricken out, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"To the persons heretofore employed in our intercourse with the Sublime Porte, the further sum of $15,000, in addition to the sum of $25,000, appropriated for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse."

Mr. ELLIS then renewed his motion; and the bill and amendments were laid on the table, and the Senate went into secret session, and remained with closed doors until the hour of adjournment.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HAYNE rose, and remarked, that, at the opening of the present session, the message of the President of the United States contained a clause relative to internal improvements, which was referred to the committee on that subject. His object in rising at this time was to ask of the chairman of that committee whether the committee would make a report on the subject during the present session.

Mr. HENDRICKS (chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements) said he could only reply, [he had heard the gentleman from South Carolina indistinctly] that he could not say whether the committee would report or not at this session. He, for one, was not in favor of submitting an abstract report on the subject. At the instance of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] the matter had been referred to the committee of which he was chairman, and he had no doubt that gentleman could give the Senate more information on the subject than it was in his power to do.

Mr. TYLER said he was of opinion it was due to the President to make some response on the subject named, which had been noticed in his message. He himself had devoted considerable time in the preparation of a report on the subject, which he had intended to present to the Senate; and he remarked, on the importance of a direct answer to the message of the President. There was no reason to doubt that the draft of a report, which had been prepared by him, would have been satisfactory to the Senate, and to the people. He had received the co-operation of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] in the committee, though that gentleman and himself being in the minority, they had been overruled. He felt this explanation due to himself. Whether a report would be made, must, then, of course, depend on the majority of the committee. He had taken this opportunity to shake off all responsibility, so far as he was concerned.

Mr. DUDLEY said that the gentleman from Virginia was correct in what he had stated. He could not, however, sanction the report prepared by that gentleman, and was, for himself, of opinion that it would be better for the committee to make no report on the subject.

Mr. HAYNE suggested, for the consideration of the committee, that when they had arrived at the conclusion not to make a report, it would be well for them to move to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, a motion like the one just suggested, he might probably have made, but for his opinion that it would lead to a debate, tedious and unprofitable. He had no disposition unnecessarily to consume the time of that body. There were matters for consideration before the committee, which he thought were of more importance, and should have the preference. If any member of the committee chose to make the motion suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, certainly he should not object to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had carefully examined the draft of a report before referred to, prepared by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] and he felt it due to himself to say that he coincided with the views of that gentleman, as expressed in the report. The question of constitutionality was not dwelt upon in it: it had reference to the expediency of involving the nation in a debt which, in his opinion, could never be paid. The influence which such an extensive Executive patronage would have upon the institutions of the country was also noticed. By reason of the objections of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DUDLEY,] the committee had not agreed upon a report. No report would be made, therefore, unless that gentleman would concur with the minority of the committee; and on him, in consequence, would the responsibility rest.

Mr. P. (no other gentleman rising to speak) then remarked that there was some business of a confidential nature left unfinished at the time of adjournment on Saturday, and he would now move to go into the consideration of executive business. The motion prevailed, and the Senate sat with closed doors until near four o'clock; when

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

THE TURKISH COMMISSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments to the bill for the support of Government for the year 1831; the amendment offered by Mr. TAZEWELL, and as further proposed to be amended by Mr. KANE, being the pending question.

Mr. TAZEWELL rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

If I had consulted my feelings, rather than my sense of duty, I certainly should not have made the motion I did a few days since, by which the discussion then commenced has been produced. In this discussion, the infirmity under which I labor prevented me at that time, and, I fear, will still disable me, from doing justice to the subject. But, as I have commenced the task, (however laborious and even painful it must be in my present situation,) I will now endeavor to complete it, confiding in the Senate, who well know how I am connected with this matter, and who witness my present condition, to pardon this ungrateful obtrusion upon their attention.

In moving to expunge that portion of the amendment proposed by the committee, which goes to provide for the payment of "an outfit and salaries" to "the commissioners," appointed as well by the late as by the present President, "to negotiate a treaty with the Sublime Porte," I stated most explicitly that it was not my purpose to deny to these persons the money which the committee proposed to award as compensation for the services they were supposed to have rendered; but that my object was to express, in this manner, my own decided disapprobation of what had been done in this behalf, as well as of the mode in which this remuneration was now proposed to be awarded to them. I said, that if a bill having for its object the compensation of these persons, should be introduced into the other House, where it ought to originate, and should receive the sanction of that body, such a bill would meet my cordial support here, even if it should bestow upon these individuals more than the committee proposed to allow them by their amendment. This explicit declaration, repeated more than once, I had supposed, would have protected me against the imputation of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SANFORD,] which was strongly implied in the question he propounded, when he so emphatically asked if I meant to claim to the United States the full benefit of the labor and time of these persons, and deny to them any equivalent therefor. To this question, thus asked, I will again answer with equal emphasis, No. It is not my wish to refuse to these men one single cent. So far from it, inconsiderable, nay, doubtful, as I believe the benefits to be, which they are supposed to have rendered, yet I will go hand in hand with the Senator from New York, or any other, in awarding for their service, not a mere quantum meruit, but a liberal and ample allowance for all their time and all their labor, nay, even for their honest though mistaken efforts in this regard.

Having said thus much, I must take the liberty of signifying to the honorable Senator from New York the very wide distinction (which to my own mind is quite obvious) between such a voluntary award of compensation to those who intended well and acted honestly, and voting an appropriation of money, upon the application of the Executive, in redemption of the faith of the State, said to be pledged by those who I cannot agree had any authority so to commit it. One would be the acknowledgment of a debt, of a demand of strict justice, which, although Congress may have the physical power, they have not the moral right to refuse. The other is a mere application to our equity, not addressing itself in any way to our plighted faith. One is a common exercise of our power of appropriation, connected with nothing but the special merits of the particular case, and constituting no obligatory precedent for any other even of a like kind. The other is a direct sanction of what I believe to be an unconstitutional act of the Executive, and a voluntary abandonment on the part of the Senate of its rights and privileges. One mode of proceeding would furnish to the other House all the facts existing in the case, and necessary to a correct exercise of their discretion over it. The other is well calculated to mislead that body, by holding out the idea that the appointment of the persons for whom compensation is thus provided, has received the confirmation of the Senate; and that the public faith is thereby pledged to award to them the allowance customary upon such occasions.

The Senate cannot fail to understand the broad difference between the two cases; and, whatever may be their opinion of the correctness of the principles upon which this distinction depends, they will nevertheless see in the distinction itself the reasons for the course I am disposed to pursue. This course will lead me to co-operate willingly with the most liberal, in awarding compensation to these individuals for what they have done, whenever that subject shall be brought properly before me, but will not permit me to vote one cent, in the mode now here proposed.

If any Senator, said Mr. T., shall concur with me in the opinion I have thus expressed, that the power which has been exercised by the President upon this occasion is not granted, but forbidden to him by the constitution, and that its exercise has been in flagrant violation of the rights and privileges of this body, conferred upon it for the wisest purposes, then I know that my motion will receive support. But if a majority of the Senate shall differ with me in this opinion, it will be rejected, as it ought to be. In any event, however, I shall have the satisfaction of bringing this much vexed question to a conclusion. Presented as it now is, it must be decided one way or the other. There exists no mode of eluding it. It is the conviction of this, which gives to the present discussion all the interest it has for me; and which alone could have induced me to trespass upon the attention of the Senate at this time.

It has now been so long since I presented to the Senate a statement of the facts existing in this case, out of which the questions I mean to discuss arise, that it seems necessary to preface what I have to say by a brief recital of them again, that none may suppose I am about to waste your time by an idle dissertation upon some mere abstract proposition, which, whether true or false, is of little consequence to the country. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will favor me with their attention, while I repeat the statement formerly given.

Between the Ottoman empire and the United States no political connexion, or diplomatic relation of any kind, ever existed, from the hour which gave birth to this republic as an independent sovereignty, until the year 1829. It is true, ineffectual attempts were made to establish such relations and connexions, by both the Adamses while they presided in our Government. But the effort of the elder Adams, although approved by the Senate, failed, by reason of the refusal of the minister appointed by him to accept his appointment, and the subsequent abandonment of this scheme by those with whom it originated. And the secret efforts of the late President to establish such relations, without the advice or knowledge of the Senate, also failed, for reasons recently disclosed to this body, to which I will not now make any further allusion. Whatever may have been the desires of these Presidents, however, the fact is undoubted, as I have stated it to be, that until the year 1829 there never was any connexion or relation between the United States and the Sublime Porte, more than now exists between the former and the empires of China and Japan.

In this state of things, on the 12th day of September, 1829, and during the recess of the Senate, the present President caused letters patent to be expedited from the Department of State, signed by his own proper hand, and authenticated by the great seal of the United States, whereby he commissioned the three persons named in the amendment proposed by the committee, to be commissioners on the part of the United States, and thereby endowed them with plenipotentiary powers to negotiate a treaty of commerce and navigation with the Ottoman Porte.

I beg the Senate to bear in mind that this authority was not conferred upon these persons by any private letter or warrant written by a Secretary, and intended for their own guidance and governance merely; but that it purports to be granted by the Chief Magistrate himself, is communicated to them by letters patent, under his own signature, authenticated by the great seal of the United States, addressed to all whom they might concern, designed to be exhibited to the inspection of a foreign sovereign, and to be exchanged against similar powers to be granted by him to others who might equally possess his confidence. To whomsoever this seal was shown, it proved itself. When recognised by any sovereign, it entitled those who bore the commission it authenticated, to all the rights, privileges, and immunities accorded to the ministers of any potentate on earth; and authorized them to pledge the faith and honor of this nation to the performance of any act within the scope of the full power it purported to bestow. This is the character of the commission granted by the President upon the present occasion, a copy of which is now upon our files.

In pursuance of this commission, and of the instructions that accompanied it, Mr. Rhind, one of the commissioners, proceeded from New York (where he then was) to Constantinople. The other two commissioners were already near the scene of action; one of them being the commander of our squadron in the Mediterranean sea, and the other a commercial agent of the United States, resident at Smyrna. Arrived at Constantinople, Mr. Rhind exhibited his commission to the Sultan, was received and accredited as the representative of the United States, and his proposal to negotiate a treaty was accepted. Other ministers, clothed with equal authority, were then appointed by the Turkish monarch, to confer with him upon this subject. They met, exchanged their powers, and began the business of negotiation. This was terminated by a treaty, which, although it bears date early in May, 1830, I will presently show was not concluded until several weeks afterwards.

The Senate of the United States met on the first Monday in December, 1829, and continued in session until the last Monday (being the 31st day) of May, 1830. During this whole period, no information of these appointments was ever communicated to this body, nor were they at any time consulted, in any form whatever, as to the propriety of instituting this mission. The message of the President to both Houses, at the opening of the present session of Congress, in announcing that a treaty had been entered into with the Sublime Porte, gave the first intimation to any Senator, that any negotiation had ever been had with that Power.

Such are the facts existing in this case, as every member of the Senate well knows; and, by these facts, these two questions are presented: Did the President possess any authority to institute such an original mission during the recess, and without the advice and consent of the Senate? And if he did, was it not his bounden duty to have nominated to the Senate at their next session the persons he had so appointed during the recess?

The amendment offered by the committee, proposing, as it does, to give "an outfit and salaries" to these "commissioners" thus appointed, is a direct affirmation of the President's authority so to appoint them, and an approbation of his course in withholding all knowledge of their appointments from the Senate. Then, the proposition involved in my motion is, will the Senate sanction this usurpation of authority, which has been thus exercised in flagrant derogation of their rights? This is the question; and it is vain for us to seek to hide it from ourselves. A power has been exerted by the President, without our advice and consent; and he now comes here, asking an appropriation of money, as the pledge of our acquiescence in, and approbation of, that which he has so done. Ought we to grant the application which has this object? I pray the Senate to consider the matter well, before they agree thus voluntarily and forever to surrender their highest privilege, conferred upon them by the constitution for the wisest purposes.

Before I undertake to examine the questions I have stated, let me call the attention of the Senate to the nature and character of what is supposed by some to be the "trifling" power which has been exerted upon this occasion.

SENATE.]

Turkish Commission.

If the President alone, without the advice and consent of the Senate, may originate a mission to a State with which we have never before had any political connexion or diplomatic intercourse, all must concede that he may compound that mission of what materials he may think proper. If he may despatch one minister, he has the same authority to send three, as he has done, or five, as was done in the negotiations at Ghent, or so many more as he may think fit. The same power he possesses to send ministers, he must also possess to accompany them with such and so many secretaries, interpreters, students of languages, and other attachés, as in his discretion he may judge useful to his new legation. And if he may appoint all these, doubtless he may contract with all and each of the members of this newly recruited corps diplomatique, as to the quantum of the compensation to be paid for their services. Thus he will have an unlimited power to pledge the public revenue to any extent he may choose. We shall then have these strange anomalies in our Government, that the President, who cannot touch one cent even of his own salary without the consent of both Houses of Congress, may, nevertheless, by his own act, properly create any charge upon the treasury in favor of another which he may think proper; and although, as to our long established and approved diplomatic connexions, the President must not enlarge the establishments fixed by Congress, yet, as to all new relations, his own discretion is the only check upon his own will.

Nor is this all. If the President alone, without the advice and consent of the Senate, may originate a new mission to Turkey, a Power with which the United States never had any political connexion or diplomatic relation, he certainly must have the same authority as to any other State. Then, the moment the Senate adjourns, he may adopt the suggestion of Mr. Rhind, contained in one of the letters now on your table, which has been read, and despatch a troop of diplomatists to Armenia, and another to Persia, on missions to which I am very confident the Senate would never give their advice or consent. If the matter should end here, although I, and the very few others who still think as I do, might regret this unexpected extension of Executive patronage, and useless waste of the public treasure, yet it would not be productive probably of much other positive mischief at present. But it might not end here.

Sir, we live in strange times. Revolutions of Government, and the dismemberment of empires, events, which formerly were almost of as rare occurrence in the political world, as those terrible convulsions of the natural world, which sometimes have shaken to its centre the globe we inhabit, have of late become quite common incidents. We now feel surprise if our newspapers do not furnish us, daily, with the details of some sanguinary civil conflict, of some new change in long established Governments, or of some division of ancient States and empires. Old dominions are almost hourly tottering to their downfall, and new sovereignties, springing from their ruin, are claiming to be recognised as independent members of the great family of nations. At such a season as this, while the thunder rolls and the lightning gleams in the distance only, it becomes us to look well to the ship in which our all is embarked. Our country expects every man to do his duty; and the first duty she enjoins is a faithful observance of the mandates of her constitution. If the President alone, without consulting either House of Congress, may institute an original mission to Turkey, so he may to Greece, to Egypt, to Belgium, or to Poland. Now we all know, not only what might be, but certainly would be, the result of this. It would be just cause of war; and the United States would at once be involved in that dreadful conflict which seems but to wait the return of spring to deluge Europe once more with blood, and to threaten the repose of all Christendom, perhaps of all the world. Here, then, would be another anomaly in our Government; for while Congress alone is authorized by the constitution to declare war, by the mere exercise of this "trifling" power of despatching a minister to a new State, the President alone would be authorized to bring about that very state of things which the wise authors of that instrument certainly intended to commit to the discretion of Congress only.

Such is the nature, and such may be the effects, of the "trifling" power that has been exerted by the President upon this occasion, and which we are now asked to approve, to sanctify, and so to perpetuate in him and his successors. Let me not be told, as has been more than insinuated by some, that this vast power will be lodged in the discretion of the President; and that we should have so much confidence in the wisdom and virtue of this officer, as to believe that the power will not be abused or exercised indiscreetly. Sir, I never have had, and I never can have, so much confidence in any President, as willingly to confide to his unchecked discretion any important power, with even a hope that it will not be abused. It is in the nature of man to covet power, and to abuse that which he has, in order to acquire more; and, of all forms of Government, this elective monarchy of ours is least calculated to repress this natural proclivity of its temporary chief, especially if he desires to retain his place for another term. Confidence in the discretion of their Executive has ever been the bane of republics, from the earliest day; and I speak in the spirit of our own constitution when I say that, instead of such confidence, it inculcates distrust in every line. Under the influence of this spirit, I denied the claim to this identical power, when it was asserted by the immediate predecessor of the present incumbent of the Presidential chair; and under the same influence I now deny it to him. In the discreet exercise of all the powers conferred upon him by the constitution, he ever has had, and ever shall have, my sincere and cordial support; but whenever he oversteps the limit there prescribed, I will oppose his lawless acts with the same zeal and freedom I have ever heretofore manifested upon other like occasions. Has he done so in the instance before us? This is the question, to which I now invite the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, whatever may be the opinions of some as to the inherent powers supposed to be enjoyed by this body, or some other departments of this Government, I think we must all agree that the Executive has no such inherent or undefined authority. All his powers must be derived under some express grant contained in the constitution. Inherent power in him would be but a courtly term to denote prerogative; and the exercise of any ungranted authority by him is nothing else than mere usurpation. Let us then turn to the charter, and see if that contains the concession of any such power as has been here exerted.

It is true that the first section of the second article of the constitution vests in the President "the Executive power;" and equally true that the power which has been exercised upon this occasion, is properly an Executive power. Therefore, if there was no other provision in the constitution upon the subject than this, no doubt would exist that the President was authorized to do that which he has done. But the constitution does not stop here. Very soon after this general grant of the Executive power, and in the next section of the same article which contains the grant, the constitution proceeds to check and restrain the power so granted, by prescribing the manner in which alone the President must exercise it. Thus, in the second paragraph of the second section of this same second article, it declares that "he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;" and then, that "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court; and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." Hence it is obvious, that, although the Executive power is vested in the President alone, he is expressly inhibited from making treaties, (if indeed that is an Executive power,) or appointing to any office of the United States, (which certainly is such,) without the advice and consent of the Senate. But the officers in question never have been nominated to the Senate, nor has this body advised or consented to their appointment in any way; therefore, the act of the President in conferring these appointments without the concurrence of the Senate can derive no sanction or support from this part of the constitution.

If this act can be justified at all, its justification must be sought for in the next paragraph of this same section, which declares that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." This is the only part of the constitution which has affinity to, or connexion with, the power in question. Let me then inquire whether the desired justification can be found here.

The general rule is such, as I have read it from the constitution, that appointments to office must be made by the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Under this rule, the President alone has no more authority to appoint without nominating to the Senate, than the Senate have to advise the appointment of one not nominated by him. The exception to this rule is contained in the clause I have just read. But to bring the case within the purview of this exception, and so to take it out of the operation of the rule, these three things must occur: There must be a vacancy—this vacancy must have happened—and this happening must have taken place during the recess of the Senate. Unless all these things concur, the President can find no support for the power he has exercised, in this exception. Now I undertake to show that, instead of the concurrence of all these events, not one of them existed on the 12th day of September, 1829, when these appointments were made by the President alone.

Mr. President, as this constitution was certainly intended by its authors to be exhibited to the people, to the end that it might be read and understood by them, in order that, when understood, if approved, it might be adopted by them, I have ever believed that the true rule of construing it was to give to all its familiar terms their popular signification at the time of its adoption. In that sense, such terms were probably first used; in that sense, they were certainly afterwards understood; and, being adopted in that sense, their signification should ever afterwards remain unchanged. If this is not so, then indeed is the constitution "a mere nose of wax," which may be pressed into any shape, not only by designing and ambitious statesmen, but by every drivelling philologist or moon-struck metaphysician who may choose to amuse himself by a dissertation upon the ever-varying meaning of words.

Trying the provision I am now considering by this rule, I ask of every honorable Senator here present, if any doubt ever did exist among the people of the State he represents, as to the meaning of the terms "vacancy in office." Throughout our whole land, their meaning was and is the same. Every where, and at all times, except in yonder public edifices, they have been considered as denoting an actually existing office, which, having been once filled, by some cause has afterwards lost its incumbent, and is so made vacant. The idea of actual vacancy, in mere possible offices, which never had been, and never might be filled, is much too subtle to have been suggested by the wisdom which dictated, and much too refined for the common sense that adopted, this constitution. Original existing vacancy, in non-existing and merely potential offices, like original sin, is a mystery. Faith in revelation may oblige us to adopt the belief of the latter, but each surpasses the powers of unaided human reason; and if we yield assent to the former, like good Catholics we must say, Credo quia impossibile est.

If, however, any doubt could exist as to the meaning of this term "vacancy," when regarded alone, all such doubt must vanish when we examine its context, and consider it in connexion with the other words with which we find it here associated in the constitution. According to these, it is not every vacancy which the President may fill up without the advice and consent of the Senate, but such vacancies only as "may happen;" and which may happen too "during the recess of the Senate." Now, according to the common signification of the term happen, it is never applied to denote certain events, but it is applicable to denote such occurrences only as casually may produce, which are therefore either unforeseen, or if seen, as possible in themselves, are quite uncertain as to the time of their occurrence. We should not speak reverently certainly, should we say that the sun happens to rise, or that the tides happen to change. There is nothing fortuitous in these events; they are foreseen, foreknown, and must occur, until it pleases Him who has so ordained, to change the order of his own providence. With as little propriety might we say that our chief magistracy happens to be elective, or the tenure of our judicial offices happens to be during good behavior. These things too are pre-ordained, and must exist while the constitution remains unaltered. Yet we may well say, of the death, resignation, removal, or disability of an officer, that it happens; because, even where the event is certain, the time of its occurrence is unknown and uncertain.

But if we could refer this term "happen," which denotes casually only, to the occurrence of events pre-ordained by the constitution itself, still the happening of such events must take place during the recess of the Senate, to enlarge the general power of the President. Then, if we could adopt as real this mere vision of existing vacancy in non-existing but possible offices, we should not aid him much by such a subtle refinement. For even if the office always existed potentially, it was always actually vacant, until it was once filled; and who can properly affirm of such an original and eternal vacancy, that it happened during the recess of the Senate, rather than during its session? Unless it happened during the recess of the Senate, however, the President has no power to fill it up without their advice and consent.

Mr. President, this question is much too important, as I have shown, I think, for me to permit it to rest even here. What I have said, I should consider as sufficient upon any ordinary occasion; but I will endeavor to make it so plain, that there shall not remain a loop whereon to hang a doubt.

It is a sound and obvious rule for the construction of every instrument, that where the same words are repeated in it, they must always receive the same interpretation. Therefore, whenever we can fix their signification beyond doubt, in any one instance, that meaning must ever afterwards be attached to them, when they again occur, unless the context shall plainly show that they were used in a different sense. Now an inspection of the constitution will show that the words used in the clause I am now examining, have been used twice before in the same instrument. They are there used, too, under circumstances which defy doubt as to their signification; and their true interpretation has been fixed and settled, not only by the decisions of this body, but by the uniform and unvarying practice in all the States, from the year 1789 to this hour. In this practice, every one, and at all times, has acquiesced; and if there can be any thing settled under a written constitution, it is the meaning of these words.

It is the purpose of the very first article of the constitution to create a House of Representatives as one of the branches of the legislative department. Therefore, in the first part of the second section of that article, it prescribes the rule for ascertaining the number of which this House shall consist; and by whom, and for what term, this number shall be chosen. Having thus provided a full and complete House of Representatives, the authors of the instrument, foreseeing that casualty might vacate the seats so filled, and this during the term for which their incumbents had been elected, proceed in the fourth paragraph of the same section to provide for such events, by these words, "when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Here then is an office created by the constitution itself, which the Executive of every State is imperiously required to fill in the mode prescribed, whenever vacancy shall happen in it. Then, the moment this constitution was adopted, there was not a merely possible office, but one of actual existence, as to the filling of which no discretion existed, provided this original vacancy could be considered as referred to by the terms I have read. But never did any Governor of any State conceive that this provision gave to him any authority to issue writs of election to supply these original vacancies. No such example exists; and such a procedure would be so obviously absurd, that any Governor who should have attempted it, would have been considered as deserving a straight jacket. Yet the power conferred upon the Executive of any State, by the words here used, is precisely that conferred upon the President, by the same words, in the case to which I have before referred.

So, too, the members of the House of Representatives are directed by this constitution to be chosen for two years. Biennially, then, all the seats in that House are made vacant by the constitution itself. Here, then, are actual vacancies in established offices, that have been once filled. But no Governor of any State has ever felt himself authorized to issue writs of election to fill even these vacancies. And why? Because all such vacancies being caused by the constitution itself, were therefore foreseen and foreknown, and cannot properly be said to happen. Hence they are referred to the general rule, and not to the exception, which applies to casualties only.

Again: The constitution having provided a House of Representatives, next proceeds to provide a Senate, as the other branch of the Legislature. This is done by the third section of the same article. This section commences, as in the other case, by declaring of what number the Senate shall consist, and by whom, and for what term, the members shall be chosen. Having thus provided a full and complete Senate, the authors of the instrument, foreseeing that vacancies might occur during the term prescribed, in the seats once filled for that term, proceed, in the next paragraph of this section, to provide for supplying such vacancies, by these words, "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." Here, again, we have original vacancies in offices created by the constitution. To these vacancies no Governor of any State ever presumed to make any temporary appointment, because they were original vacancies, and therefore were not embraced by the words of this exception.

Here also are presented the cases of other vacancies, occurring after the place has been once filled, produced not by any casualty, but by the foreseen and foreknown efflux of time. Our journals show us two attempts by the Governors of States to supply vacancies of this sort.

One is the case of Mr. Johns, from Delaware; the other that of Mr. Lanman, from Connecticut. In both these cases, the seats were vacated by the efflux of the time for which their former incumbents had been elected. In each case the Legislature of the State had made an ineffectual effort to appoint a successor, but had failed, not being able to agree in a choice. After the adjournment of the Legislatures, the seats being still vacant, the Governors undertook to fill them by temporary appointments. But in both cases, upon the exhibition of the credentials granted to these gentlemen, the Senate refused to permit them to qualify, because the Governors of these States had no authority to make temporary appointments to such vacancies as these.

Here, then, is a second example of the occurrence of the same terms, where their meaning is not only obvious from the context, but has received the solemn and repeated sanctions of this body itself. This meaning, so fixed and ascertained, is found to be in exact accordance with the signification attached to the same words, in the former case. Then, who can doubt as to the meaning of the same terms when they next occur, in the clause to which I first adverted? Here, too, the framers of the constitution, having prescribed a rule for all appointments to all offices, and required that they should be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, foreseeing that vacancies might afterwards happen in these offices during the recess of the Senate, when the public exigencies might nevertheless require such vacancies to be filled up, wisely and providently gave to the President alone the power of filling up all such vacancies. But they had no more idea of giving to the President alone the power of creating offices during the recess of the Senate, than they had to give to the Executives of the different States power to issue writs of election to fill original vacancies in the House of Representatives, or to grant temporary appointments to supply such vacancies existing in the Senate.

Mr. President, let me present the subject to the Senate under another aspect. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the origin of our different offices, I think we must all agree that the power of the President is the same, in regard to appointments, to them all. The constitution, in authorizing him to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint to all offices, draws no distinction in the mode of appointment to any; and his separate power over all vacancies which happen during the recess of the Senate is the same, no matter what may be the origin or nature of the vacant office. Then, if his power over all is the same in both cases, let us examine the different subjects to which this identical power may be applied, and perhaps we may so discover the nature of the power itself.

According to the opinion of some, there are three different species of offices referred to in the constitution: such as are created by statute--such as are created by the constitution itself--and such as, being established by the usages of nations, are merely recognised by the constitution. Most of our domestic executive offices are examples of the first kind; the Chief Justice, and his associates of the Supreme Court, are examples of the second; and ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, are instances of the last. Now with respect to all offices of the first class, that is to say, offices created by statute, it is very obvious, that original vacancies in these can never occur during the recess of the Senate. Because, as these offices derive their existence from a statute, which statute can only be enacted during the session of the Senate, and as these offices when thus created must be vacant, all original vacancies in statutory offices must occur during the session, and not during the recess of the Senate. Consequently, the President can have no power to fill up such vacancies.

Turkish Commission.

[SENATE.]

There never has been but a single instance of an attempt by any President to fill up such vacancies during the recess of the Senate. This attempt was promptly met by the Senate, who, not content with rejecting the nominations afterwards made of the military officers who had been so appointed, referred the subject to a committee. Their report, presenting, as it does, a clear and sound exposition of this part of the constitution, and an able vindication of the violated rights of the Senate, received the confirmation of this body, whose views were afterwards assented to by the Executive, as we all know. Then, no doubt exists that the President alone has no authority to make an original appointment to any statutory office.

The offices of the judges of the Supreme Court are the only description of offices of the second kind. These offices are created by the constitution itself, and are thereby required to be filled up. Here then is the case not of potential, but of actual offices; not of possible offices that may or may not be required to be filled up, but of existing offices ordered by the constitution itself to be supplied with incumbents. Yet, President Washington, during whose term these offices were all so vacant, and thus continued for a long time, never thought that he possessed the power to fill them up, until after the enactment of the judiciary law; and did so then only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate first obtained.

Nor could he have done otherwise. For until the passage of this act of Congress, how could he know what number of judges to appoint—what would be their salaries—where they were to convene—what might be the duties required of them—or what the rule to regulate their process and proceeding—nay, by what other means could the court have been supplied with a clerk, a marshal, or any other ministerial officers, indispensably necessary to the proper performance of their functions? It would have been as absurd for the President to have made the appointment of judges before the enactment of this statute, as it would have been for the Governor of a State to have issued writs of election before the Legislature of such State had passed the laws necessary to give effect to that provision of the constitution which required the members of the House of Representatives to be chosen.

If, after time, when none of these difficulties existed, and the number of the judges of the Supreme Court was increased, although the new judge, when duly appointed, like his associates, was in under the constitution, yet it was conceded on all hands that the office, although required by the constitution, was established by the law; and, therefore, becoming vacant during the session of the Senate, the President could not fill this vacancy during the recess, but must make the first appointment to it, only by and with the advice and consent of this body.

When we thus see that the President cannot make an original appointment to any office created either by statute or by the constitution, because the vacancies in such offices cannot properly be said to happen during the recess of the Senate, is it fair to argue that he has authority to make such appointments to the other class of offices which are established not by statute but by usage merely, and which are not required, but merely recognised by the constitution as of possible use? Does not every argument applicable to the case of the judges of the Supreme Court, apply a fortiori to these offices? Of how many ministers must the new mission consist—who and of what character shall be the attachés to the legation—what shall be the compensation allowed to any of the mission—and for what term may they hold their offices? All these are questions which must be decided before such appointments can properly be made; and the decision of each of these questions by the President alone is forbidden by the constitution in terms.

And here, Mr. President, I will offer a suggestion to the Senate, which upon my mind has always had much influence. It is not more the object of this constitution to create and confer power, than it is to check and restrain the authorities which it grants. No important authority is thereby granted to any department of this Government, unless it is limited and guarded in its exercise, by some means or other. Speaking generally, the judiciary can establish no rule which the Legislature may not abrogate, can pronounce no decree which the Executive may not refuse to execute. The Executive can do no act, against which the judiciary may not relieve, which the Legislature may not annul, or to which they may not refuse to give effect. The Legislature itself can enact no law without the assent of the Executive, and which is not subject to the revision of the judiciary, whenever it comes in conflict with the constitution. And the States, in virtue of the rights reserved by them as parties to the original compact, may watch over and control the joint or several action of all and each of the departments of this Government, so as that none may pass beyond its prescribed limits. Now can any one believe, that in such a system, so intended and so contrived, it ever was designed to confer the vast power which has been exerted upon this occasion, (which, as I have shown, touches and influences our best and dearest interests,) to the uncontrolled discretion of the President alone? The plain language of the constitution (as I think I have now proved) repudiates any such idea; and if this language was even doubtful, the spirit which dictates every line of that instrument, ought to suffice to solve any such doubt.

I have heard a single case suggested, to which (as it seems to present a difficulty to the minds of some) I must beg leave to pay a little attention. I have heard it asked, if the President may not fill up any vacancy but one that happens during the recess of the Senate, what would be the condition of the country, if an office, which the public good requires to be filled immediately, should become vacant by death or otherwise, happening during the session of the Senate, and which event could not be made known to the President until after our adjournment? To this question I have several answers to give, either of which, to my mind, is quite satisfactory.

The first is, that it is an extreme case, which must be of very rare occurrence, and the very necessity of which, whenever it shall exist, may well excuse the President for acting upon it, even without any direct authority so to do. But we should be very cautious how we give assent to that species of argument, which would infer the legality of authority in ordinary cases, from mere silent acquiescence in its exercise, when under the pressure of extraordinary circumstances. I certainly would not censure any President for making a temporary appointment during the recess, in this supposed case, even if I thought he had no authority so to do, provided he laid such an appointment before the Senate afterwards. I have no idea, however, of having even necessary medicine administered to me for my daily bread; or of applying this hard law of State necessity, which will override the constitution itself, to such ordinary transactions as the case before us, in which this plea of immediate necessity cannot have the slightest application.

My second answer is, that, according to a fair construction of the constitution, the President, in my opinion, has authority given to him to fill up such a vacancy during the recess. Sir, as in all human transactions we can reason only from what we know, and know but little of facts except through evidence, we are generally constrained to substitute this evidence for the fact it tends to establish. It is this imperfection of our nature which often prevents us from regarding as facts what are not shown to us to be such, and obliges us to assert the truth of what is satisfactorily proven, although the fact so established may be most false. Hence, I think it fair to say that a vacancy, not known to exist, does not exist for any of the purposes of the constitution; and when known, it does exist, and not until then, be that when it may. If any Senator should die during the session of the Legislature of the State he represented, but the fact of his death could not be communicated to that Legislature while it continued in session, I take it for granted that the Executive of the State might supply this vacancy by a temporary appointment. I say this, in the spirit of the constitution, whose obvious purpose it is to keep the seats in this House always filled by the Legislatures of the States here represented, where they have an opportunity to fill them, but by temporary appointments from the Executive of these States, in all cases where the Legislatures have had no such opportunity. And the parallel is perfect, I think, between the power of the Executive of a State in one case, and that of the President in the other.

Mr. President, I have now presented to the Senate my views of the constitution, so far as it applies to the matter before us. If I am right in these views, all must agree with me, that the power exercised by the President upon this occasion was without warrant, and therefore unlawful; that it is a manifest violation of the rights of the Senate; and if the act was done with that view, it is a flagrant usurpation of their constitutional powers. I feel very confident that no one here will controvert a single position I have stated. I have advanced nothing new, but have merely repeated the arguments which I urged here in 1826, during the discussion of the memorable Panama subject, when this identical question arose, and was fully examined. Upon that occasion, I was met by Senators of great ability, who, instead of controverting this construction of the constitution, sought to avoid it, by relying upon what they called the precedents. The same course may possibly be pursued again. It is proper, therefore, that I should present some suggestions to the Senate upon this subject also.

Sir, from the first moment I was capable of forming an opinion for myself upon any political question, until this hour, I have always raised my voice against that sort of argument, which, in a Government founded upon a written constitution, seeks to infer authority for the governors from their own practices. The argument (if indeed it deserves such a name) is not fair: for, while it claims the benefit of all affirmative cases, it allows no weight to those which are negative merely. The omission to exert any power for a century, although opportunities fit and proper for its exercise may have hourly occurred during all that time, weighs not as even the dust in the balance against its actual exertion in a single instance. The argument is dangerous, too, in the extreme. The smallest fissure unintentionally made in the constitution, during the darkest hour of some drowsy midnight session, to let in some pigmy case, too insignificant to attract or to merit attention, by the force of this argument, is soon widened and made a horribly yawning crevasse, through which a flood must one day rush in to deluge our fair land. Deeds done in moments of high party excitement, or during the hour of danger to the State, when the safety of the people is the supreme law, by the force of this argument become the parents of similar acts, in other and different times. It was thus the dictatorship was made perpetual in Rome; and the same means cannot fail, in time, to produce some such calamitous event here. It shall never have any force with me. Thus far, and no farther, am I willing to allow any weight to the argument founded upon precedents merely. When any of the provisions of the constitution are of doubtful import, and questions arising under such provisions have been fully and openly examined, so that the people have had a fair opportunity to understand their bearing and influence, the decision of all such questions, if afterwards acquiesced in generally, I shall be disposed to respect; not, however, as conferring power, but as simply declaratory of the true construction of an ambiguous part of the constitution, under which constitution alone power can ever be properly claimed.

In this case there exists no occasion for these cautions and reservations. During the discussion of the Panama subject, we looked into all the precedents. Every case of any original appointment, made by a President during the recess of the Senate, from the first establishment of this Government to that day, was then laid before us, in a document that now remains on our files. Each of these cases was then carefully examined; and it is such an examination which justifies me, I think, in saying that not one of them can properly be considered as a precedent for that which we are now examining. It is true that a superficial examination of some of these cases may seem to justify a different opinion. But, if any one will take the trouble of tracing such cases to their origin, and will inform himself of the state of things existing at the time of their occurrence, I repeat, that not one of them will be found to apply here. I will not fatigue the Senate by a reference to these cases now: their true character and history was given in the debate upon the occasion referred to; and to that debate, now of record in your Register, I refer all those who may feel any wish to consult it. Our journals furnish us, however, with four cases, which have a bearing so direct upon the matter now before us, that I will take the liberty to state them.

The first of these occurred during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, who, during the recess of the Senate, undertook to make an original appointment of a minister to Russia; to which court we had not before sent any minister. The nomination of this minister was afterwards laid before the Senate when they convened, accompanied by a long letter of the President's, setting forth the reasons which had induced him to make such an appointment. The Senate considered the subject very maturely, it seems, and finally refused to give their consent to the appointment. This scheme was then abandoned; nor was it resumed for many years afterwards, until it was revived by Mr. Madison, acting then by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I refer to this case, to show the idea then entertained by the Senate as to their right to be consulted by the President in all cases wherein it was proposed to establish new diplomatic relations with any nation with which none such had previously existed; and to show the acquiescence of the Executive in this determination.

The next case occurred in 1814, when, during the recess of the Senate, and "flagrant bello," President Madison sent three additional ministers, to unite in the negotiations at Ghent, with the two others previously appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. These appointments were laid before the Senate at their next session, when the exercise of this power by the President, during the recess of the Senate, called forth that able and eloquent protest against it, which was submitted by Mr. Gore, then a Senator from Massachusetts, and which I read to the Senate when I first addressed them. It is true, this protest was never acted upon definitively. But we all remember the state of things then existing; and the conduct of the Senate, in avoiding any decision of this matter at that time, manifests most distinctly what was the opinion then entertained. If the majority had even doubted, this protest would have been rejected at once. But, as its adoption would have been highly inexpedient at that crisis in our affairs, and its rejection would have been an abandonment of the constitutional rights of the Senate, they very prudently postponed the consideration of the subject.

Next comes the case of the new republics in South America. Every body knows what was the state of public sentiment upon this subject. Mr. Monroe, the President, was beset on all sides, and most earnestly importuned to comply with the wishes of these States, by sending ministers to them. But, although desirous to do so, he nevertheless steadily refused, until he had previously submitted the subject to Congress, and had obtained the assent of both Houses. Then, and not until then, did he despatch the ministers which were appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Last is the case presented in 1826 by the Panama message. This is of too recent occurrence to require any comment. It will suffice to say, that the resolution then proposed, which was declaratory of the rights of the Senate, and denied the claim of President Adams to the power he therein asserted to be his, was laid upon our table by the vote of a bare majority of this body. But many of the members of that majority, in whose presence I now speak, declared at the time that they did not doubt the rights of the Senate to be such as was affirmed. As, however, the President, while asserting a contrary power, had expressly waived its exercise, and had submitted his nominations to the Senate for their advice, the question was so reduced (as they thought) to a mere abstraction, which, however proper to be discussed, it was not necessary then to decide.

After that time, no case has occurred within the knowledge of the Senate until the present. For, although Messrs. Crane and Offley, in 1828, received from President Adams a commission similar to this, yet that fact was cautiously concealed from the Senate. These ministers never reached Constantinople, and their appointment would not probably ever have been brought to light, unless it had been found expedient now to refer to it as a precedent to justify what was afterwards done by the present Executive. And here, sir, let me appeal to the candor of all those honorable Senators who thought and acted with me during the Panama discussion, to say, if they had known that President Adams had secretly instituted a mission to Turkey during the recess of the Senate, would they not have reprobated such an act, in as strong terms at least as any used in relation to his mere claim of such a power in the Panama case, where the exercise of the power asserted was expressly waived by him. For my part, I know I should have done so; and knowing this, I cannot reconcile it to myself to sit silent, when the same act has been done by another President. Whatever changes may have taken place in the Executive, the constitution remains the same; the rights and duties of the Senate remain the same; and I will always strive to preserve the one, and to fulfil the other.

The cases to which I have thus referred, spreading as they do over a period of twenty-five years now last past, ought to satisfy every one, I think, that the provisions of the constitution and the practice of the Government are in strict accordance. At all events, they must suffice to show, that even if other precedents could be found, much more apposite than any which exist, they cannot prove any uniform practice, any continuous chain of precedents, settling this question of power, which, therefore, we must consider as res integra, and decide by a reference to the constitution alone.

Mr. President, the arguments that have been urged in opposition to the opinion I so briefly expressed when I first made this motion, coming, too, from the quarter whence some of them proceed, have excited my surprise almost as much as the power, the exercise of which in this case they seek to justify. I must beg leave, therefore, to invite some attention to the most prominent of these arguments, which seem to me most awful "signs of the times."

An honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON,] instead of controverting directly any proposition which I have advanced, tells us that the construction of the constitution for which I have contended is not so certain, but that wise and good men may well doubt as to its correctness; nay, even adopt a contrary opinion. He does not say that such is his opinion, but satisfies himself with endeavoring to cast the shadow of his doubts upon mine; and then rebukes me for using the strong language I did in expressing it. Sir, if I could feel any of the doubts which this Senator has sought to generate, like him I might regret the use of strong phrases to express an opinion, of the correctness of which I did not feel assured; but, entertaining no such doubts, I have nothing to regret, nothing to explain, and nothing to take back.

And how, sir, is this supposed doubt produced? The Senator from Louisiana says that the constitution is susceptible of two different readings. One, that which I gave as I found it written, and the other this: "the President, during the recess of the Senate, shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen." According to this latter reading, he thinks it probable that the President would have the right to do that which he has done. Now, sir, from whence does this honorable Senator derive authority thus to dislocate the members of the sentence, and to re-arrange them according to his fancy? If he is not bound to read the instrument as it is written, he has the same power to amend it, by the substitution of new words, as by inverting the order in which the old words are found, so to give them a new sense. The gentleman cannot claim the merit even of originality for this invention. It is certainly as old as the days of Swift, in whose amusing "Tale of a Tub" we read that the same device was practised upon the testament there mentioned. The three brothers not being able to find the permission they desired, written therein totidem verbis, sought for it totidem syllabis; not finding it even then, they tried to make it out totidem literis; and it was only when they failed in this, too, that they found themselves under the necessity of changing the orthography. Had they lived in the present day, they might have saved themselves much trouble, by merely altering the name of what they wished, and bestowing upon it some new denomination.

Do not the Senate perceive what would be the effect of this new reading of the constitution, if, as the Senator from Louisiana would persuade us, it was permissible to adopt it? Read as it is written, and these words, "during the recess of the Senate," denote the time within which the vacancy must happen, which vacancy the President alone is authorized to fill up: but, according to this new reading, these words denote the time within which the President may exert the power of filling the vacancy, happen when it may. Then, the President would need but to wait until the Senate adjourns, and he would have authority to fill up all vacancies. Nay, should he graciously please to refer his appointments to the Senate afterwards, and they should reject them, instead of watching a fit occasion to renominate, the President might wait for the adjournment, and then reappoint the same individual; and so on, toties quoties, to the end of the chapter. A more summary method to divest the Senate of all authority, and to invest the President alone with complete power over all appointments, could not well be devised. Instinct informs the very brutes of their common danger, and of the quarter from whence it may be expected; and surely arguments such as this should put us upon our guard.

An honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] tells us that he has never doubted upon this point—that he has ever been of opinion, the President might institute what missions he pleases, without consulting the Senate or any body else—that he so said, and so voted, in the Panama case, and therefore shall so vote in this, which is precisely similar to that. This is all very true; and I bear my willing testimony to the perfect consistency of that honorable Senator in these cases. I wish I could prevail upon him, however, to convince my friend from Illinois, [Mr. KANE,] that these cases are precisely similar. It would relieve me very much if he would do so; for I feel sensibly the awkwardness of my present position, opposed on the one hand by those who opposed me in the Panama case, because this is the same question there presented; and opposed on the other by those with whom I then agreed, because this is not a similar case. It is not for me to reconcile such contrariant opinions. All I can do, is to oppose to the Senator from Maryland the argument urged in the Panama case, which I agree with him is precisely similar to this; and to endeavor to satisfy my friend from Illinois, that his distinctions constitute no difference between the principles involved in each.

In what, sir, is any difference to be found between the two cases? It is true, that was the mere assertion of a right to power, the exercise of which was waived at the very moment it was claimed; and this is the exertion of the same power then asserted merely. But surely this barren claim, waived when preferred, presents not so strong a case, as the actual exercise of the very power then waived. The two cases, although not similar in their facts, present the same question; and every argument applicable to the one, applies a fortiori to the other. The honorable Senator from Illinois, I am sure, will not say, that because the one set of ministers was to be sent to Panama, and the other to Constantinople, that this difference of their destination can constitute any distinction between the principles of the two cases. Nor will he say, that because one set of ministers were sent to a Congress of the ministers of several nations, and the other to a single nation only, that this mere matter of number can vary the question as to the constitutional right of the President to appoint either. In what, then, does the difference consist?

The honorable Senator from Illinois says, that, in the Panama case, the persons proposed to be despatched were to be public ministers; but the persons actually sent in this case were commissioners only. Does he mean to say that this mere change of appellation alters the thing named? The poet would tell him that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet;" and I am sure he would not agree that his hat was not one, because many of his townsmen call it a chapeau. But see, sir, what a broad gate is here also hoisted, to let in the flood of Executive power and patronage. An act is forbidden when called by its true name; yet change but the name, and the same act at once becomes justifiable and proper. There might be some hope of an end to this, if those who seek to get power in this way, were constrained to tax their own invention for new names to denote old things, for as there must be some limit to human wit, "when the brains were out, the thing might die!" Unfortunately, however, the work is already done for them; and a Secretary of State has but to turn to the mere index of his code diplomatique, and he will there find a long list of the names of public functionaries, who have been employed by different potentates, at various times, which list may serve as a perennial fountain of power.

Let me give an example of the ease with which this work may be done. The constitution authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers. It is desired, however, to appoint such without consulting the Senate, lest they may not be willing to establish any such offices. Turn to the code, and you may there find that the ambassador of the Pope is not distinguished eo nomine, but is termed a legate. For, as an ambassador represents the person of his master, and as the sanctity and infallibility of his Holiness cannot be represented, he therefore cannot have what is commonly called an ambassador. To show, however, that this legate is in very truth the personal representative of his sovereign, he is sometimes styled a legate a latere, that is to say, he is supposed to be taken, like our imprudent mother Eve, from the side of his lord and master, and therefore may very properly be identified with him. So, too, if the Pope wishes to send a minister plenipotentiary or other negotiator, to any of the Catholic princes, his beloved children, as it would be quite unseemly for the holy father (whose wishes must be commands to them) to send to them any officer whose very title imports negotiation, his minister upon such occasions is styled a nuncio, a mere messenger, deputed to bear the will of the father to these his dutiful children, which will, to be observed, needs but to be known. Now, as this republic is a mere artificial body; and as around and within it there are many who constantly distinguish the President as their "great father," it would not require much ingenuity to find out some similitude between his office and that of the Pope. Then, as the constitution says not one word about legates or nuncios, all that is necessary to attain the desired end, would be to fill the blank in the commission with such words; when, according to this argument of the Senator from Illinois, the President alone would so acquire power to do the very act which he is forbidden to do, if this blank was filled by the proper name.

[Here Mr. KANE interrupted Mr. TAZEWELL, observing he had not meant to say that the mere change of a name of any public minister would authorize the President to appoint one: but that he had said these commissioners were not public ministers at all. They were secret ministers or private agents, like those formerly sent to South America, or the persons frequently sent with despatches. The appointment of none of these had ever been submitted to the Senate, but was always made by the President alone, because such appointments were not specially provided for in the constitution.]

I thank the gentleman for this correction. I really had no idea that it was his purpose to draw a distinction between public and secret ministers. My impression was, that his distinction was run between public ministers and these commissioners, who were not supposed to be public ministers, because they were not so called; and I was about to show that the officers were the same, although their denomination was different. However, the Senator from Illinois has relieved me from this trouble. Let me then inquire, whether his actual argument is more conclusive than that which I had supposed him to have used.

And, first, sir, let me ask my friend from Illinois, if these commissioners were not public but secret ministers, according to his sense of these latter words, whence the President and Senate together, much less the President alone, can derive the right to appoint them? The constitution gives to the President the power to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, public ministers: but it would be as difficult, I believe, to find any authority in it to appoint secret ministers who should not be public ministers, as it would be to conceive the idea of a private agent, appointed to perform the public duty of negotiating a treaty, which, when ratified, is declared to be the supreme law of our land. I pray we may not confound the character of the minister with that of the duty conferred upon him, or with the mode in which he may be directed to perform his duty. Doubtless, under that provision of the constitution which authorizes the appointment of public ministers, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint such ministers secretly. They may be instructed to depart secretly. They may be accredited secretly. They may negotiate (as they generally do) secretly. Nay, they may conclude a secret treaty, which need not be made known until a fit occasion arises to give it the effect of a law by promulgation. In this sense, such ministers may properly be termed secret ministers; but they are nevertheless public ministers. Because they are the ministers of the public, commissioned by its Government, authorized to perform its business, and accountable to the public for all their acts and omissions under their commission. In one word, sir, they are public ministers secretly appointed, and with secret instructions, but they differ in nothing else from all other public ministers, inasmuch as their commissions are precisely the same in both cases. Any other idea than this would present a subject here of quite as much mirth as the comic scene of Sheridan, in which he describes a secret conference of two British ministers, in the presence and hearing of the sentinels at Tilbury fort, when one tells to the other as a profound secret what he declares the other knew before. A secret agent created by letters patent under the great seal, given to him to be shown, and addressed to all whom it may concern. This, sir, would far surpass the sarcastic irony of the author of "The Critic."

Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to doubt the power of the President to appoint secret agents when and how he pleases; nor do I mean to advance any claim on the part of the Senate to participate in the exercise of any such power. As a simple individual, I would humbly suggest to him, if I might be permitted so to do, that whenever he stands in need of secret agents who are really designed to be such, he had better abstain from putting his own name to the warrant given to them, and never permit it to be authenticated by the great seal. Such a proceeding may sometimes prove hazardous, and I think would not be very creditable to the nation whose seal it is. But as a Senator, I do claim for the Senate, in the language of the constitution, the right of advising and consenting to the appointment of any and every officer of the United States, no matter what may be his name, what his duties, or how he may be instructed to perform them. And it is only because secret agents are not officers of the United States, but the mere agents of the President, or of his Secretaries, or of his military or naval commanders, that I disclaim all participation in their appointment.

It is this distinction between officers of the Government, and the mere agents of its officers, which constitutes the striking difference between the cases referred to by the Senator from Illinois, and that now before us. In this case, these commissioners were officers of the United States—commissioned as such—authorized by that commission to pledge our faith and honor—entitled, as the bearers of our great seal, to be regarded every where as the representatives of the sovereignty whose emblem it is; and to claim all the immunities accorded by the public law to such representatives of any Power on earth. Whereas, your secret agents in South America, your bearers of despatches or newspapers, et id omne genus, never had any commission—had no authority to pledge your faith—were never trusted with your great seal—and had not a single privilege any where, which any other individual citizen might not equally well claim. In short, they were not officers of the United States, but the messengers (either special or general) of their officers. Sir, it mortifies me to hear the high functionaries of the nation degraded by a comparison with such gentry as these; and their secret commissions assimilated to the warrants of messengers, or the secret letters to spies. I know but one of these commissioners personally; but of him I will say, that the same lofty spirit which refused to bring his ship to Constantinople, unless with her ports trired up, her guns shown, and her flag and pennants all abroad, would have made him cast your parchment from him with scorn, if it had even been hinted that it was intended to constitute him any other than a public minister of his country, whose honor and whose interest he had so proudly sustained.

But, Mr. President, the question is not whether these commissioners were what the Senator from Illinois calls public ministers; but whether they were officers of the United States; for the President may not make an original appointment of any such officers, without the advice and consent of the Senate. To determine this question, you must look to their commission. This you find in the same form with every other; and if you will but consider its effects and consequences, none can doubt that it constituted them officers of the United States. Suppose that the Grand Seigneur, after accrediting these commissioners, had sent them to the Seven Towers, must not every body admit that the honor of this nation would have obliged it to resent the insult offered to itself by such an indignity to its representatives, protected, as they would have been, by the public law? Or suppose that any of these commissioners had been bribed, or had been guilty of any other high crime against their faith and the duty confided to them. Does any one doubt that they might have been impeached? And yet, forsooth, they are not officers of the United States, but mere secret agents, like the bearers of despatches or newspapers, who, as we all know, receive as little consideration at home as they are entitled to expect abroad.

The honorable Senator from Maryland, notwithstanding he affirms this to be exactly like the Panama case, and therefore clear, yet endeavors to distinguish it a little, in order to make it clearer than that, if possible. He tells us that one of these commissioners, Mr. Rhind, was regularly appointed consul at Odessa, by the President, acting with the advice and consent of the Senate, given at our last session. That he being thus an officer of the United States, the President might charge him with whatever instructions might seem necessary, even to negotiate a treaty with Turkey. It is so common in this country (where the thirst for office is insatiable) to continue the titles of Governors of States, and militia officers, to those who have once filled such places, not only wherever they may be, but so long as they live, that I am not surprised the Senator from Maryland should feel disposed to enlarge this custom a little; especially when a barren name may be made the fruitful parent of so much executive power as he thus claims for it. Henceforward, we must not only say, I suppose, that once a consul and always a consul, but, also, that once a consul any where, and always a consul every where. Nay, if it be true that this consul to the Russian port of Odessa may, virtute officii, be metamorphosed by the mere instructions of the President, or rather of the Secretary of State, into a negotiator at Constantinople of a treaty with the Ottoman empire, it will be very difficult to find a limit to consular functions. Thus, that thing called a consul, the lowest in the diplomatic scale, without pay, power, or privilege, may be converted into the most important functionary the United States can have abroad. Sir, it would have been a subject worthy of Hogarth's pencil, I imagine, to have represented the interview between Mr. Rhind and the Reis Effendi, the proud representative of his haughty sovereign, if, when they first met to exchange their powers, the "christian dog" had presented to him a consular diploma to Odessa, as the equivalent of his full powers. It would gratify me much to hear from any body what would have been the state of the negotiation, if, pendente lite, the Russian autocrat had revoked Mr. Rhind's exequatur, and so terminated his functions as consul at Odessa. But suppose we might thus justify Mr. Rhind's appointment, what is to be said for Biddle? He was no consul to Odessa, nor any where else; nor did he bear any diplomatic authority, save what this commission conferred upon him. It is true that he bore, and gallantly bore, the commission of a post captain in the navy of the United States; but surely it will not be contended that a naval or military officer may, virtute officii, be transformed into a diplomatic functionary of the highest grade, by the mere instructions of a Secretary of State, or a simple order of the President alone. The officers, I am sure, ought to object to this; for if so little ceremony is necessary in the one case, as little would be requisite in its converse; and when naval officers may, by a word from the President, or his Secretaries, be converted into public ministers to negotiate treaties, the latter, by a process equally summary, may be made the commanders of our fleets and armies.

But the President himself has answered this argument. He did not suppose that orders and instructions alone would authorize consuls, post captains, or any body else, to make treaties. He knew well that a plenipotentiary commission was requisite, and therefore granted these "letters patent" for that very purpose. Nor will he, I should think, feel much obliged to the honorable Senator from Maryland, for the imputation necessarily implied in this argument, the sum and substance of which is, that meaning to negotiate a treaty with Turkey, and to conceal this his object from the Senate, the President nominated to them, as a mere consul to Odessa, him whom he had appointed a minister plenipotentiary for that purpose.

Mr. President, there is one more argument which I see I have to answer, and then I will have done with this part of the subject. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] tells me that I come too late; that the Senate have already advised the ratification of the treaty; and, by so doing, have approved the appointment of the ministers who negotiated it. Therefore, I am now estopped to urge any objection to these appointments. For my particular emancipation from this supposed estoppel, I appeal to the knowledge of all my brethren of the Senate, who have heard my protestations, and witnessed my continual claim to the right which is now sought to be barred by this strange limitation. Nor can I permit this argument, as applied to the Senate, to pass unnoticed. As doctrine it is not correct, however certain it may be as fact.

I come too late. I stand here to vindicate the sanctity of the constitution which has been violated—to assert the high privileges of this body which have been infringed; and here, even here, in this its very hall, I am told by one of its honorable members, that I come too late! I know it, sir; I do come too late. "Tis true; and pity 'tis 'tis true." But it is only true as fact, and not as doctrine. I cannot undo what has been done, or prevent the wound that has been already inflicted—for this, I do come too late. But I do not come too late to warn those who sent me here, that their constitution has been violated. I do not come too late to satisfy those with whom I am here associated, that their chartered rights have been impaired. I do not come too late to heal those wounds which ought not to have been inflicted, or to strive to prevent the repetition of such injuries in future.

Nor does the estoppel which has been relied upon, constitute even a just technical objection to the assertion of the high privileges which I have proposed to maintain. There is no connexion between the ratification of a treaty, and the appointment of the persons commissioned to negotiate it, except what concerns the foreign State. To the Grand Seignior we need not, we must not say, that we ratify the treaty concluded with him, but deny the authority of the persons appointed by ourselves to negotiate it. It would be idle, nay, it would be base to do so; for he would hold up to us the "full power" granted to these negotiators by our own Chief Magistrate, under the sacred seal of our own nation. This, indeed, we are estopped to deny to him; nor would it comport with the character of our people, to suffer any other earthly sovereign to pass upon the question raised, as to its misuse. But here, at home, it seems somewhat paradoxical to say that we may not deny to ourselves that which it is affirmed by ourselves that ourselves have done. This would be a most extraordinary estoppel indeed.

Short as is our history, it nevertheless furnishes several examples of ministers who have exceeded their instructions, and of officers who have violated their orders. Reasons of policy have induced the Government to adopt some of these acts; and to justify others to foreign States. But, until now, it has never been supposed by any, that these reasons of State policy were of sufficient force to preclude all inquiry into the breaches of our own laws, much less into the violations of our constitution itself. A treaty is ratified, no matter how or by whom concluded, whenever it is believed to be promotive of the public good. But if this ratification necessarily implies a justification of a violation of the constitution, in the appointment of the negotiators; and if by such ratification we are estopped to deny this, then, indeed, has the time come, when our opinion of the general welfare is the substitute for the requirements of the charter.

But how does this question come before us? An amendment to an appropriation bill is here proposed, the object of which amendment is to authorize the expenditure of more of the public revenue than was contemplated by the other House, where the bill originated. If this amendment obtains, the bill so amended must be sent back for the approval of the House of Representatives. When there, who will be hardly enough to affirm that these constitutional guardians of the money of the people are estopped from inquiring into the fitness of granting what may be asked, and of the mode in which the grant should be made? Such an affirmation would be carrying the claim of Executive power to an extent never before heard of. Yet it must be conceded on all hands, that the power of the Senate over this appropriation bill is precisely the same, neither greater nor less, than that of the other House. What then becomes of this doctrine of estoppels, urged upon the Senate to prevent the assertion of their constitutional rights?

Mr. President, I have now done with this part of the subject; and I will detain you but a few moments in examining the second question. In discussing this, I am obliged to concede, gratia argumendi, that the President, during the recess of the Senate, might lawfully have instituted this mission, by making these original appointments. Yet, granting this, I nevertheless contend that it was his bounden duty to have submitted to the Senate, at their next session, the temporary appointment of these ministers. I have not heard a single suggestion even whispered, in excuse, much less in justification of this omission, except the fact supposed by the honorable Senator from Illinois, which he must pardon me for saying, whether it may be as supposed or not, does not, in any way, alter the case. Nay, this solitary argument itself implies, that if the fact be not as is supposed, this omission has no defence.

My friend from Illinois says, and says very truly, that if the commission granted by the President to these ministers, on the 12th day of September, 1829, was properly granted, it would have continued in full force until the end of the next session of the Senate, that is to say, until the 31st of May, 1830; and this without the advice and consent of the Senate. He then argues that the treaty was concluded on the 7th of May, 1830, whereupon these ministers became functi officio, ceased to be the officers of the Government, and therefore it would have been quite idle and unnecessary for the President to have nominated them to the Senate.

Now, if all this should be granted, it constitutes no justification to the Executive, because it is obviously an afterthought that could not have occurred to them until long after the session of the Senate. If Washington and Constantinople, instead of being separated as they are by two seas, were connected by a railroad, along which the conveyance might be as rapid as between Liverpool and Manchester, the intelligence of any event occurring in the Turkish capital, on the 7th of May, could not be communicated much beyond the Western islands by the 31st of that month. Then the demand is of an impossibility, which would have us suppose that the Executive knew of the conclusion of this treaty, and therefore did not make the nominations of these ministers to the Senate during their last session. And the question is to be tried, not by the fact, but by their knowledge of it. I pray the Senate to notice the various and contradictory modes resorted to for enlarging the power of the Executive. If Mr. Rhind had died on the 7th of May, and it had been judged expedient to fill up the vacancy happening by his death, all agree that the President might properly have done so during the last recess. Because, although this event happened, it could not have been known here during the last session of the Senate. But if Mr. Rhind makes a treaty on the same day, this after-discovered fact, although equally unknown to the President when the Senate adjourned, is urged to justify him for not laying Mr. Rhind's appointment before the Senate at their last session, although this appointment was made here (and therefore well known) eight months before that session terminated.

Is it a fact, however, that this treaty was concluded on the 7th of May? It is true the instrument bears that date; but we all know that it could not have been then concluded. Because it is absolutely certain that two of the commissioners had not then reached Constantinople; and that, without their approbation, even the Turkish Government would not consent to consider the project as a treaty concluded. When then was it concluded? Certainly not so late as the 29th of May. Because we have on our files a letter of that date, written by one of these commissioners to another, urging many arguments to induce him to sign it. On the next day, (the 30th,) another commissioner writes to the Secretary of State, saying that he had that day signed the treaty; but there is no evidence before the Senate, showing when it was signed by his associates.

Suppose, however, that it was signed by all the commissioners on or before the 30th of May. The instruments were still to be exchanged, before the business of the negotiation could be concluded; and we have the strongest presumptive evidence that this was not done on that day, in the fact apparent upon our own journals, that the 30th of May last was Sunday. Now does any man believe that these ministers of a christian people would have thus publicly profaned the christian sabbath, at a Mahometan court, and under the view of all the ministers of the Powers of christendom there convened? I do not put this even upon the ground of their christian faith, but upon the ground of national pride and national honor, always involved in the conduct of the nation's ministers. My life upon it, there is one of these commissioners, who would have willingly suffered even impaling, before he would have so degraded himself and his country in the eyes of all christendom. But if this work was not completed on the 30th May, it could not have been done until the 31st; and on the morning of this day, our journals show that the Senate adjourned. Now, whether the exchange of the treaties, (if made on that day,) or the adjournment of the Senate, took place first, is a question which I will leave to be decided by those who can better calculate the difference of longitude, and who may know more of the etiquette of the Turkish court than I do. This is done the more readily, because I am satisfied that the work was not completed until the 1st of June. For I find a letter of that date addressed to the Secretary of State, enclosing a copy of the treaty, and giving the first intelligence of its conclusion; and I take it for granted that these commissioners would have lost no time in communicating to their Government the consummation of this tedious affair.

Let it be, however, that the treaty was concluded at any time gentlemen please. Did the ministers cease to be such the moment their work was done? Will the "salaries" proposed to be allowed to them cease at that time? Were they not entitled to the common privilege of a member of Congress, or even of a witness eundo manendo et redeundo? I pray, sir, that we may not continue to perplex ourselves, by confounding the officer with his duties.

These commissioners were ministers before they began to negotiate—they were ministers throughout the negotiation; and ministers they continued to be, at least while they remained at the Turkish court, whether engaged in performing the special service for which they were deputed, or otherwise. The immunities conferred upon them by the public law attach not to the duty to be performed, but the office created by the commission for its performance. The Sultan would have offended just as much against the law, by suffering indignity to be offered to any of these ministers after the treaty was concluded, as before; as much if the negotiation had never commenced, or been broken off, as if it had continued. But we know that these commissioners remained at Constantinople certainly until the 8th of June, for we have upon our files official letters of that date, written by them at that place. Then what becomes of this vindication, rested as it is upon unknown events, occurring at some doubtful period of time?

Mr. President, my strength is almost gone, and your patience must be at least as much exhausted, yet a few words more—I hope they may be the last with which I shall have occasion to trouble you. For many years have I watched the workings of this Government, and have seen it steadily advancing to that condition to which our most sagacious statesmen long ago predicted it must one day come. Occasional obstructions to its onward motion have sometimes cheered me with the hope that these predictions would not be verified. Nor will I ever part with this hope, while this body remains true to itself, and faithful to the States whose sovereignties are here represented. But what I have seen and heard of late, is not well calculated to cherish hope. The time is not far distant, nay, it is at hand, when the theoretic maxim of the British law will become a practical rule for the American people. The English jurists tell us that "the King can do no wrong," and soon may we expect to hear this fiction of the British Government transferred to ours, as a solemn truth affirmed of our President. I wish we may be able to introduce with this principle the corrective it finds in the Government from whence it is borrowed. There, although the King can do no wrong, his ministers are responsible for all the bad advice they give him.

In the instance before us, I am willing to believe that the President has not knowingly violated the constitution, or designed to impair the rights of the Senate, or desired to usurp for himself the entire and absolute control over all appointments, although such certainly is the effect of his acts. In the mode in which business of this kind is done, as we all know, many circumstances may have existed, to absolve the President from all design to exert any such power as has been here put in practice, in order to produce such effects. But what must we say of his ministers, the bounden duty of some of whom it is, to present to him the facts as they know them to be. Of his cabinet, four were members of this body during the memorable Panama discussion. One of them (the Secretary of the Navy) was the mover of the resolution declaratory of our rights, and denying to the President the power then claimed, and here exercised. Another of them (the Secretary of State) stood by my side in that debate, the able advocate of those rights, eloquently denouncing the claim of power then preferred, as but a part of a long settled system covertly to increase the influence and patronage of the Executive. And all four united with me in the vote given upon that occasion. Surrounded by such advisers, if no voice was raised to admonish him, if no friendly caution was given to him by any of those whose opinion upon this subject was so well known, and one of whom had in his own office a full representation of all the facts existing in the case, it ought not to be matter of much astonishment, if the President should have regarded it as one of common occurrence; and the omission to lay the appointments before the Senate at their next session may possibly have been accidental. I know not how this matter stands; but this I know, that if such a representation had ever been made to the Senate, I should never have been heard to censure mere oversights, or acts of any kind unconsciously done. When honorable Senators, however, instead of excusing, seek to justify what has been done, and this too by such arguments as we have heard, which, if sound, must suffice to perpetuate this power, the case assumes a very different aspect indeed. Under this different aspect I have been obliged to consider it.

For thus regarding it, I know well what I am to encounter. I have seen the writing on the wall. I know the finger by which it is inscribed. It needs no Daniel to interpret it. But, sir, it is my consolation to know, that the balance in which I shall be weighed, will never be held by any executive officer of this Government, be he whom he may. They who sent me here, placed me as a warder on the watch-tower, to warn of the approach of danger. I will not play the shepherd's boy, and cry out when there is none. But when the danger stands confessed before me, come it in what "questionable shape" it may, I will do my duty. That duty is now done, sir; to what end, the judgment of the Senate will decide.

Mr. KANE replied briefly to some of the remarks of Mr. TAZEWELL.

Mr. WOODBURY next rose, and observed, that in some respects his position resembled the gentleman's from New Jersey; but in certain particulars they differed. He [Mr. W.] had not spoken at all, nor voted on the resolution of 1826, so as to commit himself on the power of the President to make known public and regular diplomatic appointments without the advice and consent of the Senate. But on that subject he then formed decisive opinions, which still remained unchanged; and if that resolution had not been laid upon the table, contrary to his vote, he would have placed those opinions on our legislative records. He should not now, for a moment, hesitate to avow that those opinions, so far as regarded the construction of the constitution on that point, went the whole length of what had been detailed by the Senator from Virginia. On that point, however much they might differ on other points, he agreed with him throughout, entirely.

Mr. W. said he never supposed that the enumeration of ministers, judges, &c. in the constitution gave power to appoint any particular minister or judge, till a law or a specific appropriation created a particular office; and that then the President's power, as well as our own in such cases, commenced, we acting with him as to future vacancies during the session of Congress, and he acting alone, if he chooses, as to vacancies during our recess, so as to appoint until the close of the ensuing session. This was the fair and safe construction. He should not now dwell on the exceptions to this general principle, nor upon its various limitations. The hour was too late, and the question too irrelevant to the real inquiry now before the Senate. That inquiry was, in his opinion, a very narrow one. If the House would spare him a minute on the true question in issue, he would endeavor to satisfy them that the difficulty was wholly one of form rather than substance, and that the amendment of his friend from Illinois would, he hoped, remove even the objection of form.

What was the fear of the gentleman from Virginia? That by voting for the present appropriation he might seem to sanction what in 1826 he and all of us, who then thought with him, gloried in having disapproved. We all still disapprove of it. But he [Mr. TAZEWELL] distinctly admitted that a compensation ought to be made to the agents to an extent equivalent to their services, though their appointments may have been irregular from mistake, precedent, or otherwise. True, he wished it to originate in the other House, and to be included in a separate bill. Now, it was well known, the treaty was not ratified, and the business concluded, till after the appropriation bill was reported in the other House; and in such case it was usual to insert claims here. It was also proper and manly on the part of the Secretary of State, though censured for it, to recommend the compensation to the old agents under the last administration as well as to the new agents. What then is the whole difference, conceding, a moment, for argument, that these appointments were irregular? Is it whether you shall pay them in a separate bill, or in the general appropriation bill? And this also at a late period in our session, when a separate bill could not probably be originated and passed in the usual course of business. It resolves itself then entirely into a question of form. Every advantage to be obtained by a separate bill can be secured here. We can here, as in such a bill, limit the sum to the supposed benefit derived to the public from the services of each agent, or leave it to be apportioned by the President. If, in our opinion, the services of any have been already amply paid, or were useless to the country, we can here exclude them. But all must admit, that, so far as the country has profited by their exertions, so far they ought in some way to be paid, whether their appointments were regular or irregular. In making the compensation, whether in this or a separate bill, we could equally avoid the other difficulty of using language calculated to express an opinion on the irregularity of their appointments. He was anxious as any body to avoid inconsistency, and to relieve any gentleman from any set of words such as charges, outfits, &c., which might seem to imply an expressed opinion that these agents were regular charges, commissioners, or any other class, by whatever name, of public or accredited diplomatic officers. On this point he deemed it embarrassing and unnecessary to go into any subtle investigations. The present administration had only followed the steps of the past one in sending agents to Constantinople. If a part of the Senate deemed them legal and constitutional appointments of public regular agents, as made to fill vacancies, they could vote for the appropriation on that ground. If a portion deemed them not such appointments, but private informal agents, equally legal and equally constitutional, they would vote for the appropriation on that ground. If others deemed them to belong to neither of these classes, they might vote for it on the broad ground before mentioned, and which the Senator from Virginia concedes, that is, having reaped advantages from their services, they are willing to bestow on them a quid pro quo, or a quantum meruit. As the amendment offered by his friend on the right, left no implication of a specific opinion on these questions, it was the most preferable, and should receive his support. It avoided a useless controversy; it relinquished no power on the part of the Senate, and opened no door to danger or encroachment.

For himself, he always believed that the President could appoint secret, informal, diplomatic agents, without our advice, and pay them out of the contingent fund. By this amendment, we only increased that fund to meet this new and unusual burden of the Turkish negotiation by such agents; and one which all, probably, admitted to be a just burden on the treasury in some shape or other. Over that fund, to its whole extent, the President alone exercises a sound discretion, both as to the individuals employed, and the amount of their salaries, whether $500 or $5,000 a year. Both Houses of Congress have deemed it wise and constitutional to place in his hands, and his hands alone, a power to appoint and expend to that extent; and if he exceeds it, no remuneration can be had without our subsequent approbation. The agents thus employed have no fixed public diplomatic powers. They are not impeachable as officers. They cannot commit either House of Congress without our subsequent assent. They can make no treaties without our subsequent consent. It is the President and Senate who make treaties, who give them validity, and not the draughtsmen or signers, whether they be regular or irregular agents. No danger could accrue from this view of Executive powers. The doings of agents, appointed without our advice, in making treaties, whether in the session or during the recess of Congress, may or may not be approved by us in the ratification, and may or may not be approved by the two Houses of Congress in subsequent appropriations to carry the treaties into effect. In the case of the Florida treaty, made by Mr. Adams, without his nomination being submitted to the Senate, we not only approved the treaty, but Congress afterwards appropriated five millions to carry it into effect. The late Austrian treaty was made in the same way by the present Secretary of State; and, if either of the agents on the part of the United States had a commission under the broad seal or the narrow seal, they had it without consulting the Senate. It was not intended, any more than in this case, to give them the character of public diplomatic officers, but of mere temporary agents with special powers. Their additional pay likewise, if they had any, was either from the secret or from the contingent funds.

He differed, however, from his friends who had spoken on the same side, as to the imperative effect of the ratification of the treaty by us, as imposing an obligation to pay the agents at all events. We ratified the treaty, because we deemed it beneficial: certainly that was his opinion. But the agents, or some of them, might appear to us to have been so little useful in the negotiation, as to justify no compensation on the ground of a quantum meruit. When the President employed and paid them out of the contingent fund, he alone exercised a discretion on this, and went into those considerations, unless he had before made with them specific contracts as to the amount of their compensation. But, when we were called on to appropriate anew, and in a specific or general form, for this object, we had the power to affix any reasonable limits to that appropriation. Here we proposed to add to the general contingent fund only fifteen thousand dollars, leaving the President, within that sum, to exercise his own discretion, and make such discriminations as justice required.

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose to address the Senate, but, after a few words, he gave way for a motion to adjourn; and The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

THE TURKISH COMMISSION.

The Senate having again resumed the consideration of the amendment proposed to the general appropriation bill by Mr. TAZEWELL,

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

A just diffidence of my power to impress upon others the force of considerations which guide me in forming my own opinion, has generally induced me to be silent, when in any debate others had expressed the reasons which were to govern my vote. My rising to address you now, Mr. President, is no departure from this rule. Dissenting in every particular from the doctrines on which a most grave accusation has been made; feeling it a duty to refute that accusation, on grounds and for reasons which have not been expressed by others, I must reluctantly ask the attention of the Senate while I endeavor to perform this duty.

Sir, the Senator from Virginia has, in the most unqualified terms, characterized this whole transaction, from its very outset to its conclusion, as a lawless, unconstitutional usurpation of power on the part of the President; and the acquiescence in it which he says will be involved in our adoption of the amendment, a participation in the acts thus denounced, aggravated by a base surrender of rights, which are vested in us by the constitution. I repeat, sir, literally, the charge. He has added, that it is gross, palpable, to be justified by no construction of the letter of the constitution, nor excused by its spirit; that, with respect to the President, the act is done, the sacrifice is consummated; but that, on our parts, we may yet avoid the sacrilegious guilt of violating the constitution, by voting with him for striking out the appropriation. We have yet this resource. But, in a tone at once admonitory and menacing, we are told that there is no other escape; we stand on the brink; another step, and we are lost, engulfed, with the President and his advisers, in the same abyss of political profligacy and ruin.

Sir, I wish for no escape. If I desired one, I could find it behind the reasoning of the Senator himself. He moves to strike out the appropriation, because it provides for an outfit, and because it calls those who made the treaty commissioners. Yet he is willing to pay the whole sum—ay! and a much greater, as much as any member may deem a sufficient remuneration; he will be not only just, but generous. Why will he do this? Why, as a guardian of the public treasure as well as of the constitution—why will he open it to these persons? Undoubtedly, because he thinks they have rendered a service; but in what manner? in what capacity? Clearly, in no other than that of making a treaty, and as commissioners. Then, I ask, sir, is he not willing to sacrifice the substance for the form? Would not a provision for this payment, in any manner that you could give it, sanction the service by which it was earned? But the “rose” which, in another part of the gentleman’s argument, he said would “smell as sweet by any other name,” here loses its fragrance. Change its denomination, call it compensation for services, and its perfume is delicious; alter the name to outfit and salary, its odor is insupportable, and taints the very air; every constitutional nerve of the Senator is shocked by it. Now, sir, if I wished to escape the question, if I thought the denunciation well supported, I might, as I said, adopt this reasoning, and, by voting for the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE,] which avoids the objectionable terms, leave it in doubt whether I did not assent to the doctrine of the Senator from Virginia. But, sir, I am not disposed to avail myself of such a subterfuge. Whenever I have formed an opinion, and am properly called on by duty to express it, I will do it fearlessly, independently, as becomes a member of this august body, frankly to my fellow-Senators, explicitly to the nation; but, at the same time, with a proper deference and respect for the opinions of those with whom I have the misfortune to differ. In this spirit, sir, I will proceed to discuss the serious questions that have been raised by the Senator from Virginia, and to repel, as best I may, the charge of violating the constitution, and surrendering the rights of the body to which I have the honor to belong.

I do not, myself, deal in professions of attachment to the constitution—when made by others, I believe them, unless their conduct, or character, has given me reason to doubt their sincerity. In the case of the Senator from Virginia, no one who knows him can have such a doubt; but whilst the fullest confidence is felt that he is persuaded of the truth of all he utters, and while he is convinced that the construction he puts on the constitution is the true one; while he believes that those who think differently are in the wrong, might not a slight suspicion that he himself is deceived; that his judgment, strong as it naturally is, and invigorated as it has been by study and reflection, that even such a judgment might sometimes err? and would not this reflection, had it occurred, have led him to think that this might be one of those rare occasions, and have induced him to qualify by some expression of a possibility that his reasoning might be ill-founded, the sweeping charges of usurpation, and lawless and unconstitutional acts by the President, of dereliction of duty in those who support them? and would not that reflection also have inclined him to avoid asserting that these violations were gross, open, palpable, such as the plainest understanding must perceive—thus leaving to those who cannot read the constitution as he does, not even the excuse of error and ignorance to cover their aberrations? Sir, this charge goes out to the nation, to the world, under the authority of the Senator's name—it has already gone forth; party spirit has already seized it; detraction has repeated it; simple credulity may believe it; and the nation is given to understand that its first magistrate has deliberately committed an open violation of the constitution and his duty, or, as was insinuated, has been ignorantly made the instrument of others in its performance; and that this body, the Senate of the United States, is ready, unless they listen to the warning voice of the Senator from Virginia, to aid in the parrietal act. Now, sir, how if this charge should be unsupported? How if it should be void of the slightest foundation? How if the letter of the constitution, as well as its spirit, should sanction the reprobated act? How if it should be proved to have been the uniform course of the Government from its institution, pursued by the practice of Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Monroe, by every President of every party; sanctioned by every Senate, unimpeached by any House of Representatives—called in question by no vigilant guardian of the constitution until the present day? How then! What then will this nation, the intelligent nation to whom this charge is made, what will they think—what will be their verdict? To them, sir, I appeal; to their sentence I am willing to submit. Sir, I do not arrogate to myself to be one of the chosen few to whose charge the defence of the constitution is committed; or that my construction of that instrument is the only orthodox faith. All those who surround me, have an equal duty to perform in this respect; all of them are, no doubt, equally willing, and most of them more able, to perform it than myself; but, while I yield to their equal right and superior ability, I must resist the claim any one may set up, either directly or by implication, to the title of exclusive defender of the constitution. I have said that I do not deal in professions; but when the measures my sense of duty obliges me to support, are stigmatized by the terms we have just heard, I must be permitted to say that I yield to no man in attachment to the charter of our fundamental laws, to the Union of which it is the bond, and to those rights of its separate members, which are not surrendered by it to the National Government. I am old enough to have watched the progress of its formation, to have witnessed the first moments of its existence, and was one of those who hailed its first appearance as the harbinger of that prosperity which it has so gloriously realized. I saw it, sir, in its cradle, marked its progress with no inattentive eye; and the first period of my political life was employed in resisting inroads which false constructions, in high party times, made on its provisions. I belonged, and faithfully adhered, to the party which opposed (for a period unsuccessfully) acts which we thought infractions of that instrument. My profession of faith has not heretofore, and is not now, altered—it never will be. But that faith does not oblige me to array myself with any one, whatever may be my opinion of his patriotism and zeal, in opposition to the exercise of a power that I think is fairly conferred by the constitution to one branch of the Government, or contend for it in favor of another not entitled to it, though I should myself be a member of that latter branch.

What are the facts which have created this sudden explosion? The rapid growth of the Russian establishments on the Black Sea, and the consequent increase of commerce in that quarter, had for some years past made an arrangement desirable with the Sultan, who held the keys of the narrow inlet, through which alone an entrance into this sea could be had. The immediate predecessor of the present Chief Magistrate had appointed successively the two commanders of our squadron in the Mediterranean, together with Mr. Offley, our consul at Smyrna, commissioners to effect this object. They were furnished with full powers, commissioned under the great seal, and instructed to make a treaty to secure this object. This was designed to be a secret mission; it was never communicated to the Senate, nor was the appointment of the commissioners submitted to them for confirmation: however, from some cause, not perfectly understood, but, as many believe, from too great publicity given to the mission, it totally failed; and this failure became known soon after Mr. Adams went out of office. The object increasing every day in importance, it very early attracted the attention of the present administration; and to avoid the interference of other nations, and better to secure the secrecy of the operation, Mr. Rhind was appointed consul to Odessa, but was furnished with full powers, directed jointly and severally to him, Commodore Biddle, and Mr. Offley; he was directed, under the cover of his consular appointment, to proceed to Constantinople, and there negotiate for the free entrance into the Black Sea; he went there, his object was not suspected, and on the 7th May last he concluded a treaty, which was signed by Messrs. Offley and Biddle, they having arrived in the interval, on the day before the adjournment of the Senate at its last session. This last commission, like the preceding appointments, by Mr. Adams, was made in the recess of the Senate; and, as had been the case in these instances, the names of the commissioners were not submitted to the Senate for confirmation. These are the facts, and on them is founded the accusation we have heard.

Let us remember that this is not a question which concerns the infringement of any State right, that it is not one of reserved or conceded powers, but merely regards the mode of exercising one confessedly given to the General Government—that of treating in the name of all the States with a foreign nation.

I will examine, in order, the positions on which these serious charges are founded. The first of them (although I do not think it applicable to the present case) is, that the President has no power to appoint a public minister during the recess of the Senate, to any Power where no such minister had previously existed; or even if such mission had previously existed, unless the vacancy occurred after the adjournment of the Senate. To this position I accede in none of its parts. But if I should err on this subject, I hope to show that the establishment of this construction will not justify the charge that is founded upon it.

I construe the constitution as I would any other written instrument, by its words, where they are explicit—where there is doubt, by the context—by the plain object of its framers, by a view of the evils it was intended to remedy, the circumstances under which it was made, and the contemporaneous construction and uniform practice under it. To adhere to its letter, without these aids, would sometimes defeat the powers evidently intended to be vested by it—sometimes give it greater than were contemplated. For instance, the President is directed to “take care that the laws be faithfully executed.” Take this literally, without any aid from the rules of construction I have laid down, and you give him all power but that of legislation. In the article next preceding, it is said that “no State shall enter into any compact or agreement with another State, without the consent of Congress.” A literal construction of which would prevent a settlement of disputed boundaries: or any other arrangement which mutual accommodation, for the acknowledgment of deeds, the arrest of fugitives, or similar objects, might require. Let us examine the position by these rules.

Turkish Commission.

The constitution directs that "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointment is not hereinafter otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." It then gives power to Congress to vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone. Here the appointing power is complete. But as this power was to be exercised by the President, subject to the approbation of the Senate, and as the sessions of that body were not permanent, it was foreseen that great inconvenience would result if all vacancies were to remain open during the recess. What was the natural remedy? To give the temporary appointment to the President, subject in the usual manner to the confirmation of the Senate, when it should meet. And to afford them time for deliberation, the duration of the temporary appointment was extended to the end of their session. The evil to be remedied by this proviso was the vacancy of an office occurring at a time when it was impossible for the President to submit a nomination to the Senate. Such would be the case of an officer dying during the recess, or resigning on the day of our adjournment; or of a minister dying in a distant country at a time during the session when it would be impossible to know the event before the adjournment. If, in these two last cases, the office were to remain vacant until the meeting of Congress, the remedy in the proviso would not be commensurate to the evil it was intended to avoid. There would be vacancies when it was the evident intention of the instrument there should be none. I must not be understood as saying that an inconvenience attending any construction is sufficient to show it to be false, or that to be the true reading which avoids it. Where the words are express—where the intention is evident, however inconvenient, they must be obeyed. But, where the words will admit of an interpretation which avoids such an evil as must have been foreseen, and cannot be supposed to be left unprovided for, there the rules of construction to which I advert will apply. Before we consider the words of the constitution, let us see the consequences that would result from an adherence to what is perhaps their literal meaning. The collector of the port of New York dies on the day before the adjournment. The vacancy cannot be filled until the December following. The collection of one-third of the revenue of the United States must be left in irresponsible hands. The commander of a military district in time of war dies—his loss cannot be supplied—the most important operations on which the safety of the country depends must be stopped. In the distant operations of your navy, the same or a greater risk and inconvenience occurs. At the moment of concluding a commercial arrangement, by which immense advantages are to be secured, or a treaty of peace, which is to save the country perhaps from devastation, your plenipotentiary dies during the session of Congress, but before the President is apprised of it. He cannot supply his place: the commercial advantages are lost—the war must rage—the country must be devastated: because, according to the literal construction of the clause, the vacancy happened during the session, not in the recess. The President who should presume to remedy these evils, would be guilty of a "lawless usurpation of unconstitutional power." And the zealous guardians of our rights on this floor would denounce all those who might presume to think differently, as men ready to lay the rights of the body to which they belong at the feet of Executive power. These, sir, and a hundred other inconveniences which might be stated, are not only possible, but probable, but certain and inevitable, and must occur during the long series of ages in which it is our unanimous prayer that our constitution may live. Are they not great? Must they not have been foreseen? Could they have escaped the wisdom and deep foresight of the sages who framed the constitution? Have they not provided for them? My belief is that they have, by the section in question. The President by it is authorized to "fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." Now take this literally, and he may fill up vacancies in the Senate itself—and it appears, from the Federalist, that this was once seriously contended for. But this cannot be the true construction, though no one can deny that it is the literal one. Why? Because it was evidently the intention of this section to limit it to the case of officers. There are, then, reasons which justify a departure from the literal meaning of the section in this instance. Are there none in the case before us? I think they have been already sufficiently pointed out. Another, perhaps, of some, though I do not think of conclusive weight, is, that the omission of a comma, which was probably inserted in the draught after the word happen, may have given rise to all the ambiguity in the phrase. In that case, the period described, that is, the recess of the Senate, would relate to the antecedent power of filling the vacancy, not to the occurrence of the event by which it was created. My exposition of this clause, therefore, is, that it permits the President to fill all vacancies in any of the enumerated offices, whether they occur during the recess, or even during the session of the Senate, if the vacancy was not known to him, or could not be supplied during the session; but that he would be guilty of a breach of duty if he appointed them during the session, and did not send in the nomination to the Senate.

It was said on this subject, that no President had ever dared to fill up an original vacancy in an office after the end of the session in which the law which created the office had passed. Whether it was the want of courage, or of inclination, that prevented the performance of an improper act, I cannot say. But as it is admitted that the act was not done, perhaps it might be quite proper to attribute it to the latter cause. But the fact, if it be one, strongly exemplifies my construction. Any office, first created by law, must be vacant at the moment the law is approved by the President. That must necessarily be during the session of the Senate. He is, therefore, bound to fill it; because the vacancy not only happens during the session, but it also comes to his knowledge at that period. But suppose a law to be passed, requiring the appointment of certain officers, which is not to take effect until a distant period, or that is dependent on an uncertain event, and at that time the Senate should not be in session, can it be doubted that the President would be authorized to make a temporary appointment to fill such original vacancy? If he could, by what authority? Not the law surely; for that cannot alter a constitutional right of the Senate, unless the office be an inferior one, and the right to fill it without the concurrence of the Senate be expressly given by the law: it must be then by the liberal construction of the section, which I contend is the true construction. On which subject, sir, permit me to state a manifest difference in the rules for interpreting the constitution. When the question is, whether a certain power is granted by it to the General Government, or reserved to the States—in that case, whenever there is reasonable doubt, the power ought not to be exercised. But where the States have confessedly parted with, and do not claim the power—where it is plainly their object and their interest that it should be exercised by the Federal Government, and the only question is, by what branch, and in what manner—then the true rule of interpretation is that which will give effect to the power, rather than that which would destroy it. In the case of interfering claims between the States individually and their federal head, the mind must be convinced that the power in question was intended to be granted, before it can come to the conclusion that it belongs to the General Government. Where there is doubt, there can be no such conclusion. Therefore, the power must rest as it was—that is, with the State Government. But in the question, how a power confessedly granted is to be exercised—then such absolute certainty is not required. The first duty of the expositor is to adopt some conclusion that will give effect to the declared and confessed grant of power. And although there may be doubts as to the agency by which the intent is to be executed, yet they must be weighed, and the decision made according to the preponderance of the reasons in favor of either of the departments claiming it. Thus, in the present instance, it is the undenied and express intent of the constitution that offices should be filled by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate when they were in session, and by a temporary appointment in the recess. The evident intent, then, is that there shall be no vacancy. The words, however, give rise to two constructions. By the one, this evident intent will be carried into effect. By adopting it, there will be no vacancy for a longer period than elapses before it comes to the knowledge of the President. By the other, in many most important cases this intent will be defeated; the office must remain vacant for the inconvenient, and sometimes exceedingly injurious period of eight or nine months. Which of these constructions are we to adopt? I should incline to think the former would not only be the best but the safest: for not a single inconvenience, that I have been able to discover, or that has been suggested, will attend the appointment to fill a vacancy which occurs during the session, but which is unknown to the President until the recess—not a single inconvenience that will not occur if the vacancy happens in the recess: while the necessity for filling it is equally evident in both cases. Gentlemen, for whose judgment I have the highest respect, I know, differ from me on this point; and it is probable they may be right. I express my opinion merely because the occasion calls for it, and my constituents and the public have a right, in the station I occupy, to understand it. But although it lays at the bottom of the argument which has been used by the Senator from Virginia, I do not think, as I hope to show, that it is the point on which the present question is to be decided.

Turkish Commission.

The reasoning I have hitherto used, is applicable to the appointment of all officers, as well ministers to foreign Powers as others; but there are reasons peculiar to the former, which place the authority to commission them during the recess on a different ground. The office of minister to a foreign Power derives its authority from the law of nations. The intercourse which the political relation of different States towards each in modern times requires, their mutual wants, and the comity which exists between them, render the frequent, and generally the permanent, intervention of agents from one to the other necessary. Every civilized nation must necessarily have the power of appointing and receiving such agents vested in some one or more of its departments. In the constitution of the United States this power is divided: the President alone has the right to receive foreign ministers, and, by the power to make treaties, subject to the assent of the Senate, that of making these treaties himself, or, as a necessary consequence, that of appointing the persons by whom they are to be made. No law, therefore, was necessary to give effect to the exercise of this function. The moment the first President entered into office, he had the right to perform it, either by himself, or by others.

The laws of nations, however, to which I have referred, make a distinction, as I hope abundantly to prove, between two classes of agents by whom the diplomatic intercourse may be carried on; it distinguishes between public ministers and private agents. In the first are included ambassadors, envoys, ordinary and extraordinary, ministers resident, chargés d'affaires, consuls, &c. In the second class there can be no gradation of rank, but the powers may be as extensive as those given to any of the others. The power to make treaties, then, includes that of appointing agents, as well of the one as of the other class. But the constitution has placed a limitation on the power of appointing those of the first class; and having given none to that of the second, the President has it without restriction. In this branch of the argument, however, our inquiry relates to the public ministers only; and the question is, whether the President has a right to appoint such ministers during the recess of the Senate, either to a Power with whom we before had sent no such minister, or to fill a vacancy in the mission to a country where we before had a minister, if that vacancy should have occurred during the session of the Senate. This is here the sole question; for I admit, that, in all cases of appointment to public foreign missions, made in the recess, the President is bound to submit the nomination to the Senate at its next meeting. This is my reasoning on that subject. Having the power to make treaties, afterwards to be submitted to the Senate, the President has the right to select the nation with whom such treaties are to be made, and the time most favorable for making them. That time may occur during the recess of the Senate, and he therefore has the power to fill the original vacancy by the appointment of a public minister; but, in that case, if the negotiation is carried on by such minister, he must send in the nomination to the Senate at some time during their session, if he wishes the appointment to continue beyond that period. If, on the contrary, he finds no occasion for extending the powers of the minister beyond the time at which his commission would expire by the constitutional limitation; if he knows, for example, that the treaty will be made at that time, or the negotiation will be broken off, he may, at his discretion, omit sending in the name for confirmation. He must do this, as he does all other discretionary acts, under his responsibility to the nation; but, in my opinion, he clearly has the power.

The error, as it appears to me, lies in considering the mission to each court as a separate and distinct office: whereas the office of ambassador or minister plenipotentiary is a general one, subject to the President's direction where he is to be sent. He is a minister to reside at such a place; an ambassador to go to such a sovereign. Suppose the constitution had, in express terms, said, the President shall have the power to appoint messengers to carry despatches to different courts—would the messenger to London, the one to Paris, or St. Petersburg, be several and distinct officers, or would the office be the substance, and the destination an accident, liable to be varied, without altering the character of the appointment? Again: if the President had been authorized to appoint justices of the peace for the District of Columbia, surely he might apportion them to the different cities; and their particular destination would not make the justice for one town an officer different in kind from the justice of another. The constitution puts the offices of public ministers precisely on the same footing: it does not limit the number, nor has any law made such limitation: as it now stands, and ever has stood, and must remain, until the Legislature shall declare how many officers of this description there shall be, it is necessarily a matter of sound discretion with the President to what courts the exigencies of the country require that a public resident minister should be sent. In case of a new mission, as his nomination may be rejected, either because the Senate think the mission inexpedient, or because they disapprove of the man, he will generally avoid making such appointments, without consulting the Senate by submitting the nomination, unless the exigency of the case requires it. And as to the existence of such necessity, he must stand upon his responsibility to the people; to be enforced, in case of an unwise exercise of the power, by their voice of disapprobation—a sufficient sanction to a man of character; and, in case of a corrupt exercise, by impeachment. And it must further be observed, that the two Houses have each a check on any extravagance of this kind, by the appropriation.

But that no limitation as to the particular destination of the ministers was intended to be made by law, is proved by the first appropriation bill passed in 1790, where $40,000 is appropriated, not for the support of particular missions, but "for the support of such persons as he [the President] shall commission to serve the United States in foreign parts," and for their incidental expenses; and its only limitation is that of their compensation for the different grades, which has remained unchanged to the present day.

The prominent and striking case of ministers appointed to make peace during the recess of the Senate, stood so directly in the way of the position which denies the power to create a new mission in the recess, that the absolute necessity of removing or getting round it was apparent. But it could not be removed. There it stands—its existence evident—its constitutionality not doubted—its absolute necessity unquestioned. What was to be done? The ingenuity of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] has provided a remedy. The whole is referred to the war-making powers. The President is commander-in-chief of the army. He may find it necessary to make an armistice. He may effect this by such agents as he thinks proper. The plenipotentiaries to treat of peace are not ministers; they are agents to negotiate an armistice. As well, says he, may you call the officer sent to negotiate an exchange of prisoners, or settle the terms of capitulation for a fortress; as well might you call him a minister, as the persons sent to settle the armistice.

It is somewhat unfortunate for this argument that negotiators for peace are invariably plenipotentiaries; that their authority is authenticated by the same broad seal that is supposed to have added so much dignity to the diplomatic character of Messrs. Otley, Biddle, and Rhind; that they are civil, not military officers; that they exchange their full powers with those with whom they treat; that the agreements they make are not armistices—intervals between acts of hostility—but treaties of peace, which put an end to them; and that ninety-nine times in a hundred, the putting an end to hostilities is only one out of many of the stipulations contained in a treaty of peace. The power of making it, therefore, is not a branch of the war power, but of that which is its very antagonist, the power to make treaties. A stipulation that the nations between whom it is contracted shall remain at peace with each other, even should it contain no other agreement, would be as much a treaty as any other that ever was made. It is called by that name; it is negotiated by the same means; requires the same ceremonies in its inception, and the same ratification for its validity as other treaties are. Why, then, call it an armistice, which is never ratified by the treaty-making power of the nation? Why liken it to the capitulation of a fortress, or an exchange of prisoners? Because the argument showed that here, at least, was a case in which the constitution could not bear the strict verbal construction that was contended for; and the precedent proved that it had been departed from in practice, and that the departure had never been questioned, much less stigmatized, by the epithets so liberally bestowed on the Turkish mission. All this made it necessary either to abandon the argument, or give another character to the power of appointing ministers in the recess to stop the ravages of war, when perhaps its continuance might endanger the existence of the nation. A treaty of peace is, for this reason, called an armistice, and the minister plenipotentiary who concludes it, is, by the argument, placed on the same footing with the subaltern who is led blindfolded into the postern of a besieged fort, to summon it to surrender.

But the Senator shall have it which way he pleases. The power to put an end to a destructive war, by the appointment of ministers in the recess of the Senate, is acknowledged. Is it the rightful exercise of a power under the constitution? Then it can only be by giving to the clause the construction which I have put upon it. Is it a power over the constitution? Then the same end which I contend for, by a legitimate construction, is to be allowed by the dangerous plea of necessity—the tyrant's plea—which may not exist when used even to justify a peace. It may be humane, and convenient, and proper, to put an end to the devastations of war; but until the existence of the nation is at stake, until peace alone can save it from destruction, there is, properly speaking, no necessity. What shall be the case of necessity, then, must be determined by the party who is to avail himself of the plea; and, if admitted, will be found to embrace all cases that are found convenient. And if the plea of necessity be admitted to justify a treaty of peace, made by ministers appointed in the recess, why may it not cover a like appointment for making a treaty of commerce, or boundary, or cession, which could only be made at that time?

But is it possible the sages and practical statesmen who framed our form of Government should not have foreseen such ordinary and indeed inevitable occurrences; or that, foreseeing, they should not have provided for them? Is it possible that they could have left the power of making peace—seizing an advantageous occurrence to make an important treaty—or filling an important office, during the recess of the Senate, to be justified by necessity? The idea is an imputation on their wisdom or their patriotism, which they do not deserve. They did foresee—they did provide. And when they gave to the President the power to make treaties, subject to the assent of two-thirds of the Senate, they gave him the power to appoint the ministers by whose agency they were to be made; otherwise, we should exhibit the strange spectacle of a wise nation, which had so cunningly contrived its Government, as to deprive it, in conjunctures that most frequently happen, of the means of making peace, availing itself of favorable circumstances to secure commercial advantages, or filling some of the most important offices.

But the power may be abused! The President may appoint a host of ministers, and drain your treasury by the payment of their salaries. These ministers may make bad treaties! He may compromise our neutrality by acknowledging one of those new Powers which are daily springing into existence!

Alas! yes, sir, it is most true; unfortunately there is no power you can give, that is not liable to abuse. It cannot be denied; and the observation makes up for its want of novelty by its acknowledged truth. In every Government, check and balance it as you will, somewhere there must be confidence; and, until we can find men of unerring wisdom and incorruptible integrity, blind to the allurements of popularity—deaf to the voice of interest, favor, or affection—that is to say, until we can find men who are not men, that confidence will at times be abused. But it must be given. And it so happens that there is no power confessedly given to the President, that is not liable to greater and more fatal abuse than this. You fear war from his sending a minister to one of those new Powers which are yet unacknowledged by the rest of the world; and yet you cannot deny that he has the right to receive a minister from one of those Powers, without consulting the Senate or House of Representatives. You will not trust him with sending a minister, lest he should involve you in a war; and yet you confess that he has the uncontrolled command of your army and your navy—instruments, if he wishes war, infinitely better fitted to produce it.

You apprehend that he may lavish your treasures in the salaries of a few ministers, at the same moment that you give him the control of all the officers employed in the collection of your revenue. You dread that he may reward his favorites by appointments to embassies in the recess; and yet no man can obtain an office of any description, from the highest to the lowest of those which are submitted to the Senate, but by his previous nomination. You are obliged to swallow the camel—why strain at the gnat?

We now approach nearer to the very case which has excited this holy indignation against Executive encroachment and usurpation: excited it—if I may be permitted to use a phrase which did not seem to find favor with the Senator from Virginia, when it was uttered by another, [Mr. KANE,]—excited it too late—too late, indeed, says he, to save this mortal stab at the constitution; but not too late to preserve the Senate from participating in the parricidal act. Here I must take leave to differ. The stroke, if it be one, was given in the earliest day of our national existence. It has been repeated by every President who has sat in the Executive chair; every Senate, and every House of Representatives, have been accessories to the crime; and we ourselves have not yet washed our hands from the blood of the victim. I must be permitted therefore to repent, that, in my poor opinion, it is now too late even to prevent the participation of the Senator himself; not too late, however, for him to show his zeal, energy, and eloquence in defence of the constitution, all which I greatly admire and respect, although I cannot participate in the feelings that have excited them.

In another point of view, I cannot but regret that the discussion had not taken place at an earlier time, and under other circumstances. The full development of the subject would require a reference to matters which all may speak of but ourselves; and although I cannot but feel much embarrassment in the endeavor to avoid disclosing the "secrets of our prison-house," I shall, in the little I have further to say on the subject, carefully avoid any improper disclosure, by confining my remarks in the defence to those circumstances which have been animadverted on in making the charge.

The immediate causes of complaint, then, are, first, that Messrs. Olney, Rhind, and Biddle were appointed by the President, in the recess of the Senate, to negotiate a treaty with the Porte—that being a new mission; and, secondly, that if it had been even the filling of a vacancy, the President ought to have submitted the nomination to the Senate at its then next meeting.

The first error here is one of fact. This was not a new mission. Commodore Crane and Mr. Olney were sent by Mr. Adams, for the same purpose, to the same court. They had effected nothing, and a new commission was instituted, consisting of Mr. Rhind, Commodore Biddle, and Mr. Olney. Here was then a vacancy, if that should be required—a vacancy created by revoking the powers of one set of agents, and giving them to others; and if a vacancy, then, according to the most scrupulous, a right in the President to fill it. The next error is one partly of fact—partly of construction. It consists in giving to those commissioners the appellation of public ministers, and thus bringing them within the proviso of the constitution, which directs that such officers shall be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The distinction that was made by the Senator from Illinois, and supported by a reference to high authority on the law of nations,* did not make upon the gentleman from Virginia the impression it seemed to do upon the rest of the Senate. It is a well founded distinction, that which he thus urged, between a public minister and a secret agent. It seems to be thought that the nature and style of the mission is to be determined by the manner in which the powers are authenticated—not by the character given in those powers. Sir, there are grades in diplomacy which give different rank and privileges—from an ambassador to a secret agent. The lowest of these may have, for the purpose of binding the party he represents, the same powers that are usually vested in the highest. A chargé d'affaires may be ordered to make a treaty, or to compliment a sovereign on his accession; but he is neither more nor less than a chargé d'affaires—so the same acts may be done by a secret agent, having no public diplomatic character.

Ambassadors and other public ministers are directed to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; because public missions required no secrecy, although their instructions might. But the framers of the constitution knew the necessity of missions, of which not only the object but the existence should be kept secret. They therefore wisely made the co-operation of the Senate ultimately necessary in the first instance, but left the appointment solely to the President in the last.

In the very instance before us, if the preceding efforts to form a treaty should have failed from too great a publicity being given to a mission intended to be kept secret; if it should have been defeated by the interference of other Powers; and if whatever success the present attempt has had, might be attributed to the secrecy with which the principal agent left the United States, and the ignorance of his object which prevailed among the ministers of other Powers at Constantinople; if it should turn out that these things were so, would they not form strong proofs of the utility of the distinction between those different kinds of agencies; the public, by means of public acknowledged ministers; the private, by agents specially authorized to perform a certain act, unknown to all but those with whom they treat.

But fault is found with the manner in which these agents were constituted. Their powers, it is said, were under the broad seal of the United States, certified by the signature of the President. This broad seal, or great seal, as it is alternately called, makes a great figure in the argument. Let the President, says the Senator, send his agents, his messengers, his spies, where he pleases—let them be kicked and cuffed by the authorities to which they go, he cares not. But the broad seal, the great seal, should never be profaned to such vile uses. Now, sir, I am not quite so indifferent about the usage our agents may receive, whether they are commissioned under the great or the little seal, or by no seal at all. But I should be glad to know in what manner a President is to signify to a foreign State his confidence in the agent he employs, or the powers with which he chooses to invest him, in any other manner than by his signature to those powers, and the addition of the seal of the United States, which authenticates it. To deny the use of these proofs of the commission given to such agents, is to say that they shall not be employed, because they can transact no business with a foreign Power without the usual proofs of their mission. But the right to employ them is abundantly proved by the laws of nations, and, as I shall show, by the constitution, and a uniform practice under it; therefore, the use of the seal makes no difference in the nature of the mission. They are private agents for the transaction of the business of the nation: public is, in one sense, diplomatic agents sent to foreign countries in the reigns of Louis XIV and XV. A number of missions of this nature took place during the American war, and during the first years of the French republic."

* Of Secret Missions.—"As it happens frequently that Governments do not wish to treat ostensibly on certain matters which they have an interest to conceal from the knowledge of other Powers, it is customary to send and to accredit secretly to a foreign Government, or even only to its Department of Foreign Affairs, only persons of confidence; but without giving them the formal character of public ministers, or authorizing them only to assume it when the negotiation shall have been carried to the desired point." Martens's Manual Diplomatique, p. 15; and in a note, he says: "We have frequent examples of secret the reverse of secret; but, in another, it means what appertains to the nation; and, in this acceptance, there is no confounding of terms, by saying that a secret agent may be appointed to transact public business. The commissioners to the Porte were such secret agents; their commission, though it gave them plenipotentiary powers for a national purpose, was a secret agency, and the President was under no necessity to nominate them to the Senate; it would have been an act of imprudence if he had done so, and the treaty would, most probably, have failed.

Sir, I should be the last man who would impute to any honorable member of this body the indiscretion of divulging any thing confidentially committed to us. But I put it to the Senator who told us how safely all negotiations might be entrusted to its management, whether he ever knew any important subject of our confidential debates that was not first whispered about in the taverns of the city, and soon afterwards alluded to in the public papers. The very subject before us is an instance of what I say; the injunction of secrecy is not removed, and yet provisions, which it is supposed that treaty contains, are as common a topic of discussion as if it had been published; nay, in the warmth of debate, here, with open doors—but, sir, I will pursue that subject no further, lest I might, in my own conduct, afford a proof of what I assert. Suffer me to repeat, that if ever there was a justification for the employment of a secret agency, the circumstances of this case afford it. If ever there was a case in which the difficulty of confining to these walls what passes within them when our doors are shut, this is that case.

Grant that these were secret agents, and not public ministers: it is said, with a triumphant tone, show the power of the President to appoint them. Sir, I will do this, so that every unbelieving political apostle who doubts, may not only hear and see, but shall lay his finger on the clause. It is found in the express, unequivocal authority given to the President to make treaties. If, under this power, he himself should make a treaty with a foreign minister, and submit it to the Senate, could it be objected to as being unconstitutionally negotiated? Surely not by those who contend for literal constructions. But no one has denied that he may do it also by others; must such others be ambassadors or public ministers? Where is the clause that restricts him to such agents? We have seen that, by the law of nations, other grades are known and employed under the title of secret agents. What title in the constitution, what forced construction of any word it contains, can be made to show that he may not make choice of them when he deems it expedient? There is none. The power to make treaties is given, and with it the power to employ all proper means to effect it; secret agents are at times proper means, and therefore he may employ them; therefore, he must employ them whenever he thinks publicity would endanger the failure of his object. Now, sir, let us see whether a practical construction, in every thing conformable to the principles I have laid down, has not been pursued, and from what period. A uniform practice in conformity with any particular construction is always strong evidence that its first construction is correct; as applied to our constitution, it is particularly persuasive, if it arose under the management of those who framed the instrument, and best knew its intent; and it becomes almost conclusive, if the practice has been uninterrupted and unquestioned. All these characteristics, unless I greatly deceive myself, will be found in the succession of acts to which I now invite the attention of the Senate.

The practice of appointing secret agents is coeval with our existence as a nation, and goes beyond our acknowledgment as such by other Powers. All those great men who have figured in the history of our diplomacy, began their career, and performed some of their most important services in the capacity of secret agents, with full powers. Franklin, Adams, Lee, were only commissioners; and in negotiating a treaty with the Emperor of Morocco, the selection of the secret agent was left to the ministers appointed to make the treaty: and, accordingly, in the year 1785, Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson appointed Thomas Barclay, who went to Morocco and made a treaty, which was ratified by the ministers at Paris.

These instances show that, even prior to the establishment of the Federal Government, secret plenipotentiaries were known, as well in the practice of our own country as in the general law of nations; and that these secret agents were not on a level with messengers, letter carriers, or spies, to whom it has been found necessary in argument to assimilate them. On the 30th March, 1795, in the recess of the Senate, by letters patent under the great broad seal of the United States, and the signature of their President, (that President being George Washington,) countersigned by the Secretary of State, David Humphreys was appointed commissioner plenipotentiary for negotiating a treaty of peace with Algiers. By instructions from the President, he was afterwards authorized to employ Joseph Donaldson as agent in that business. In May, of the same year, he did appoint Donaldson, who went to Algiers, and in September of the same year concluded a treaty with the Dey and Divan, which was confirmed by Humphreys, at Lisbon, on the 28th November in the same year, and afterwards ratified by the Senate on the — day of —, 1796, and an act passed both Houses on 6th May, 1796, appropriating a large sum, twenty-five thousand dollars annually, for carrying it into effect.

I call the attention of the Senate to all the facts of this case, with the previous remark, that the construction which it gives to the constitution was made in the earliest years of the Federal Government, by the man who presided in the convention which made that constitution, acting with the advice and assistance of the leading members of that body, all fresh from its discussion; men who had taken prominent parts in every question that arose. That in the Senate which ratified it, and in the House of Representatives which carried it into execution, were several members, not only of the convention when it was formed, but of the State assemblies where it was discussed, analyzed, every hidden defect brought to light; every possible inconvenience predicted; every construction given that ingenuity, sharpened by opposition and party feeling, could conceive: where amendments were proposed, to remedy apprehended evil; where it was examined, article by article, phrase by phrase, not a word, not a syllable, escaping their inquisitorial scrutiny. Yet, by those men, with this perfect and recent knowledge of the constitution, acting under the solemn obligation to preserve it inviolate, and without any possible motive to make them forget their duty, was this first precedent set; without a single doubt on the mind that it was correct; without protest, without even remark. A precedent going the full length of that which is now unhesitatingly called a lawless, unconstitutional usurpation; bearing the present act out in all its parts, and in some points going much beyond it. Like the present case, it was an appointment in the recess of a commissioner, with full powers to make a treaty; these powers were authenticated as these were, by the signature of the President and the great seal of the nation. But it differs in this, that the commission to Col. Humphreys was an original appointment, and, therefore, according to the new doctrine, more objectionable, no minister having before been appointed to treat with Algiers. Whereas, in this case, a previous commission had been given by Mr. Adams, which was vacated by the recall of the first powers, and the appointment of Rhind, Osley, and Biddle. It went infinitely further than this, in giving to the minister the authority to appoint a substitute, and in the fact that the substitute negotiated and made the treaty—the minister remaining in Lisbon, and Donaldson going alone to Algiers, where the treaty was concluded. Mark, too, that the commission to Humphreys is dated only three weeks after the adjournment of the Senate in March; that Donaldson was employed in May; and that neither Humphreys nor Donaldson were ever nominated to the Senate, although they of course met in the December following. Look, sir, into the executive journal before you. No nomination of Humphreys, under this commission—not a syllable said of Donaldson. Yet, when the treaty came, it was ratified; yet both Houses passed a law for carrying, eo nomine, this very treaty into effect; no squeamishness about the phrase under which the appropriation should be made; nothing hidden; the whole transaction—the mode of its execution—the agents by whom it was effected, broad seal and all—the appellation of the agent, commissioner plenipotentiary, which is now so offensive, all spread before the Senate, composed of men, four-fifths of whom I may, I think, say, had either aided in making the constitution, or deliberated on the propriety of its adoption, and this treaty sent to them by George Washington. Yet, with all these badges of lawless, unconstitutional usurpation on its back, the treaty is ratified—the law passes. No grave Senator, no independent representative rises to oppose this gross assumption of power. Did patriotism sleep on its post? Where were the watchful, the sworn guardians of the constitution, thus palpably violated? Where were the Senators, jealous of their rights? Where the representatives of the people, sent to guard the palladium of their liberties? All silent; not a word of opposition; not a whisper of doubt. And yet the violation, “gross, open, palpable”—more gross, more open, more palpable than the one we are now warned against, because in more points it contradicts the construction that is affirmed as the only true and orthodox faith by which we may be politically saved. Ought not this practical and contemporaneous construction, even if it stood alone, to create some doubt of the doctrines we are so vehemently urged to adopt? Ought not the example of Washington, even if, in our superior wisdom, we now, for the first time, guided by new lights, find it wrong, ought it not to command some little indulgence for those who follow it?

Will it be said that this example does not apply? Let the difference be pointed out; and where they differ, the example set by Washington will be found more at war with the principles laid down by the Senator from Virginia, than the acts which he now denounces as unconstitutional.

Will he refer again to the war-conducting power, and call the treaty with Algiers an armistice? The treaty itself replies to this answer—it is a treaty of commerce, as well as of peace.

But this is not an isolated case. In the very same year, on the same day of the year, the 30th March, 1795, David Humphreys received another commission, by letters patent from President Washington, authenticated in the same manner, constituting him commissioner plenipotentiary for negotiating a treaty of peace with “the most illustrious the Bashaw, Lords, and Governors of the city and kingdom of Tripoli,” with like power of substitution. On the 10th February, 1796, he transferred his powers to Joel Barlow; and, on the 5d January, 1797, Mr. Barlow made a treaty with the Bashaw and his Divan, which was, in like manner with the former, approved by Col. Humphreys, at Lisbon, on the 10th February, 1797, and was ratified by the Senate the following session. Here we find three sessions, after the commission, pass, before the treaty is presented to the Senate for its confirmation, during all which, no nomination of either Humphreys or Barlow was made. Surely, if a doubt had crossed the mind of the President, that mind of which the eminent characteristics were deliberation and prudence, if the shadow of a doubt had passed over it, would not the same regard for the constitution, for which he was equally remarkable, have induced him to consult his cabinet, to consult, as he frequently did, on other and less important occasions, the Senate? Sir, he had no doubts; the greatest and best, and most prudent man in the country had no doubts. His advisers had none—the Senate had none. The House of Representatives did not hesitate; and the nation, filled with men whose minds were enlightened by continued discussions of the constitution, approved. Yet we doubt. Nay more, we decide; and, admitting no contrariety of opinion, stigmatize that very conduct thus pursued by Washington, as lawless usurpation. That great man, very soon after this, retired from office, carrying with him the benedictions of his fellow-citizens, and little suspecting that this wise and upright act of his administration would draw down on those who copied it the reproaches we have heard. John Adams, who, besides the great share he had in forming the constitution, was pre-eminently qualified to judge on every question relating to foreign intercourse; who might be styled the founder of American diplomacy—John Adams succeeded him. And he, too, strange as it may appear—he, too, fell into the same fatal error, or (if the case is as clear as is supposed) was guilty of the same unpardonable fault. He, too, on the 18th of December, 1798, put his signature and the great broad seal of the nation to a paper, vesting Richard O’Brien, William Eaton, and James Leander Cathcart, with full powers to negotiate with the Dey and Regency of Tunis, alterations in a certain treaty made in the year 1797, by Joseph Famin, who calls himself a “French merchant residing at Tunis, and chargé d’affaires of the United States.” These gentlemen made the new treaty on the 6th March, 1799; yet neither the nomination of the French merchant, who made the first treaty, (which must have been in the time of General Washington,) nor of the three other commissioners, was ever submitted to the Senate. And it is remarkable that this last appointment was made on the 18th December, when the Senate was in session.

During the administration of the next President, Thomas Jefferson, only one treaty with the Barbary Powers (that with Tripoli) was made; but as the negotiation was carried on by Mr. Lear, the public minister of the United States at that place, nothing can be inferred from this transaction that bears on the question; but Jefferson’s co-operation in the two appointments which I have quoted, by General Washington, leaves no doubt of his construction of the constitution.

Here we have the practice of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson, uniformly the same, sanctioning every part of the conduct pursued by the present Chief Magistrate; and, in some instances, as I have shown, pushing the construction further than he has found it necessary to go. But this is not all: Mr. Madison comes next. If any voice can be called the oracle of the constitution, it is his; if any practice under it can be deemed void of error or intentional wrong, it is that of the wise, the venerated Madison. What did he do? He followed precisely the route in which his predecessors trod. In the year 1815, hostilities having been commenced by Algiers, he commissioned William Shaler, and the gallant and lamented Deatur, to negotiate with them. They concluded a treaty on board of the United States’ ship Guerriere. But he never nominated them to the Senate; yet the treaty, like the others, was ratified by the Senate in the succeeding session, without a question as to their right to co-operate in the appointment. He it was, too, who, in the recess of the Senate, sent the commission which made the treaty of peace with Great Britain.

Again: Difficulties having arisen as to the execution of the treaty with Algiers, another commission was issued on the 24th of August, 1816, to William Shaler and Isaac Chauncey, who renewed the former treaty, with alterations, on the 23d of December of the same year. And again the Senate were kept in ignorance of the appointment, until the treaty was sent to them for ratification. This is the last treaty with any of the Powers professing the Mahometan faith, prior to the one that has given rise to this discussion. And, in forming this, the President, with stronger reasons for secrecy than any of his predecessors had, has only, as far as he has gone, followed their example—followed his own and their construction of the constitution—and exercised no power that had not for forty years been universally acknowledged to be legitimate. I bring the acquiescence down to this moment, because the questions raised on the Panama mission are not those to which this transaction gives rise. Then the objection was to an appointment of a peculiar nature—a mission, not to a particular Power, but to a Congress of Powers; it was not supposed to be strictly diplomatic; our agents, it was feared, were to act as deputies to a confederative Government, rather than as ministers. And to this was added the difficulty, at that time first raised, to the power of creating a new mission in the recess; here, however, the first objection cannot apply, and the previous appointment by Mr. Adams takes away the second. The objection, then, to the making a treaty by secret agents, whose nomination is not sent to the Senate, is, I repeat, a new objection made to an established, and, as I believe, a perfectly constitutional practice. The objection is new, but it may yet be well founded, although I cannot perceive its force; and, not perceiving it, must be permitted to think it passing strange that it never before occurred to one single individual, who has ever expressed his opinion on the subject, as far as my limited information goes.

There are two other Presidents whose acts and opinions on this subject we have to examine, in order to complete the series.

On Mr. Monroe's accession to the Presidency, he found our peace secured with the Barbary Powers; he had, therefore, no commissioners to appoint to them; but he had participated, as the head of the Department of State, in those which had been sent by Mr. Madison; and we may, therefore, fairly suppose, that, if the occasion had offered, he would have followed the same course. But, during his administration, and that of his successor, it was found convenient, in the exercise of the same constitutional right of making treaties, to employ other agents than "ambassadors or public ministers," to form treaties with European and Christian Powers, as had been formerly done with the Mahometan States of Africa. Differences had existed ever since the treaty of 1802 with Spain, not only of boundary, but on account of claims, to a vast amount. The settlement of the dividing line between the United States and Mexico would take from or add to our territory an extent sufficient for the establishment of several States. And the acquisition of Florida had always been considered as a matter of primary importance. If, then, the magnitude and importance of the objects; if the rank and dignity of the party, required that the negotiation should be conducted by public ministers, and that their appointment should be confirmed by the Senate, here was the case. Here was not even the plea of the recess. For during the session of Congress, in 1818-19, Mr. Monroe gave to Mr. Adams plenipotentiary powers to treat with the minister of Spain, and make a settlement of all these important matters. He gave these powers by commission under the great seal. He never communicated the appointment to the Senate, although they were in session. The negotiation was carried on in the very place where they sat, and was concluded before they adjourned, by a treaty which purchased the two Floridas; settled our boundary, by abandoning our claims to the immense extent of country between the Rio del Norte and the Sabine; and made a charge on our treasury of five millions of dollars. Yet, sir, this treaty was ratified by the Senate, and not one word of reprobation, not an accent of doubt uttered as to the irregularity of the commission by which it was negotiated; and both Houses concurred in passing laws for carrying it into execution.

Again: When Mr. Adams came to the Presidency, he in like manner, in the year 1826, commissioned Mr. Clay to treat of and conclude a treaty of commerce and navigation with the minister of Denmark; which treaty was signed on the 26th of April, in the same year, during the sitting of the Senate, and in like manner ratified by them, although the appointment of Mr. Clay was never made known to the Senate, and of course was not confirmed by them. And we, sir, we ourselves, every one of us, who now hear or make these denunciations—we have ratified a treaty made with one of the greatest Powers of Christendom, by a plenipotentiary commissioned under the great seal, whose appointment was never sanctioned or sent to the Senate for its advice; and that, too, a Power with which before we had no diplomatic intercourse—with Austria—made by the present Secretary of State, under a special appointment by the President. Should it be said that this practice of employing a special minister at home to make treaties with a foreign Power, is of modern date; that it does not, like the case of the Mediterranean commissions, run back to the early part of our diplomatic history, I would answer that this, too, is an error; and that my construction is sanctioned in this also by the practice of Washington. As early as the year 1796, some doubts having arisen as to the operation of the third article of Mr. Jay's treaty, Mr. Pickering was commissioned to negotiate an explanatory article, which was agreed to, submitted to the Senate, and ratified without any nomination of the negotiator to the Senate.

Now, sir, does not this uniform, this unquestioned practice, carried through every Presidency, from that of the father of his country to that of the present incumbent; is it not strongly persuasive of the correctness of that construction which gives to the President the power to make treaties whenever he may deem it expedient, by a special agent, instead of a public minister—to give full powers, under the great seal, to such special agent, and to omit nominating him to the Senate when he thinks proper? Will it be said that the instances I have last mentioned do not apply, because the Secretary of State was the agent? But he was the agent only by the special commission, given to him by the President—a commission, without which he could not have acted, which as his full power, he was obliged to interchange with the minister with whom he treated, before the negotiation could begin. If, as Secretary of State, the duty could have been done, mere instructions would have sufficed—no commission would have been necessary. But in every instance commissions were delivered, in the same form, as to powers, that are used for ministers going abroad. The President might have selected any other individual, and the case is as strongly in point as if he had. Will the gentleman point out the difference between these cases which he, jointly with all of us, has approved, and that which he now so violently reprobates? If the President may appoint a special agent to make a treaty with a nation with whom we had none before, without submitting the nomination to the Senate; if he may make such an appointment for a negotiation here, can he not make a similar appointment for a negotiation to be carried on in Constantinople? If the latter is forbidden, where is the clause that authorizes the former? If the former is legal, where is the clause that excludes the latter? Are not both exercised under the same constitutional authority? Why, then, sanction the one and denounce the other? It appears to me that a satisfactory answer to these queries would be difficult, even to the ingenuity of the mover of the amendment; and that it would be somewhat difficult for him to show that there is any one of the inconveniences and dangers which he apprehends, from the appointment of commissioners, with full powers, going to a foreign country, that does not attach to negotiations by special agents at home. But these dangers are imaginary in both cases. Nothing either of them can do, has any force until we sanction it. And in requiring the assent of two-thirds of the Senate to every treaty, those who made our form of Government thought they might safely trust the discretion of the President in selecting the agents for making it.

Crimes in the District of Columbia.—Turkish Commission.

But to remove all ground for the distinction, take an instance from the same collection of treaties which I have before quoted. In the year 1818, Mr. Gallatin, then our minister in France, was commissioned jointly with Mr. Rush, our minister at St. James', to negotiate a treaty with England, in the same manner that the Secretaries of State were commissioned to negotiate at Washington. This nomination was never submitted to the Senate, yet a most important convention, made under that appointment, was ratified by the Senate; so that here we have commissioners appointed at home, abroad, to Christians as well as infidels, in every form, in every character in which the power can be exercised, and in every form acknowledged by the co-ordinate branches of Government to be constitutional and right; and yet, sir, it is now undertaken to arraign and denounce it as a usurpation. The second ground of accusation, that the nomination, though made in the recess, was not submitted to the Senate when they met, has been anticipated. It may be justified on several grounds; which were those which actuated the President, as I am not in his counsels, I do not know. It may be justified on the necessity of keeping the mission a secret until the result was known; on his constitutional power of originating a secret mission without the co-operation of the Senate; and on the utility of naming persons to be confirmed in offices which were temporary in their nature, and which must expire before the confirmation by the Senate could be made, or at any rate before it could reach them. Thus the treaty with the Porte having been completed before the adjournment of Congress at the last session, it would have been useless to confirm the powers of the negotiators. I pass over the argument to show that, although the letter of Mr. Olney particularly states that he signed the treaty on Sunday, yet he must have been mistaken, because no Christian in a country of infidels would be guilty of a breach of the Christian sabbath. I pass that over with asking how often we ourselves, when duty required it, have not sat and deliberated within these very walls on the same sacred day; and whether disobedience to any of our legal acts, done at such a time, would be excused on the allegation of an impossibility of our having been guilty of the breach.

Sir, I have now finished a task which I wish had fallen into abler hands. I have endeavored to show, that if the evil which is denounced as a lawless usurpation, be tried by a fair construction of the federal compact, by its contemporaneous exposition, by the example of the best, and wisest, and most prudent men who have directed the affairs of the country, or by the uniform practice of every President, sanctioned by the acts or acquiescence of every Senate and every House of Representatives since the institution of our Government; if these are to weigh against the denunciation of the Senator from Virginia, then the accusation falls. He has urged it with vehemence and zeal—he has enforced it with his accustomed eloquence; but, according to the best judgment that God has given me, I must say he has not supported it by a single proof.

Mr. TYLER rose when Mr. LIVINGSTON concluded, and stated his wish to address the Senate; but, as what he had to say, would consume more time than the Senators would be disposed to indulge him with this evening, he moved an adjournment. The motion prevailed, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

CRIMES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the punishment of crimes within the District of Columbia.

Mr. C. said that, when the bill was last before the Senate, debate arose on a motion by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] to recommit the bill to the District Committee, with a view to striking out the clause relative to punishment for duelling, or being concerned in a duel. The amount and importance of the business before the Senate, and the expediency of early acting upon it, induced him to waive any remarks at this time on the motion, that the sense of the Senate might at once be taken upon it. If the bill was recommitted, the committee would of course report the bill with the clause stricken out; and he could see no necessity for its recommitment, because the question might as well be taken now.

Mr. HAYNE explained the reasons why it had not been in his power to make the motion at an earlier day. He was desirous of testing the sense of the Senate on this particular clause of the bill. If the recommitment took place, the committee would either strike out the clause, or so modify it as to meet the views of the Senate. A speedy decision on the bill was desirable, and he took the occasion to say, that, if this recommitment took place, there would be no further opposition on his part. Under the present provisions of the bill, not only the parties convicted of fighting a duel, but the bearer of the challenge, the surgeon, &c.—every accessory—was to be punished by five years' hard labor in the penitentiary. With due deference to those who introduced this clause into the bill, he was of opinion that so severe a mode of punishment would destroy the whole object of the provision. The punishment was so severe, that no jury would be found to enforce the provisions of the law. The punishment for crime should be adapted to the prejudices, the passions, and opinions of the people, and a milder cause would be found to answer a more practical purpose. Perhaps the better course would be to strike out the clause altogether from the present bill, and then, by special statute, prescribe the punishment for duelling. This bill went further than the laws of any State of the Union on the subject; and he thought that if the Congress of the United States, under the auspices of the Senator from Louisiana, should pass a law determining what the punishment in such cases should be, the several States would adopt the regulations of such a law.

The bill was then ordered to be recommitted; but, at the suggestion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the vote was reconsidered, and the Senate struck out the clause referred to altogether.

Thus amended, the bill was passed.

THE TURKISH MISSION.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the appropriation to pay the negotiators of the Turkish treaty,

Mr. TYLER said, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] had commenced the speech which he yesterday delivered, by repeating, with much emphasis, the words "a lawless act, and in derogation of the rights of the Senate." These words had fallen from my colleague, said Mr. T., and seemed to have excited the feelings of the honorable Senator, and, in some degree, his displeasure. My colleague requires no aid from me, or any other individual, to justify either his language or his conduct. The motives of the last will at all times be above reproach; and the language which he may at any time use will never fail to convey most strongly the idea which it is intended to represent. I will, however, say to the honorable Senator, that if either my colleague or myself use expressions not familiar to the ears of courtiers, he must excuse our rusticity, and ascribe our fault to our course of education, and the land from which we come. The inhabitants of that republic are somewhat a bold and fearless race, and practise upon a principle which has been, for all time, prevalent amongst them, of calling things by their right names. If an act be done without law, they call it lawless; if in derogation of the right of others, they say so, whomsoever it may offend.

The same gentleman has more than intimated that this was not the proper place for this discussion; that it would have been better to have carried it on in secret session. I differ with him in this, as in much else. By and by I shall show that the opportunity was not afforded until the bill upon your table came up for consideration; but if it had been, our secret chamber is no place for the discussion of a great constitutional question. It was proper, in every point of view, that the debate should be in this place. Here, before the public, the attack should be made. In the face of the world our reasons should be given for our course of conduct, and for the attitude we assume upon this important subject. This discussion has been forced upon us, from what motives, and for what ends, I leave to others to determine. Every Senator here can testify that my colleague, in a day or two after taking his seat this session, announced his opposition to the course which had been pursued in regard to the late mission to Constantinople. The Secretary of State knew his opinions at an early day, and yet the plain, the obvious, the palpable course by which all controversy might have been avoided, has been made to yield to this. The torch of discord has been thrown among us, and the unity of the party with which we have, with but one exception, acted, is for the time broken up. This claim of individuals, resting merely on a contract with the President, is diverted from the ordinary course of private and individual legislation, and attempted to be thrust into the general appropriation bill.

I am aware of the effect of this, whatever the design. A hue and cry is to be raised at our heels. An anecdote will serve to illustrate its character. The night succeeding the day on which my colleague delivered his powerful argument on this question, the ice in the Potomac was put in motion, and pressed on by the mountain torrent produced by the thaw, carried off a part of the bridge connecting this with the Virginia shore. A gentleman gave me the information, and said, with archness, the connection between Virginia and the President's mansion is now severed. My colleague's speech doubtless produced the thaw; and to him, also, will be ascribed whatever evil shall arise from this discussion. All are esteemed schismatics who oppose themselves, no matter upon what ground, to an error committed; and we shall be pronounced heretics by the political Catholic church. In other words, an act is done which in our consciences we cannot approve—which those who have the management of this affair are told in advance we cannot approve; and then we all are to be denounced as schismatics, and all the vials of wrath are to be emptied on our heads. This, sir, is a perversion of all justice, of all moral rule. Those who perpetrate the error, must surely be responsible for consequences resulting from it.

It is our duty, Mr. President, under all circumstances, and however situated, to be faithful to the constitution. Esto perpetui should be the motto of all in regard to that instrument, and more emphatically those into whose hands it is committed by the parties to the compact of union. Sir, parties may succeed, and will succeed each other; stars that shine with brilliancy to-day, may be struck from their spheres to-morrow; convulsion may follow convulsion; the battlements may rock about us, and the storm rage in its wildest fury; but while the constitution is preserved inviolate, the liberties of the country will be secure. When we are asked to lay down the constitution upon the shrine of party, our answer is, the price demanded is too great. If required to pass over its violation in silence, we reply, that to do so would be infidelity to our trust, and treason to those who sent us here. The constant effort of Virginia has been directed to its preservation; the political conflict of the hour has never led her to yield it for an instant. No matter with what solemnity the violation has been attended; although sanctioned by the two Houses of Congress and the President of the United States, and confirmed by judicial decision, she has not halted in her duty. How little, then, should we be entitled to represent her, if we could so far forget ourselves as to hobble in our course. Let me, sir, be distinctly understood. I lay down no rule for others. Senators here will prescribe rules for themselves. No doubt all will be governed by motives equally pure and honorable; but, holding the opinions which I do upon this subject, I should esteem myself the veriest recreant to my most solemn obligations, if I could bring myself to support this appropriation.

The Senator from Louisiana has pronounced it a new discovery which we have made—a new discovery, sir! Was it not proved to the Senate the other day, that the power had always been denied to the President of sending ministers to foreign courts of his own mere motion? Sir, neither the discovery is new, nor the doctrine; both are as old as the constitution itself, as I shall presently demonstrate, from the very letter of that instrument. What was that question which but a few years since divided this Senate? What was the Panama question, but the bone, flesh, and sinew of this?

[MR. LIVINGSTON explained. He had spoke of secret agencies: no one had ever objected to them as unconstitutional.]

Sir, said Mr. TYLER, this is no secret agency, in the diplomatic sense, but a secret embassy, or mission. But let us return to the Panama question. What was that? Nothing more than a mere abstract declaration made by Mr. Adams, that the right to depute ministers without the interposition of the Senate fell within the competency of the Executive power. He did not appoint, however, but, as the constitution required, nominated persons to the Senate for its advice and consent; and yet what was the course pursued? There then stood on this floor, arm to arm, and shoulder to shoulder, nineteen Senators, who, with their shields interlocked, moved with the irresistible force of the Spartan phalanx upon that enemy-principle which threatened to overthrow the constitution. The present Secretary of the Navy moved the resolution in the following words, viz.

“Resolved, as the opinion of the Senate, inasmuch as the claim of powers thus set up by the Executive might, if suffered to pass unnoticed by the Senate, be hereafter relied upon to justify the exercise of a similar power, they owe it to themselves and the States they represent, to protest, and they do hereby solemnly, but respectfully, protest, against the same.”

Mark you, sir—a mere claim set up. The apprehension, that that might be called into precedent, to justify the exercise of a similar power by some future Executive, was sufficient to produce so solemn a resolution as that which I have read. Let us look to what was uttered in debate on that question. The state of the vote has already been mentioned. I will read to the Senate some of the remarks which fell from the present Secretary of the Navy. Before I do so, however, let me speak my honest convictions. I do not believe that he has had any agency in advising this mission to Constantinople. I do not believe that he could be guilty of an inconsistency so gross and palpable. No man has more confidence in the firmness of his adhesion to the principles of the constitution than myself. In his attachment to the great doctrines of the democratic party, he is a fit and proper representative of the State of which he is a native—a State which has been distinguished by nothing more strongly than by her uniform devotion to the constitution. That star in our political galaxy has never shed “disastrous twilight,” or undergone eclipse. Sir, I speak not ex cathedra. I have had no syllable of conversation with that gentleman; but, from my knowledge of his character, and other circumstances, I am led to the opinion which I have expressed. “I view,” said Mr. Branch, referring to the resolution, “the usurpation which it notices and purports to repel, as a link in the chain, threatening the most portentous and calamitous consequences to the liberties of this people.” “Isolated, unconnected with any thing else, yet so plainly and palpably conflicting with the letter and spirit of the constitution, it is truly appalling to the friends of liberty.” And again, “It is time to re-enact magna charta; it is time to re-assert the principles of the declaration of independence.” The mere assertion by the President that he possessed the power of appointing ministers, and of originating a mission, without consulting the Senate, produced these strong expressions. Magna charta was violated, and the principles of the Government required to be re-asserted. I might multiply quotations from the same speech, all equally impressive, but I will pass to that delivered on the same question by a gentleman, then a Senator, now a member from Kentucky in the other House. I deem it necessary to quote but one sentence in order to exhibit his strong convictions on this claim of power set up by Mr. Adams. [Mr. TYLER here read from Mr. JOHNSON'S speech.] “I think I might risk the decision of this question upon the hazard of a universal and unanimous opinion as to the plain common sense meaning of the constitution.” To cite passages equally strong from the speeches of others, would not be difficult. The opinions then uttered by my colleague are the same that he has enforced in this debate. But I will give you the expressions and opinions of a gentleman who stands more immediately connected with the proceeding now the subject of discussion. I mean the Secretary of State—the person immediately charged with the management of our diplomatic relations—one upon whose advice the President doubtless reposed with confidence. I have found no speech of his reported on Mr. Branch's resolution, and imagine that he delivered none; but he spoke on the Panama question, properly so called, and subsequently on the rules of the Senate. Let us see his speech on the first question. [Here Mr. T. read from that speech.] “The measure is deemed to be (that of sending ministers to Panama without previously consulting the Senate) within the constitutional competency of the Executive; that we are only consulted to obtain our opinion on its expediency, and because it is necessary to come to us for an appropriation, without which the measure cannot be carried into effect. Yet, sir, the first blow that was struck in that great contest which subsequently convulsed the country, and the first voice that was raised to arrest the current of events then setting in, (speaking of the suggestion which was made by the first Adams relative to the mission to Berlin,) were on points, to all substantial purposes, identical with the present. Is it not a startling, if not an ominous circumstance, that so soon under the present administration we should have presented to us, in such bold relief, doctrines and principles, which, in the first year of that to which I have referred, laid the principles of the most bitter and unrelenting feuds? Does the analogy stop here? The men who then opposed the mission to Berlin were denounced as oppositionists—as a faction who sought the gratification of their personal views at the expense of the public good. They were lampooned and vilified by all the presses supporting and supported by the Government, and a host of malicious parasites generated by its patronage.” Yes, sir, and we shall be lampooned and vilified for the course which we now pursue. My colleague read correctly the handwriting on the wall. What was fact formerly will be fact again. But let the storm rage, if it shall be so willed by those who control the operations of particular presses; I stand here the advocate of the constitution, and, if necessary, I am ready to become the victim in its place.

I am not yet done with the Secretary of State. I will read you a paragraph from a speech delivered by him on what was commonly called “the Rules of the Senate,” a speech delivered since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor.

“The same disposition to limit the popular branch was forcibly illustrated in the discussions of the foreign intercourse bill in 1798. It was upon that occasion contended, and successfully, too, that the House of Representatives had no discretion upon the question of appropriation for the expenses of such intercourse with foreign nations as the President saw fit to establish; that they would be justly obnoxious to the imputation of gross delinquency if they hesitated to make provision for the salaries of such foreign ministers as the President with the assent of the Senate should appoint. What would be the feelings of real and unchanged republicans in relation to such doctrines at this day? Associated with them was the bold avowal that it belonged to the President alone to decide on the propriety of the mission; and that all the constitutional agency which the Senate could of right have, was to pass on the fitness of the individuals selected as ministers. It was pretensions like these, said Mr. Van Buren, aided by unceasing indications, both in the internal and external movements of the Government, that produced a deep and settled conviction in the public mind that a design had been conceived to change the Government from its simple and republican form to one, if not monarchical, at least too energetic for the temper of the American people.” Indeed, sir, the avowal that the President alone possessed the power to decide on the propriety of a mission, and that all our agency consisted in determining on the fitness of the minister to be sent, if not monarchical, is at least too energetic in its tendency, bold, and somewhat reckless; and yet a mission originated, and not even the names of the ministers sent into the Senate; and, that, too, notwithstanding a long session of that body had, in fact, intervened. Why, sir, here is not only a bold avowal, but the actual execution of that avowal with a vengeance. Not only no previous consultation with, but no nomination even ever submitted. The Secretary also voted for the resolution of Mr. Branch in the only form in which he could express his opinion. And yet, “ere those shoes were old” with which he followed (not “like Niobe, all tears,” but with a heart full of joy and gladness,) the last administration to its grave, the same doctrine is carried into full practice. What, sir, make war upon an abstraction; cause the thunders to roll and the lightnings to flash, in order to annihilate a mere abstraction, and yet call upon us to sanction its practical application! Will gentlemen recant thus their opinions solemnly recorded? Shall it be said that we can give two readings to the constitution, and that that which is unconstitutional in Mr. Adams's time becomes right and proper under General Jackson? Shall we put off our opinions with as much facility as we do our gloves? Have we not good grounds to complain of the Secretary of State, if he advised this mission? and that he did so, I cannot bring myself to doubt. Has not the whole Jackson party cause to complain? Was there any question on which that party stood so deeply committed as on this? None, sir; not one.

Even if there existed an aptness in the cases referred to by the Senator from Louisiana as furnishing precedents to justify this mission, however they might influence the President, they can furnish no excuse for the Secretary, his constitutional adviser. Those cases were all paraded in the discussion on the Panama question; they were commented on, and their force overthrown. Can an actor in that proceeding now repose for his justification on precedents which had been declared of no force or effect? Let it not be said that the President is alone liable to be questioned. The constitution has placed around him advisers in the several departments, and for the counsel they may give him they are answerable, not only to him, but to public opinion.

But, Mr. President, we are told by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE,] that these persons were not public ministers. Now, sir, there is an old saying, and a very wise one—"save us from our friends, and we will take care of our enemies;" and never was it more applicable than on the present occasion. If an attempt is made to excuse a thing, and the excuse prove insufficient, better by a hundred times had it never been urged. Why, sir, if these were not public agents, what in the name of common sense were they? Formerly, and no doubt it is still the case, kings and potentates had their private ambassadors. They are deputed to transact some matter appertaining solely to the King, their master. They may be charged, like an Earl of Suffolk in former times, to negotiate a treaty of marriage; or, like somebody else, to present congratulations on the birth of an heir apparent, or to purchase a crown jewel. These would, indeed, be private agents, such as the President, not as President, but as an individual, may employ. But who would think for a moment of quartering such agents on the treasury? Sir, it is the employment which gives character to the agent. If sent on a high embassy, involving the commercial interests of the country, whether his character be publicly known or not, is wholly immaterial; and the very quotation from Martens, which he has relied on, is sufficient to satisfy the Senator of this: for, says that writer, "secret embassies are of many sorts."

If the court to which he is sent (speaking of one employed on a secret embassy) "be informed of the object of his mission, he ought to be granted all the inviolability due to him as minister." Did Mr. Rhind make known to the Porte his true character? Was he not recognised in that character? Did he not exhibit his credentials, enter into a negotiation, and conclude a treaty of commerce and navigation? Who doubts this? The fact that the treaty is ratified, speaks all that I ask. But, sir, in what a lamentable position is this argument of the gentleman placed by the President's own avowal, made but a day since in the face of the public? I hold in my hand the Intelligencer of this morning, containing a message from the President to the House of Representatives, covering a letter from Mr. Rhind on the subject of certain fine Arabian steeds presented to him by the Sultan. [Here Mr. T. read a portion of Mr. Rhind's letter, in which he uses the following language:] "Although this was evidently not intended to me (speaking of the present) in my official capacity, since the ministers were aware I could not accept them as such, still the gift was one that could not be returned without giving offence." And, but for his official capacity, said Mr. T., why should Congress be troubled with the subject at all? The mandate of the constitution interposes with the declaration, "that no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, &c. from any king, prince, or foreign State." The President, then, acknowledges Mr. Rhind to have been an officer of Government; and, as I am indifferent about names, if gentlemen choose to unminister Mr. Rhind, if I may coin a phrase, I care not, so they do not deny that he was an officer of the Government. The language of the constitution embraces as well the case of an officer, however subordinate, as of an envoy extraordinary. But, sir, if the circumstance of these persons having been engaged on a secret mission converts them into mere secret agents of the President, I beg to know what becomes of us when we go into secret session. Do we cease to be public agents while sitting with closed doors? True, we sit not then in public, but in secret; but what new credentials are made out for us? Away, then, with these flimsy apologies. Let us meet this question boldly and fearlessly. Let us tell the President that he has erred. Let us be true to ourselves, to our constituents, but, above all, to the constitution. What is the language of that high instrument? "He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, and other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein provided for and established by law." The obligation to nominate is one thing, that to appoint another. An appointment cannot precede a nomination, nor can it take place without the advice and consent of the Senate. Did the President nominate these commissioners, these ambassadors, these official agents? Gentlemen can take their choice of terms. No. Did he appoint them? Yes, no one doubts it. Has he appointed them by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? No: for no nomination ever was submitted to the Senate. What, then, is the inference? It is plain and palpable; I need not express it. Sir, is not this enough to give us pause? Language cannot be clearer, sense more unincumbered, or injunction more obvious. These arguments apply as well to the ministers sent by Mr. Adams, so far as their true character has been made known, as to those sent by President Jackson. No one can sanction the one and disapprove the other, or disapprove the one and sanction the other. By a subsequent clause in the constitution, authority is given to the President to fill vacancies occurring during the recess. No man can mistake the true meaning of that clause—vacancies which occur between session and session of Congress should be filled by the President; but he is bound to nominate to the Senate during the session succeeding such appointment; and to guard and limit this power, the commission expires with such session. Any other reading would invest the President with unlimited and uncontrollable power. Can we possibly mistake a text so plainly, so clearly expressed?

I have read to the Senate the clause in the constitution relating to this subject. I have said that no man could mistake the meaning. I beg leave to recant that expression. There is one class of men who may construe it differently: statesmen, they call themselves; but no more like statesmen of former times "than I to Hercules." They belong not to the earth, nor deal with it justly; they spurn the ground on which they walk. Following the lights of a bewildered imagination, they rush into speculations, and, in their mad career, trample under foot rights natural and chartered. The constitution presents no barrier in the way. Its language, however simple and plain, is construed into an ambiguous text to suit their ruinous designs. Every thing is too plain and simple for their vast minds. They go for splendor; and what does not glitter, is regarded as worthless. May heaven, in its goodness, relieve us from all the tribe. Sir, I take the simple, unambiguous language of the constitution as I find it. I will not inquire what it should be, but what it is, when I come to decide upon it. The wisdom of our illustrious ancestors framed it; and when I am asked to exchange it for the policy of the hour, I answer, nay. No matter by what circumstances I may be surrounded—abused, slandered, vilified, as much as my bitterest enemies may please—this shall be my answer: Every day's experience satisfies me, that, amidst all the turmoil and confusion of parties, the first post of safety is, to stand by the constitution; the second post of safety is, to stand by the constitution; and the last post of safety is, to stand by the constitution.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] cited, as matter of history, the nomination by the elder Adams, in 1799, of Mr. Smith, as minister to the Porte; for what purpose, I am at a loss to imagine. The appointment was made, but not accepted. In my conception, it operates disadvantageously to the recent proceeding.

When a boy, I learned that the elder Adams was the advocate of strong government. He had held up, by his writings, the British Government as the most stupendous fabric of human invention; and yet he deemed it his bounden duty to send no minister to Constantinople without previously submitting the nomination to the Senate. Was there any greater necessity for doing so in this instance than in that? The objects were the same. If it be said that secrecy was more necessary now than then, might not the message have enjoined secrecy? And is there any man here who would have betrayed his trust? But, sir, are the forms of the constitution to be disregarded, because the Executive may deem it proper to keep from the knowledge of the world its schemes of diplomacy? What is this but to make the Executive superior to the constitution?

With regard to the precedents relied upon in this debate, I have one answer for all of them; and it is, that, even if they were all in point, the constitution would remain unchanged. Shall we consecrate abuse? Shall we plead precedent to justify error? Is the legislation of Congress, or the action of the Executive Department, above the constitution? Shall the creature claim to control the creator? Pile precedent upon precedent until you make Ossa like a wart, and yet no sufficient justification is furnished for the Executive. Sir, I am willing to admit that these precedents may be urged, and I care not how successfully, in excuse of the President. They have misled others, and why not him? But in my opinion he has been misled; and it is my solemn duty to say so.

My colleague has anticipated the answer to all those cases, and it would be idle for me to tread upon the ground over which he has gone. They have no just application to the question now under discussion. Much stress is laid on the circumstance that treaties have been negotiated by the Secretary of State. Now, I do not mean to decide a question not before me, but I can well conceive a marked and strong difference between that case and this. The Secretary of State is an officer known to existing laws. He is nominated to, and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He is charged with the diplomatic relations of the country. With ministers near this Government, it is his duty to carry on correspondence. He is the true constitutional channel through which the sentiments of the President are made known to foreign nations; and I can see no great impropriety in the President's investing him with power to sign a treaty which the Secretary has himself negotiated, and to exchange its ratifications. But, sir, to make that case parallel with the present, imagine that the President commissions him as a minister to a foreign country, without any nomination to the Senate; or, suppose he appoints him Secretary of State, without the sanction or authority of the Senate; then a case like that under discussion arises; and the answer to both is the same—the constitution forbids it.

I have expressed to you candidly my own convictions upon this subject; many gentlemen will, no doubt, take opposite views from those I entertain. If so, I know how to tolerate differences of opinion between men. Such Senators will, no doubt, be actuated by as honest intentions as myself. For myself, the path of duty is straight, and I shall walk in it. Shall I displease the President by doing so? If I do, I cannot help it. But I claim to follow in the footsteps of his example; and bright and glorious is that example. When he exercised his veto over certain bills during the last session of Congress, he had my most unqualified applause. I have seen much in his career to applaud. The patriot who has shed his blood on the embattled plain in behalf of his country, will not hesitate to approve the effort which is made to change the constitution from the effect of an error into which he may have fallen. He ratifies no error of ours.

The two Houses of Congress, no doubt with solemn convictions of both its expediency and constitutionality, pass a bill, which, in his estimation, infringes on the constitution; with Roman firmness he forbids its becoming a law. Shall we rival this example, or shall we be less faithful to the trust confided to us? The different departments of the Government are intended to check each other. In the Legislature each branch has a check upon the other, and the President on both, while each has a check on him. We will do our duty, then, as becomes us.

It is, however, repeated, that it is now too late to object: we should have objected to ratifying the treaty. I had hoped not to have heard this argument repeated, after the conclusive answer which was given to it by my colleague. When a treaty is submitted to the Senate, the only question which properly arises is, merely, is it good, or is it bad? If the first, it should be ratified; if the last, rejected. The President is invested with full power to negotiate all treaties; and when he asks an appropriation to the ministers employed in negotiating it, the question then for the first time comes up as to the legality of their appointment. Here, then, is our reason for not having discussed this matter in secret session, apart from all others. But, furthermore, two alternatives were presented, and we had a right to exercise a sound discretion in choosing between them. We would obviously take that which would produce the slightest injury. Again, it is said that we have taken to ourselves the benefit of others' labor, and we ought to pay for it. No one denies it. It has never been denied. But I take it that there is a manifest difference between an application made by the Government, and one made by an individual. The one addresses itself to our obligations of duty, the other to our convictions of what may be just or equitable. To sanction the first, is to approve the course which the administration has pursued, and to sacrifice principle. To respond to the supplication of the individual, is to obey the suggestions of a benevolent policy. The error of Government we will not sanction, but we will redress to the man the injury which that error may have produced, but it must be on his private petition or application. The Secretary of State would then be heard as a mere witness in behalf of the applicant, not as an officer of Government making a requisition upon us. I care not, however, for the mere form in which this thing is done, provided the great principle be saved; and, before I take my seat, I shall move an amendment which will save that principle.

Why, then, should we have been goaded into opposition to the administration by a perseverance in a course which we cannot approve? Why presented to the public in an attitude which we earnestly desire to avoid? Is it a part of the policy of the times? Heretofore—for we have differed from the President but upon one question of importance—we acted then, as we do now, upon high principles. We deemed it then, as the constitutional advisers of the President, our imperious duty to differ from him in opinion. The principle involved was intimately connected with the freedom of the press; we deemed it as hazardous to make the press the prominent subject of Executive favor, as of Executive displeasure. The influence of money is more irresistible than that of force. In this country there is no danger from the last; but the first is the lever by which free systems are overturned. We rested upon the good sense of the public for our vindication, and folded our arms in silence. We thereby gave the most conclusive evidence of our desire for the President's success in the administration of the Government. What was our reward? Were we treated with ordinary civility? We were declared to be in opposition to the administration. Hard names were bestowed upon us; abuse copiously poured out on our heads; our motives assailed and misrepresented; our designs represented as dark and evil. This language has been persisted in for the last twelve months. Cui bono? For the good of the President, or of the party to which we belong? Is this the way to attach high-minded men to any cause? Human nature, speaking almost audibly from the heart of all, answers in the negative. A new discovery was made. My colleague was represented as an old federalist, the moment he gave a vote consecrated, as I verily believe it to be, to the purest republicanism. The history of his life, exhibiting him as it did, reared in the very arms of democracy, was not sufficient to protect him. The circumstance of his being an actor in the spirit-stirring crisis of 1798-'9; of the part which he bore in that session of Congress which witnessed the retirement of the elder Adams from the Presidency; of the uniform consistency of his life in adhering to the governmental doctrines with which he set out; of the distinguished part which he bore in the late arduous struggle; nothing was sufficient to protect him from this charge, or shield him from the bitterness of these hostile attacks. For myself, I had nothing but a conscious integrity to plead in my behalf, and that availed me as little as the services of my colleague availed him. Our own constituents urged no complaint; on the contrary, I seriously declare that I have scarcely seen the man within the broad limits of Virginia, who did not approve our course. To use the language of one of her citizens, that "interrified" commonwealth can never be operated on by causeless clamor. None of these attacks were made from thence, or from any part of the South. Nor did any come from the West. From whence then did they proceed? They came from the North, and in all their violence from one particular State. "Call you this backing of your friends?" Is this the mode to consolidate a party? It is a modern discovery, and unknown heretofore to the world. We could not justify it to ourselves, then, Mr. President, to remain silent on this new occasion on which we are compelled to differ from the administration. Our opinions and our arguments will go to our constituents, and I fear not the result of the verdict they will return.

This has been called a mere question of power between the Senate and the President. Sir, it is a question whether the constitution is supreme, and binding upon all. But if we were now forming the Government, I would add to the power of the President not even so much as would turn the scales by the hundredth part of a hair. There is already enough of the spice of monarchy in the Presidential office. There lies the true danger to our institutions. It has already become the great magnet of attraction. The struggles to attain it are destined to enlist all the worst passions of our nature. It is the true Pandora's box. Place in the President's hands the key to the door of the treasury, by conferring on him the uncontrolled power of appointing to office, and liberty cannot abide among us. In the language of Lord Chatham, this would be to inflict the irremediable vulnus. "Not poppy, or mandragora, or all the drowsy sirups of the world, could medicine" us "to that sweet peace" which we should thereby lose. No, sir; the glittering diadem is already studded with jewels, and ambition evermore urges its votaries to clutch it. What would it not be if you adorn it with blazing diamonds?

If, then, we stand alone, we shall oppose the principle which has now been carried into practice. It would be a proud distinction; but this will not be our fate. Indications have already been given of a contrary character, and I hail them as a sure augury of success.

In conclusion, Mr. TYLER offered the following proviso, by way of amendment to Mr. KANE's proposition:

"Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as sanctioning, or in any way approving, the appointment of these persons, by the President alone, during the recess of the Senate, and without their advice and consent, as commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Ottoman Porte."

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, next rose, and observed, that, when he had taken his seat that morning, he had entertained but little expectation that he should have entered into the discussion of the subject then under consideration; but, unprepared as he was, the extraordinary course which it had taken had induced him to depart from that determination, and to claim the indulgence of the Senate, succinctly to present his views in opposition to the motion which proposed to strike out the appropriation making compensation to the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty of commerce with the Turkish Government. He objected also to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] because its adoption would, in effect, as he conceived, charge the Executive with a violation of the constitution, by the appointment of commissioners to treat with the Turkish Government without the sanction of the Senate—a censure, which he deemed not only uncalled for, but wholly unmerited: uncalled for, because the present was not a fit occasion to express it, if at all deserved; unmerited, because, in his opinion, the exercise of the power by the Executive was in pursuance of the constitutional authority, which appropriately belonged to that department of our Government.

We had, in substance, been told, if the Senate sanctions this proceeding, by voting for the appropriation, without protesting against the alleged usurpation, that the dignity of this body will be impaired, and that it will be surrendering one of our most important powers to the Executive branch of the Government. He claimed the right to interpret the provisions of the constitution for himself, and could not admit that it had been confided to the exclusive guardianship of any particular members of that body. Nor could he permit himself to doubt that all, when in their opinion the occasion called for it, would unite in repelling any attempt, from any quarter, which was in derogation of the authority and character of that branch of the Government.

The honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] who has just addressed the Senate, and whose eloquence is always heard with pleasure and attention, had remarked, that he represented a State whose stern independence could not be brought to pay homage to power, and the frankness of whose citizens would not permit them to characterize acts but by their proper names; and if his colleague and himself had called the power which the President of the United States had exerted, by the appointment of commissioners to negotiate a treaty of commerce with the Ottoman Porte, a lawless and unconstitutional exercise of power, that it was because they had been accustomed to speak in the language of frankness and sincerity. Sir, said Mr. B., I cheerfully subscribe to the honorable mention which the gentleman has made of the State of Virginia: her past history is rich in the renown of her distinguished warriors and statesmen: she has, on all occasions, been ready to assist in vindicating the character of the nation from foreign insult, and has warned, with a prophetic voice, her sister States against the dangerous and insidious encroachments of the Federal Government on their rights, which were so well calculated to destroy the beauty and harmony of our admirable system of Government; but I must be permitted to remark, said Mr. B., that I cannot discover any thing in this act of the President, calculated to alarm the fears of those most devoted to a rigid construction of the constitution, of which number he professed to be one.

He would now proceed briefly to examine the transaction which had been so severely animadverted upon. The facts connected with it were briefly these, and had already been ably discussed by the gentleman from Louisiana. When the present administration entered on the discharge of its public duties, it found that the preceding administration had appointed confidential agents to ascertain if a treaty could not be made with the Turkish Government, and to effect that object if it could be done. This mission having failed to accomplish its purpose, and one of the commissioners appointed under the late administration having returned to the United States, the President, anxious to open new and lucrative channels of trade to the commercial enterprise of our citizens, appointed Mr. Rhind and Captain Biddle, in conjunction with Mr. Offley, to effect, if practicable, that which the late administration had failed to do. To this it was objected, that it was an assumption of power, in violation of that provision of the constitution which declares that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law," &c. He readily conceded that the President could not constitutionally appoint a "public minister" or "ambassador," without first consulting the Senate, and their concurrence had in the appointment, unless to fill up a vacancy which had occurred in the recess of the Senate. But in the appointment then under consideration, in which the Executive had appointed mere confidential agents, he thought he could perceive an obvious distinction. They had been appointed for a special, designated purpose, not clothed with the usual powers of public ministers, unprotected by the immunities and privileges which, by the law of nations, were extended to that class of ministers contemplated by the constitution. Where, then, was the infringement of the constitution, which had been so much reprobated? By that instrument, the management of our foreign relations was peculiarly confided to the Executive Department of the Government. The power of appointing confidential agents to confer and treat with foreign Powers in relation to commerce, was fairly deducible from this duty imposed by the constitution on the President. It was unreasonable to suppose that, when a duty was required of an officer of the Government by the constitution, it withheld from him the power to employ the necessary means for its accomplishment. Nor would its exercise be attended with the calamitous consequences which we had heard so much deprecated. It could not, in any case, unite us, either by a commercial or political connexion, with foreign nations, without the previous consent of that body, as the concurrent authority of the Senate in the ratification of treaties would always interpose an effectual barrier against acts of Executive indiscretion, or schemes of ambition. Nor would the rejection of a treaty by the Senate, thus negotiated, have a tendency to embroil us with foreign nations, as had been argued; for every Government with whom we may have diplomatic relations, either is, or is supposed to be, cognizant of the treaty-making power under our Government; and a refusal by the Senate to ratify a treaty could not afford any just ground of complaint or hostility against us.

Passing from the arguments fairly to be derived from a proper construction of the constitution, what, he would ask, had been the usage of almost every administration, as he believed, from the origin of our Government down to that period? He confessed that he attached but little weight to precedents, unless they were sanctioned by long and uninterrupted practice, and were authorized by a fair construction of the constitution. The practice of appointing commissioners of a similar character with those who had been commissioned to negotiate with Turkey, had commenced with General Washington; he had, in the early part of his administration, appointed commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace with the Dey of Algiers, without a previous nomination to the Senate. Subsequently, Mr. Jefferson had appointed commissioners to treat with the Tripolitan Government; and, in 1808, he commissioned Mr. Short as minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. Petersburg, in the recess of the Senate, which was not to fill a vacancy, as the United States had not before been represented by a public minister at that court. Much as he revered the memory of Mr. Jefferson, whose great and invaluable services to his country, as a statesman, had not, in his opinion, been surpassed by any of his contemporaries, yet he did not believe that the Executive power was, by a proper construction of the constitution, competent to commission a public minister, without the advice and consent of the Senate, unless to fill a vacancy which happens in the recess. This instance has been adduced of the exercise of the appointing power by President Jefferson, to show the great diversity of opinion which had heretofore existed among the most eminent patriots and statesmen, in relation to its extent, and not that he considered it at all analogous to the present case. It showed that a power much higher and much more questionable had been exerted under an administration deservedly eulogized for its almost uniform adherence to a limited construction of the powers of the General Government.

The two first cases to which he had adverted, showing the exercise of the same power in the early administration of our country, had occurred, it is true, when a state of war existed between this country and those to whom commissioners were deputed to treat. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] had maintained the proposition that the President could rightfully exert this power in a state of war, though not in a time of peace, for the reason that the object for which war is carried on is the attainment of peace; and that the President may institute a mission without consulting the Senate to effect that end. Mr. B. said he could not yield his assent to this argument; for if the President was vested with authority to appoint commissioners in time of war, it followed as a consequence that he could exert the same power in time of peace. When public functionaries look to the constitution for a warrant for the exercise of power, it was an admitted rule of construction, where a provision of that instrument expressly conferred powers, as in that before quoted by him, which gives to the President the power of appointing ambassadors and other public ministers, with the advice and consent of the Senate, "and to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session," that resort could not be had to any other clause to enlarge that power by implication; and the clause expressly conferring the power could alone be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the true extent of the authority granted. The constitution did not vary with the circumstances of peace or war; it did not hold different language on different occasions. He had been taught to believe that the principles of that instrument were fixed and inflexible, and did not bend to any emergency, however pressing, or any necessity, however high.

Mr. B. said he would now proceed to examine the analogy which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] had endeavored to trace, and, as he thought, unsuccessfully, between the principles avowed in President Adams's message in relation to the Panama mission, and the case then under discussion. The gentleman who had preceded him in this debate, had reiterated the same objection, and had read extracts from the speeches of some of the members of the present cabinet, to show that their course, on that occasion, when members of the Senate, was wholly irreconcilable with the course which the Executive had pursued, in appointing commissioners to treat with the Turkish Government. Mr. B. said, without commenting on the essential distinction, in many respects, between the characters of the ministers which President Adams had asserted his power to commission to attend the Congress of Panama, and the commissioners appointed to treat with Turkey, he would ask permission to read a part of the speech delivered in the Senate by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] on the memorable discussion in relation to the Panama mission. After commenting on the case, in which General Washington had appointed commissioners to treat for peace with the Dey of Algiers, he proceeded as follows: "The next remark I shall make upon it is, that, even according to the representation given of it, it was the case of an agent sent to a barbarian people, who were not then, and have never since been, recognised as forming any component part of the family of civilized nations. Let me not be told that the constitutional power of the President is the same, whether exerted in reference to a savage or civilized nation. We all know that this is not so. No appointment of a minister, who has ever been employed to negotiate for peace, or for any thing else, with any Indian tribe, whether dwelling within or without our territory, whether Osage or Seminole, has ever been laid before the Senate for their consent. They are all considered as agents of the President, and not public ministers of the people; and all our intercourse with barbarians must, of necessity, present anomalies, from which no principles can be inferred. I will not go into reasoning to show why this must and ought to be so, although it would be easy to show it. I merely state the fact, which is conclusive, to prove that the case of a mission to Algiers, or to the Choctaws, can never be a precedent to justify a mission to Panama." Mr. B. said, that in the remarks which he had read from the speech of the Senator from Virginia, he thought the distinction which he had taken between the case of the Panama mission and the one in question was fully sustained, and that it was clearly conceded that the President could, constitutionally, appoint agents to negotiate with a barbarian nation, without the previous consent of the Senate. He would ask, where was the distinction as to the power to send a mission to the then existing Government of Algiers, and that sent, under the present administration, to the Turkish Government? If the principle holds good in the one case, it appeared to do so equally in the other. If the President can exercise the power in reference to any one nation of people, whether savage or otherwise, it appeared to him to follow plainly that he could do so in reference to all, as the constitution did not vary the power of the President to appoint commissioners to treat with foreign nations, according to their degrees of barbarism or civilization, but afforded a fixed rule as to the power of the President, applicable to nations of every condition.

Mr. B. said he had heard with a degree of surprise which he could not conceal, in the course of this debate, an attempt to discriminate between the Chief Magistrate and his cabinet advisers, attributing all responsibility to them in relation to the Turkish treaty. This was, indeed, a novel doctrine in this country, and one which he would venture to say was not in accordance with the theory of our Government. The doctrine of Executive infallibility was unknown to our form of Government; the President was alone responsible for his official acts to the people of the United States, and, he believed, would never seek to escape responsibility in the discharge of his public duties: he must, therefore, be permitted to say that he did not think the remark of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] was to be received as a very flattering compliment to the President, when he expressed his perfect confidence in the honesty of his intentions, but believed that he had been deceived by his ministers, who were supposed to have advised him to this course. It was a compliment to the heart at the expense of the head; and he would add, that the course of the President since he had filled the station which he then occupied, had not only been honest, but, in his opinion, marked by an enlightened policy, deserving the approbation of the American people. Mr. B. said that he did not stand there as the apologist of the President of the United States; and while in the exercise of his duties as a member of that body, he should never shrink from the freest examination and inquiry into the conduct of public officers, he should at the same time feel it equally his duty to give a fair and liberal support to the administration, when their measures were, in his estimation, conducive to the public interests. He believed that a candid review of the course pursued by the Chief Magistrate of the Union, since his elevation to that station, would triumphantly acquit him of a disposition to assume powers not delegated to him under the constitution. He had, at the last session of Congress, given a decisive proof of his determination to preserve the constitution, so far as it depended on his authority, by refusing to sanction large and extravagant appropriations of the public money to objects unauthorized by the powers granted to the General Government, and more recently in the course which had been pursued towards the State authorities in relation to the Indian tribes; and the principles avowed in the President's message on that subject were gratifying proofs that the reserved rights of the States of this confederacy would be respected under this administration, and the action of the General Government restrained within its appropriate sphere. Mr. B. concluded his remarks by expressing his thanks for the indulgence which had been extended to him.

Mr. TAZEWELL again rose in reply to Mr. LIVINGSTON. The honorable Senator from Louisiana, said Mr. T., has again undertaken to chide me for the unmeasured language in which I have described the act of the Executive, concerning which I spoke when I last addressed the Senate. I can readily conceive that the strong terms I employed to characterize this transaction may not be very familiar to the fastidiousness of courts or palaces; where the dulcet sounds of approbation and admiration only are commonly heard. But as my words denote precisely the opinions I desired to communicate to those I addressed, and were merely the abbreviation of the conclusions to which I thought I had entitled myself, by the arguments I had used, I was not aware that I had violated any rule of etiquette here, in thus summing up the reasoning upon the subject; I had proved, at least to my own satisfaction, that the constitution furnished no authority to the President for what he had done; therefore, I felt myself justified in speaking of this act as unconstitutional, and as lawless. If such is its true character, all must concede that a power exerted by a President without warrant or constitutional grant is a usurpation on his part; and as such a usurpation in this case was a direct and plain infringement of the privileges of the Senate, it must be a gross violation of the constitution, in flagrant derogation of the rights of this body. To the Senate I certainly owe no apology for the earnest appeal I made to them, to induce them to vindicate their violated rights, to prove themselves faithful depositaries of the trusts confided to them by the constitution, and never, by a refusal to assert their privileges, to countenance the idea that they could be guilty of a base surrender of the rights conferred upon them by the States they represent, which rights so conferred are in truth but duties imposed by our constituents for their own wise purposes. This would be a dereliction of duty on our part, which, however much it may be desired by any other department of the Government, could scarcely find justification or apology here or elsewhere.

In expressing these strong opinions, I certainly neither measured nor weighed the force of the language necessary to convey them. But if this or any other honorable Senator would have been pleased to furnish me with the proper courtly phrases in which I might have communicated my thoughts, I would willingly have adopted them, provided they would have expressed my opinions with equal precision. I doubt much, however, whether I should have escaped the censure of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, if I had borrowed my terms even from his own works, or from the precedents furnished by the speeches of some of those by whom the President is now surrounded, which speeches were delivered by them during the Panama debate. President Jefferson, now so much eulogized by this honorable Senator, was not always regarded by him, I believe, as entitled to such encomia. One at least of the acts of this President was characterized by this Senator in language as unqualified as any I have used; and a reference to the speeches to which I have alluded will furnish many examples of much stronger phrases than any I have employed, and this too in relation to the same subject. These terms were then applied, however, to the assertions of President Adams; and I have spoken of the acts of President Jackson, et tempora mutantur, although the constitution remains the same.

But, sir, let no one think that I mean to justify or even to excuse what I have said, by the examples of others, or even of the President himself. My justification is, that whatever I have said, I thought; and that which I think of the public acts of public men, I feel myself at perfect liberty to speak here, whenever a proper occasion arises so to do. In this case, I neither sought nor made the occasion. I would have avoided it if I could. But the President has chosen to present his application to this body, asking us to appropriate the money of our constituents to redeem his pledge of the public faith, plighted without our sanction or any constitutional warrant, and I am so called upon to approve the act. Forced thus to inquire into the character of that which has been done, I am constrained to speak of it as I think it merits. I have done so, and, in so doing, have done but what my duty required.

Mr. President, this debate has taken the precise course which I foresaw it would take. The advocates of this appropriation, instead of meeting or controverting any position I have maintained in reference to the proper construction of the constitution, have endeavored to justify what has been done by the precedents they cite, and the practice they wish to show to have been settled. The Senator from Louisiana alone has expressed any doubt as to the correctness of the interpretation which I have given of the constitution. At first, this doubt was rested upon an inversion and transposition of the terms used in the instrument.* This attempt, however, seems to be abandoned by him; and he now seeks to attain the same object, by inserting a stop where there is none. To this new process for changing the meaning of its provisions, I have no other answer to give than this—blot out all the stops, and both the learned and unlearned will replace them as they now are, because they will still concur in reading the instrument as I have read it, and in construing its language as I have construed it. According to this construction, I repeat, the President alone may nominate, but, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, only, can appoint to any office; and when vacancies happen during the recess of the Senate, the President alone may fill up such vacancies, by temporary commissions only. Here I will leave this suggested doubt, confident that it will never ripen into certainty any where, but in some hot-bed prepared to force its growth unnaturally.

The Senator from Louisiana next draws a distinction between the power of the President to make treaties, and his power to make appointments to office. This distinction he seeks to support by a reference to the precedents he has cited. This distinction is certainly new. If to be sustained at all, it must be by the force of the precedents only, for the words of the constitution as explicitly restrain the one power as they do the other, and in precisely the same mode. Each of these powers is given to the President; but, in the very grant itself, they are both required to be exercised by him, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" only; and the only difference between them is, that, in making treaties, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, and, in making appointments, the concurrence of a majority only is required. Then, is it not strange, that, in the very case where the constitution imposes the strongest restraint, it should be contended that none exists; and yet should be admitted that, in the other case, the restraint is effectual, although this restraint is imposed by the same words repeated in the very next member of the same sentence?

But, sir, how are treaties to be negotiated? Certainly by some officer of the Government; and this, whether they are negotiated at home or abroad. For it is asking of us too much, when we are required to admit that he who has the commission of the Government, which commission is signed by its Chief Magistrate, authenticated by its great seal, and wherein is expressed, that, in consideration of the high confidence reposed in him, authority is thereby given by him to pledge our faith and honor, is not an officer of the United States. So that the question still recurs, can the President alone, without the advice and consent of the Senate, create such an office? I say create such an office; for when the commission is granted to negotiate a treaty abroad, with a nation at whose court we have never had any representative, the office is created: for, as I have shown, there is no pretext for saying that such an office is then vacant, or that the President, in making the appointment to it, is merely filling up a vacancy, and a vacancy which has happened, too, during the recess of the Senate. Now the Senator from Louisiana admits that the President alone cannot make an original appointment to any office. What, then, becomes of his distinction between the power of the President to make treaties, and his power to make appointments, in all cases where, to make a treaty, it is necessary to make an original appointment?

Sir, the precedents may be searched from the birth of this Government to the day of the date of the Turkish treaty, and but few cases will be found of a treaty negotiated by any other than a diplomatic officer of the United States, whose appointment, if an original appointment, had not been made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The few cases existing, in which this does not appear, are either cases occurring, "flagrante bello," with the Power treated with, or cases of compacts entered into with piratical hordes or savage tribes, the dependents or tributaries of your own, or of some other sovereignty. All the precedents referred to by the Senator from Louisiana are of this description. These precedents, therefore, do not touch or apply to the question I have discussed, and which is presented in this case, unless we are prepared to say that the principles of war justify the practice of peace, or that the usages which necessity requires to be adopted in our intercourse with barbarian Powers and dependent States, constitute the rule which ought to regulate our intercourse with the oldest, and most solemnly and most universally recognized sovereignties on earth.

Even this the Senator from Louisiana would have us to do, for he ridicules my ideas that the existence of war gives to the President power that he may not rightfully claim in peace; or that there is any difference between the piratical Barbary hordes and the Ottoman empire. Now, suppose I should even admit that the distinction which I drew between the cases of war and peace was without any just foundation, is it fair to infer the general rule of peace from the exception of war? Or is it wise or safe to contend, that what is acquiesced in without murmur, during the storm of war, is therefore right, and may be properly repeated in the calm and "piping time of peace." I pray the Senate to think well of the consequences which may and must result if they sanction such doctrine as this.

Peace gives the rule, and war the exception to it. Nor is it of little consequence to the present argument, whether the exception be de jure or de facto only. It is but an exception in either case; and we reason erroneously when we seek to find the rule in the exception to it. But if it be conceded that the exception exists de jure, and is established by the constitution itself as an exception, then this exception proves the general rule to be different. Now, I contend that the exception does exist de jure; and that in war the President may lawfully negotiate a treaty of peace with the enemy, when, where, and how he pleases, and by the intervention of whomsoever he thinks proper to employ for that purpose. I prove it thus:

The legitimate object of all war is peace. To attain this desirable end whenever war exists, the constitution gives to the Executive every lawful means for its accomplishment. Hence, he may lawfully order, and by his subordinates effect, the burning of towns, the sacking of cities, the devastation of the enemy's country, and the slaughter of its inhabitants; for, alas! sad experience has taught mankind, that such are the necessary means by which alone most commonly war can be terminated, and the desirable end of peace attained. Now, surely, if the Executive may lawfully do all this for such an object, he may attain the same required end by other means less destructive, and more consonant to the dictates of humanity. If he may lawfully negotiate for peace by blood and carnage, may he not negotiate for the same object by argument and persuasion? It is true you call the one battle and bloodshed, and the other negotiation, yet each of them is but a means for the accomplishment of peace, the great and only justifiable end of all war; which end it is the bounden duty of the Executive to effect by all proper means, whenever war exists. And what at last is this treaty of peace, until it is ratified by the proper authority, that is to say, until, in this country, its ratification has received the advice and consent of the Senate? It is little else than a mere armistice. Now, none can doubt that the Executive may lawfully conclude an armistice when, where, and how he pleases, and this under his general power to conduct the existing war in that mode which, in his discretion, peace, its only justifiable end, seems to require.

Here, then, is one answer to all the precedents cited by the Senator from Louisiana, of treaties made with the Barbary Powers during the administration of our two first Presidents. At the time all these treaties were negotiated, war existed between these Powers and the United States. Moreover, two of these treaties (being all of this description that were concluded during the administration of Washington) were concluded by Mr. Humphreys, an acknowledged diplomatic officer of the United States, who had been previously and regularly appointed our minister to Portugal, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In concluding these treaties, too, Mr. Humphreys acted in pursuance of the instructions he had received, the substance of which instructions had been previously submitted by the President to the Senate, and had received their approbation so far back as the 8th of May, 1792, as our journals show. These cases, then, are but cases of treaties made by a proper officer of the United States, whose appointment and whose instructions had previously received the confirmation of the Senate. As to the mere internuncii employed by Mr. Humphreys himself in his intercourse with the Barbary Powers, and who acted under appointments from him, and not from the President, I presume it cannot be necessary for me to say a single word. Doubtless, the minister might employ what messengers, interpreters, or subagents, he thought necessary, and the obligation of the instrument, put into form by them before it received his assent, could neither be strengthened nor weakened by their signature, whether it was vanity or necessity that subscribed it.

The same answer will equally apply to the cases of the treaties afterwards concluded with some of these same Powers during the administration of President Madison. War again existed between the United States and these Powers, when these treaties, too, were concluded. Nay, such is the capricious and rapacious character of these corsairs, and such their ignorance or contempt of the provisions of the public law, and the usages of civilized nations, that it is difficult to determine when war does not exist with them. It is this very circumstance which constitutes one of the great causes why your intercourse with them always has, and always must produce many anomalies, from which no principle or rule can properly be deduced. But if I wanted an apt illustration of the truth of my position, that the power of conducting a war necessarily includes the power of concluding it by negotiating for peace, I should find it in the circumstances attending one of these very treaties. The gallant Decatur had just captured the Algerine squadron. Hastening from the scene of his conquest, he presented his victorious fleet before the port of Algiers, ready to fire upon the city, and to lay it in ashes, if necessary. To save themselves from the imminent danger, and to gain time for preparation, the enemy wished to parley, professing a wish to negotiate a peace. His answer to their proposition was, "Here are the only terms of peace I can accept. Sign and ratify this treaty, and our nations are friends again; reject it, and I must do my duty. I give you two hours to decide." Within the time prescribed, the treaty was returned, duly executed on their part; and hence was concluded, on board of his own flag ship, the United States' ship Guerriere. Now, sir, will any one say that, in thus acting, this hero violated any precept of the constitution of his country? And, if not, it surely cannot be pretended that the President could so offend, by authorizing that to be done, which, when done in pursuance of his orders, was rightfully done. Yet, if rightfully done, war must give power to the Executive that in peace is forbidden.

Again: Is it correct to say that there is no difference between the piratical hordes of Algiers, and Tunis, and Tripoli, the professed tributaries and acknowledged dependents of the Sublime Porte, and the Ottoman empire itself? This is an assertion which I confess I did not expect to have heard made in the Senate of the United States. My historical recollections do not deceive me, I think, when they lead me to say that the Ottoman Government is now the oldest in the world. While every other known Government has been oftentimes changed, destroyed, and reconstructed, that simple despotism, sustained as it is, alike by religion and by force, has ever remained unaltered from its creation, now nearly twelve centuries ago, until this hour. Before the discovery of America by Columbus, the seat of the Turkish empire was fixed where it now is, at Constantinople; and never since has that capital been profaned by the presence of any foreign foe. Almost two hundred and fifty years ago, all Europe trembled at its onward march; and the most powerful of European sovereigns fled from the smoking ruins of his capital, Vienna, to escape this enemy. Much more than a century since, Bender, one of its distant provincial towns, offered a safe asylum to the unfortunate Swedish monarch, when flying from the disastrous field of Pultowa; and Turkish faith and Turkish power would never permit that asylum to be violated. Deprived since of some of its domain, by the Russian arms, it nevertheless still ranks as one among the principal Powers of the world, having been always recognised and always respected as an independent and great nation by every State in christendom. It does not seem very becoming in us, almost the youngest of the great family of nations, to wish to degrade this ancient and powerful sovereignty, not less remarkable for the proud simplicity, than for the strict honor and fidelity of its character, (and this, too, at the moment when we have just concluded our first treaty with it,) by comparing it with its own tributary dependents, whose piratical pursuits, and open contempt of all the usages of civilized States, have ever prevented every Power from recognising any of them as an equal sovereignty, or trusting among them any other representative than an humble consul. As well might we compare the Russian Government with some wretched band of Esquimaux, or horde of fierce Tartars, dwelling within its limits; or the Government of the United States with the Cherokee nation, or the tribe of Winnebagoes, dwelling within ours.

It is strange, too, that this assertion should be hazarded now, when it is proposed by the very amendment before us to appropriate a sum of money for the new mission to the Sublime Porte, which sum far exceeds in amount the aggregate of all the sums proposed to be appropriated for our missions to Russia, to France, and to Great Britain. To justify this appropriation, a list of the foreign ministers of the different nations of Europe, now accredited at the Turkish court, is sent to us, which list presents a diplomatic corps that, in rank, in the number of States represented, and in the compensation granted to these ministers, far exceeds any such corps assembled at any other court in the world! Yet, sir, that nation, at whose court princes or noblemen of high rank have not felt degraded to appear as ministers, and whose sovereigns intend to honor them by such appointments, is in the Senate of the United States to be sunk to the level of its own tributaries, to whose castles none other than a consul has ever been sent, and this for the most obvious reasons.

The case of treaties concluded here by a Secretary of State, the Senate must at once perceive, touches not the question I have presented. No one can doubt that he is an officer of the United States, who being charged by the law of his creation with the superintendence of all the foreign relations of the country, may very properly be instructed by the President to negotiate a treaty here. In his case, the power given to him has no other effect than to charge the old office with a new and very proper duty. It creates no new office in him, as we all know; for although we have heard of pay for constructive journeys never performed, yet even the persons who thought themselves entitled to such compensation, have never presumed to ask for constructive "outfit and salary" for the performance of this new duty merely. It would be absurd, too, to say that the full power given to the Secretary of State to negotiate a treaty here, could entitle him to any of the privileges and immunities accorded by the public law to such as are sent abroad with such a power. It is this, at last, that constitutes the true test whereby to ascertain whether the agent appointed to negotiate a treaty is an officer of the United States, in virtue of such an appointment. For as the immunities conceded by the public law are official privileges merely, he who acquires none such in virtue of his appointment to negotiate a treaty, is not thereby made an officer. But whosoever the appointment is designed to draw after it pay at home, and immunity abroad, then it creates office. Now such is the case of these commissioners; and such never was the case of any Secretary of State.

I have to notice but a single other argument of the Senator from Louisiana. He tells us that this was not a new mission, for it had been previously established by the last President in the appointments of Messrs. Crane and Offley, made by him in like manner, and for the same purposes with the present. Sir, from this day forward, let us not repeat the phrase and promise of "reforming the abuses which had crept into this Government." It is high time we should drop it, when honorable Senators think they justify a violation of the constitution by the present Executive, by regarding it as a mere continuation of the usurped authority of his predecessor. The question we have to decide is, whether the constitution authorizes the President to create a new office, without the advice and consent of the Senate, by instituting a mission to a nation with which we never before had established any political connexion or diplomatic relation. In answering this question, it is gravely said that the present President has not done so, because such a mission was secretly and ineffectually attempted to be established by his predecessor; and this secret and vain effort to strip the Senate of their highest privilege at that time, sanctifies and justifies the actual deed afterwards done. Much better would it be to say at once, that because President Adams publicly proclaimed in the Panama message that such a power was "within the constitutional competency of the Executive," therefore it must be so. But as this argument would scarcely find favor any where now, it is deemed better to rely upon the secret and ineffectual attempt, rather than upon the open and avowed opinion of this President. When President Adams publicly announced this opinion, its correctness was as publicly denied and controverted here; and surely his hidden acts, which could not be censured, because they were not known, are even of less weight as authority than his declared opinions. What may be the weight and authority of his opinions upon this subject now, I know not, but I well know how they were regarded by some formerly; and at the very time, too, when this act of his was secretly done. My opinions upon this subject then coincided with those entertained by others to whom I have alluded, and mine certainly have undergone no change since.

Mr. LIVINGSTON again rose. Both the Senators from Virginia, said Mr. L., have thought it extraordinary that any observations should have been made on the terms in which it was deemed proper to stigmatize the conduct of the President of the United States, and by anticipation that of those who should support him—terms which they say the occasion justified, and which the frank, independent discharge of duty required. They are inspired, they say, by the genial warmth of their Southern sun, and accustomed by the habits of their country to call things by their names; and when they see usurpation, they must call it by that name. And the gentleman who last addressed you [Mr. TAZEWELL] has requested me to furnish him with a courtly phrase (so I think he called it) that should express his idea without offence. Far be it from me! Far from me the presumption of endeavoring to restrain the noble spirit of independent zeal that animates those who make the accusation, fostered as it is by the influence of climate, and strengthened by habits of freedom of speech. Far from me the vanity of thinking that any phrase that I could offer would be so acceptable as those which the Senator's duty required, and his sense of propriety has sanctioned. I am as little conversant with courts as either of the Senators. I, too, am a republican; I, too, though not born under a Southern sun, am in the habit of boldly expressing my thoughts; and when I hear charges of the most serious nature that can be made, expressed in the most unqualified language, and I think those charges unfounded, I must take the liberty to say so. Yes, sir, and the more unacceptable liberty of proving it, as I trust I have done. Though words are things, they are not the words of the accusation that I blame; it is the groundless accusation itself. It is the intolerant denunciation of all who cannot see unconstitutionality or usurpation in the acts complained of. I said, sir, that the objections now raised were new; that for the first time this charge had been made against a practice and a construction that was as old as the Government itself. This is denied; and the debates on the Panama mission are referred to. Sir, I anticipated this objection, and have shown that the objections then were two, to the nature of the mission to take part in the debates of a deliberative assembly; and to an appointment of a public minister on a new mission without consulting the Senate: and I am warranted in repeating that the present accusation proceeds from a new light, that never before shone on the mind of any of our predecessors; but, admit the Panama debate to be an exception, it is but as of yesterday, compared with the sanctions of the contrary practice.

My construction of the constitution, as to the power of appointing in the recess, is discarded with the single observation, that it is bottomed on an assumed transposition of words in the clause. Not so. It stands on stronger grounds. The evident intent of the framers of the constitution—the contemporaneous exposition; the uninterrupted and unquestioned practice. The force of that practice, in its several divisions, has been attempted to be weakened: 1. As to the treaties made by the Secretary of State, by saying, as is most undoubtedly true, but is most fatal to their argument, that they were made under the powers which the President has to make treaties. Sir, that is the very power to which we refer to justify the appointment of the commissioners. Ay, but say the gentlemen, he may appoint the Secretary of State, but not commissioners. Why? Because he is Secretary of State; and they are commissioners. This may be a satisfactory argument to those who use it; but I must be permitted to think and to say, that it appears rather inconclusive. The Secretary of State has the management, ex officio, of our foreign negotiations, under the direction of the President; but without that direction, in the form of a plenipotentiary commission, he has no right to make a treaty. Such a commission is always delivered to him when he is directed to enter into or negotiate any compact with a foreign minister. It is made out in form—and from it he derives his sole authority—just as in the case of Mr. Humphreys, which I quoted in the beginning of this debate. He was a minister plenipotentiary to Portugal; but a negotiation with Algiers was desired, and he was authorized, by a new commission, as formal in all respects as that by which he was appointed to Portugal—yet he was nominated to the Senate as minister to Portugal—but not to Algiers. Why? Because the first was a permanent, the last only a temporary appointment. Because, in the first, he was a public minister—in the last, only a secret agent with full powers. Because the President had a right to give what character he chose to his agents, and chose to call him in one a public minister, and nominate him as such; and, for satisfactory reasons made him in the other, his mission to Algiers, a commissioner, with full powers, and did not nominate him. But, to put an end to all cavil, on the ground that the appointment of the Secretary of State as a plenipotentiary was not to be governed by the same rules that apply to the appointment of other persons, let us suppose the strong case of a law declaring that, in all treaties with foreign Powers made in the United States, the Secretary of State should be the person employed to make them; would the President's constitutional right to make treaties and name agents to make them be affected by such a law? Could the Secretary of State under it, without a special commission, make any treaty? And if he were nominated to the Senate to perform that duty, would not they, notwithstanding the law, have a right to reject him? The law cannot control the constitution. The office of Secretary is created by the law of Congress—that of minister, by the law of nations. The appointment of one is regulated by law—that of the other, by the constitution: therefore, no law can control the powers of the President or the Senate; and the Secretary cannot be a minister, but by virtue of a special appointment. That special appointment has been uniformly given by the President, without, in a single instance, submitting it to the Senate; and the unquestioned practice proves that temporary appointments of commissioners may rightfully be made without nominating them to the Senate. It has been uniformly done in negotiations at home, and, if I understand both gentlemen, rightfully done; but, without the slightest reason for the distinction, they say it cannot be done abroad. But when I take the laboring oar, and show the same uniform practice in missions abroad, how is it repelled?

First, in case of plenipotentiaries to treat of peace. This is ushered in by an encomium from the Senator who last addressed you on the diplomatic law of nations, and he lauds it particularly for a character which I never before heard attributed to it—its great certainty and precision. I had thought that, on the contrary, there was much contrariety of opinions as to many of its provisions; that, as it was made up of usages, treaties, and the changing opinions of writers, it was not only uncertain from its nature, but that the principles most generally acknowledged were undergoing a daily change, with the advancement of civilization, and the new political arrangements of the world. I thought so—but this was owing to my ignorance, for the Senator tells you that although it may appear to be the case to superficial observers, the order and beauty, and, above all, the certainty of the system, open themselves to those who are proficient in the science. I am not advanced to this degree of perfection; the Senator is; and to what truths in the system is this encomium the prologue? What are the certain maxims he has found applicable to the present case, in the precise pages of this law? First, a confirmation of his former assertion, that plenipotentiaries to treat of peace were but officers sent to regulate the terms of an armistice; and that when the President sends such ministers, he does it as commander-in-chief of the army; that the treaty-making power has nothing to do with it. Now, sir, I must say, that if this be the best proof that can be furnished of the certainty of the code of nations, it will fare ill with its reputation in this respect, for not a single treaty of peace, since wars first began, ever contained a stipulation for an armistice. They are contradictory terms: an armistice is a cessation of hostilities for a limited term; a peace is a stipulation that they shall cease forever; an armistice contemplates a continuance of the war; a peace puts an end to it forever. Sometimes an armistice precedes a treaty of peace, and provides for a renewal of hostilities, if the negotiation should fail; more frequently the plenipotentiaries meet, according to the Senator's apposite phrase, flagrante bello, in some neutral territory, and without any armistice the war is ended if they agree on the conditions of peace, or continues if the conference is broken off. Look into all our treaties of peace; examine those between other nations, and what do you find? Settlements of boundary, provision for mutual claims, all the endless variety of arrangement to settle the disputes between nations. Who ever heard of these in an armistice? Who ever thought the power to make them should be arranged under the military rather than the civil head? If the President had the power to conduct our wars only, and another department, the Senate, for example, that of making treaties, could any treaty of peace, such as we have made, have been concluded but by them? How comes it, too, if this doctrine be true, that all these treaties are ratified by the Senate, if they are armistices only? Because, though they have nothing to do with the President's manner of making war, or interrupting hostilities, he can make no treaty without their assent—because, in fine, a treaty of peace (no offence to the certainty of diplomatic law) is a treaty, and not an armistice.

Another certain doctrine of this certain law which is to destroy my argument, is this: That, in a state of war, every individual of one belligerent nation is in hostility to every individual of the other; that, in this situation of things, no minister of one nation could be sent to another; that his personal safety would be endangered from the first man he met; and it never yet was known, says the Senator, very emphatically, that a minister was sent by a Power at war to its enemy, flagrante bello, and therefore he concludes that plenipotentiaries to treat of peace are not ministers. If by this is meant ministers resident, no one ever contended that they were; but they are what all the world calls them, ministers plenipotentiary, and it is conceded that they may be sent by the President alone, and that they have not been, and need not be, nominated to the Senate before they are sent. As to the public law, on this subject, having confessed my ignorance, I must leave it to the Senate to decide whether this state of universal and individual warfare is acknowledged by the modern law of civilized nations, and whether, if even at times when it raged with the greatest ferocity, there were not safe conducts known which would enable plenipotentiaries to deliberate in an enemy's capital as securely as they could in a neutral town. Leaving these points, as I said, to be determined by those better qualified to decide them, I must take the liberty, however, to doubt the correctness of the asserted fact that is adduced to support them. I have heard, strange as it may appear to the gentleman, I have heard of ministers sent to treat of peace in an enemy's country, during the existence of the war. I have known some, and history is full of others. The war of our revolution, between England and France, was put an end to by a British minister, in the capital of the French kingdom. The peace of 1801, between the same Powers, was concluded at Amiens, and Amiens is in France. One treaty of peace with Algiers was concluded in that city, the capital of our enemy, by a commissioner appointed with exactly the same formalities that Rhind, Olley, and Biddle were; and the other by an Algerine minister on board of one of our ships of war, representing the territory of the United States; in short, so many are exceptions to the rule, if rule it may be called, that, if it is one, it has been most woefully disregarded in practice.

But the volume of treaties with the Barbary Powers; the long list of plenipotentiary commissioners who have been, like Rhind, Olley, and Biddle, sent to negotiate them, and who have none of them been nominated to the Senate! What is to be done with them? They must be disposed of before we can make way for the fierce denunciation against the President. How is this to be effected? Nothing easier. Deny their existence as nations; call them hordes of barbarians, and the business is done. They are, says the gentleman, like the Indian tribes, who are now under our protection, and our tributaries. An unfortunate assimilation! for there are many honorable members of this body, who think that those tribes are independent nations, and that all stipulations with them are treaties, in the diplomatic sense of the word. The word tributary, too, brings with it degrading recollections; for it so happens that it is only a few years since these very people, to whom the title of nation is denied, were powerful enough to have exacted from us an annual tribute, and not only from us, but from all the nations whose ships navigated the Mediterranean. This way of meeting the objection seems to concede that the course which I have shown to have been pursued with respect to the Barbary Powers, was right and constitutional as regarded them; and that if the mission now under discussion had been sent to Morocco, or Algiers, or Tunis, or Tripoli, nothing would have been said against it. It was necessary, therefore, to raise some distinction between two missions begun, continued, and ended, precisely in the same way, that should make one a crime, the other a legal and proper measure. How is this done? By showing that the same rules which govern a mission to Algiers, cannot apply to one sent to the Ottoman Porte. Because, first, the Turkish is an ancient Power; it was established, he says, before our existence as a nation. If this were the correct rule for determining whether a people were entitled to the privileges of a civilized nation, it would be rather an unfortunate scale for us to establish. But be it the true one, how is the fact as between the two Powers? The empire of Turkey was not established in Europe until the fifteenth century. Algiers was then an old Government. Soon after, it withstood the power of Charles V, and defeated the powerful army he sent to invade them. It is acknowledged in the argument, that a capture by one of their cruisers is considered by the courts of England as a change of property. They have fleets, armies, a regular revenue, an organized and permanent, though despotic Government; how, with all these attributes of sovereignty, can we call them savage hordes, with whom no regular intercourse of diplomacy can be kept up? Look, sir, into the treaties we have formed with them. All the principles which the most civilized nations have proclaimed, and which so few of them have practised on, will be found to be included in them.

But the States of Barbary are not treated by the European Powers on the footing of other nations. They do not send them resident ministers. If they did not, I scarcely think this would be proof of the fact that they were not considered as part of the family of nations. One of the greatest Powers in Europe has not now, and never has had, an agent here of a higher rank than consul. Nor have we treated him with more ceremony. Does this prove that Austria and the United States do not consider each other as on a footing with other nations? But, sir, the fact is not quite correct. We have had, and now have, ministers resident with these Powers. They have only the title of consuls, but have the powers of ministers; and greater powers than are exercised by ministers in any country in Europe. They have exclusive criminal and civil jurisdiction over their countrymen.* What other difference between Algiers and Constantinople? In Algiers, they follow the law of Mahomet, so they do at Constantinople. When the Dey is in a passion, he cuts down the consul's flag staff. In Constantinople, the Sultan does worse; he shuts up the minister in the Seven Towers. The Algerine sends no resident ministers to other Powers; neither does the Turk. They both wear turbans; shut up their wives; and have the same contempt for christian dogs. Why, with all these points of similitude, and none of difference, except in extent of territory and power, should there be any in conducting our intercourse with them, which will justify us in characterizing that to be a high crime, in our intercourse with the one, which towards the other is a correct course of conduct? This is a question which gentleman can answer, no doubt, with perfect satisfaction to their own minds, and, perhaps, (but of that I must be permitted to doubt,) with that of the nation.

* Martens, page 27, says: Although consuls are under the special protection of the law of nations, and may be considered in a general view as diplomatic agents of the State which names them, yet they cannot be classed as public ministers, even of the third order, because they are not provided with letters of credence, &c. These, however, which are sent to the Barbary Powers, and to the ports of the Levant, form an exception, and are the only consuls that are accredited and treated as ministers, the greater part of them, and especially consuls general, named by some Power, either for several places at the same time, or at the head of subordinate consuls, enjoy in some particulars greater prerogatives than those sent to the ports of Europe. Page 26: He classes this grade of consuls above chargé d'affaires, who are named to courts where it is not desired or permitted to send a higher grade of ministers.

Powers of Congress to lay and collect duties.

[SENATE.]

In repelling these accusations so unexpectedly made, so vehemently urged, I must not be considered as the authorized advocate of the First Magistrate. I do not pretend to know, as other gentlemen have intimated they know, by whose counsel this measure was adopted, or whether recourse was had to any counsel but that of his own sound, unbiassed understanding. Not being myself his political adviser, I have no parental feelings of affection for any of his measures to mislead my judgment. By its dictates alone I shall approve or condemn. But, sir, he had advisers. Washington and the Adamses, Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, were his counsellors; and the advice of such a cabinet no Chief Magistrate need hesitate to take as his guide.

Sir, I repeat, I am not the official advocate, or the political adviser, of the President; but I am, and I am proud of the title, his personal friend; and, in this capacity, I reject for him, as I know he would indignantly do for himself, the excuse that is offered for his intentions, at the expense of his understanding and independence.

I was somewhat surprised to hear the distinction drawn between the measures of the President and those of what is improperly called his cabinet—a body entirely unknown to the constitution. Adopt this system of shifting responsibility, and hereafter it will be used, not for the purpose for which it now seems to be introduced—that of eulogizing certain heads of departments, and throwing the odium of imputed bad counsel upon others—but for the more dangerous purpose of shielding the First Magistrate from the responsibility which the constitution has thrown upon him, and him alone. And it seems strange that it did not occur to the honorable gentlemen who drew the distinction, that the establishment of this doctrine would be a more serious blow to the constitution, which they so earnestly and sincerely defend, than that which (if even their charges were well founded) they deprecate. Be the distinction offered for what purpose it may, the present Chief Magistrate is not the man to introduce or avail himself of it. His measures are his own; the excuse is not required nor accepted by him, nor is it made for him by his friends.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

Mr. BENTON laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the powers conferred on Congress by the States to lay and collect duties, and to regulate commerce, are distinct and incontrovertible powers, aiming at different objects, and requiring different forms of legislative action; the levying power being confined to imports, and chiefly intended to raise revenue; the regulating power being directed to exports, and solely intended to procure favorable terms for the admission of the ships and products of the States.

2. That the power to lay and collect duties on imports was solicited by the founders of the present Federal Government, and granted by the States, for the express purpose of paying the public debt, and with the solemn and reiterated assurance that the duties levied for that purpose should cease the moment the debt was paid—which assurance was given in answer to objections from the States, and to quiet the apprehensions expressed by some of them, that the grant of power to Congress to raise revenue from the commerce of the States, without limitation of time or quantity, and without accountability to them for its expenditure, might render Congress independent of the States, and endanger their liberties and prosperity.

3. That the public debt will (probably) be paid off in the year 1834, and the amount of about twelve millions of dollars of revenue will then be subject to abolition, and ought to be abolished, according to the agreement of the parties at the establishment of the present Federal Government, and in conformity to the present actual condition and interest of the States.

4. That an abolition of twelve millions of duties will be a relief to the people of from about sixteen millions of taxes, (estimating the retail merchants' advance upon the duties at one-third,) and that the said abolition may be made without diminishing the protection due to any essential branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them.

5. That, for the purpose of enabling Congress to determine with entire safety to every interest, and with full satisfaction to the public mind, what branches and pursuits of domestic industry may be entitled to protection, and ought to be guarded from the injurious effects of foreign competition, a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives ought to be appointed to take the examinations of practical men (producers, consumers, and importers) in all doubtful cases, and to report their evidence to the two Houses of Congress.

6. That the said committee ought to be appointed at the commencement of the next stated session.

7. That the power to regulate foreign commerce was granted to Congress by the States, for the express and sole purpose of enabling Congress to obtain and secure favorable markets abroad for the exports of the States, and favorable terms for the admission of their ships; and to effect these objects by establishing an equitable system of commercial reciprocity, discrimination, and relation, which should measure back to every foreign nation the same degree of favor, or disfavor, which itself measured out to the commerce and navigation of the United States.

8. That the power to regulate foreign commerce, although one of the first of the enumerated powers of the constitution, and the enduring cause of its adoption, has never yet been exercised by Congress.

9. That the approaching extinction of the public debt, and consequent obligation to abolish, and advantage in abolishing, about twelve millions of annual revenue, will enable the United States to receive a large portion of her foreign commerce, say the one-half thereof, free of duty; and that the fair principles of a just reciprocity, the dictates of obvious policy, justice to the States, and the constitutional duty of the Federal Government, already too long deferred, will require this Government to demand equivalents from all nations which may wish to be admitted to a participation in the enjoyment of this great amount of free and unrestricted trade.

10. That the free importation of the following articles (among others) may be admitted into the United States without compromising the prosperity of any branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them, namely: linens, silks, wines, coffee, cocoa, worsted stuff goods, several descriptions of woollens, several qualities of fine cottons, several kinds of spirits, &c. &c.

11. That the free importation of the said articles ought to be offered to all nations which shall grant equivalent advantages to the commerce and navigation of the United States, and will receive the products of their industry, namely: fish, furs, lumber, naval stores, beef, bacon, pork, grain, flour, rice, cotton, tobacco, live stock, manufactures of cotton, leather, wool, and silk, butter and cheese, soap and candles, hats, glass, and gunpowder, lead, shot, and sugar, spirits made of grain and molasses, &c. &c., or some adequate proportion thereof, either free of duty, or upon payment of moderate and reasonable duties, to be agreed upon in treaties, and to continue for a term of years, and to no other nations whatever.

12. That there is nothing in existing treaty stipulations with foreign Powers to prevent the regulation of our commerce upon the foregoing principles.

SENATE.]

National Road in Ohio.

13. That all commercial nations will find it to their advantage to regulate their commerce with the United States on these principles, as, in doing so, they will substitute a fair and liberal trade for a trade of vexations, oppressions, restrictions, and smuggling; will obtain provisions for subsistence, and materials for manufactures, on cheaper terms and more abundantly; will promote their own exports; will increase their revenue, by increasing consumption and diminishing smuggling; and, in refusing to do so, will draw great injury upon themselves in the loss which will ensue of several great branches of their trade with the United States.

14. That the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States would be greatly benefited by regulating foreign trade on the foregoing principles: first, by getting rid of oppressive duties upon the staple productions of the United States in foreign markets; secondly, by lowering at home the price of many articles of comfort or necessity, imported from abroad.

15. That the safest and most satisfactory mode of regulating foreign commerce on these principles would be by combining the action of the legislative and treaty-making powers, Congress fixing, by law or joint resolution, the articles on which duties may be abolished, and the Executive negotiating with foreign nations for the grant of equivalents.

16. That, to be in readiness to carry this system of regulating foreign commerce into effect at the extinction of the public debt, it will be necessary for Congress to designate the articles for abolition of duty at the next stated session.

NATIONAL ROAD IN OHIO.

On motion of Mr. BURNET, the orders were postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio.

Mr. BURNET said he would occupy but a few minutes of the time of the Senate in explaining the bill. Its object, he said, was nothing more than to give the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Ohio, for the preservation and repair of so much of the national road as lies within the limits of that State. That the law to which the assent of Congress was asked, provided for the collection of a moderate toll, to be expended in repairs. It also provided for the punishment of persons detected in the perpetration of malicious mischief injurious to the road. He said that it was generally understood and believed in Ohio, that the jurisdiction of this road was exclusively vested in the United States; that the General Assembly had no power to legislate on the subject without the consent of Congress. It was well known, he remarked, that the road would soon become entirely useless, if an arrangement were not made, without delay, for the purpose of keeping it in repair; that, as the road had been constructed by Congress, at a great expense, it was unreasonable to rely on them for yearly appropriations of money from the national treasury, to keep it in a state of preservation; that the road, being once completed, ought to sustain itself without imposing a further burden on the national treasury; that this description of internal improvement could not be carried to any great extent, if every new construction, when completed, was to be followed by a new annual charge on the treasury of the nation. Such, he said, was the impression of the Legislature of Ohio, and on that view of the subject, and for the purposes already mentioned, they had passed the law recited in the bill under consideration. He thought it would be found, on a careful examination of the law, that its provisions were just and reasonable. The toll proposed to be charged was unusually low; much less than is commonly charged on other roads of a similar character—he was confident that it was less than a tenth of the value of the advantage to be derived by the persons who were to pay it. He disclaimed all idea, or desire, on the part of Ohio, to derive a revenue from this source. They did not contemplate such a result, nor did they wish it. If the road could be preserved without a tax on them, or on the General Government, they would prefer to have it remain as it is now, free and unencumbered with toll gates; but, said he, that is impossible; the road cannot be preserved without constant repairs, which necessarily require a constant supply of money. That Ohio contemplated nothing more than the preservation of the road, was evident from the fact that the whole amount of money collected was to be paid into the State treasury—kept in a separate fund, and applied exclusively to the repair and preservation of the road, and that no more money was to be collected, than would be required for that purpose. Mr. B. said that care had been taken, in draughting the law, to secure the rights of the United States, as well as those of the separate States, by a provision that the mail should pass free; that all persons in the service or employ of the United States, or either of them, and all property belonging to the United States, or either of them, should be exempt from the payment of toll. Such being the character and object of the bill, he did not anticipate an objection that he believed could reasonably be urged against it. It did not, he said, affirm any principles, or profess to settle any question of right; it was a naked declaration, on the part of Congress, of their willingness that Ohio should execute the law she had passed. He was aware that some members of Congress believed that the State possessed that power already, but many others were of a different opinion; and it was manifest that Ohio thought differently, otherwise she would not have passed the law in question. Be this as it may, said Mr. B., I feel confident that every Senator present, whatever may be his opinion on the delicate question of internal improvement, can vote for this bill without committing himself, on any principle connected with that question, because it involves no principle of that character. It will leave the questions of constitutional power and constitutional right where they now stand, to be adjusted and settled as would be the case had this law never been thought of. If, as he believed, the provisions of the bill were unobjectionable, on the score of principle, he was very certain they were calculated to secure a highly important object, as would be verified by the experiment, should the bill under consideration pass. It would prevent future applications to Congress for appropriations of money from the national treasury to repair the road. As yet no such application had been made for the part of the road within the State of Ohio, because it had not become necessary; and he would venture an assurance that such an application should not be made if Congress passed this bill. Ohio would relieve the United States from the tax and the labor of preserving her portion of the road. With the means which this law would put in her power, she would guaranty the accomplishment of the object without further trouble to the United States, and certainly without further expense to their treasury. He believed that the plan proposed by the State of Ohio was the best, if not the only one, by which the road could be kept in repair for any length of time, as it was evident that Congress would soon become weary of making yearly appropriations for that purpose; and that whenever these appropriations should be required, there being no substitute provided, the road would go to ruin, and the money already expended would be lost to the nation.

Mr. HAYNE said he was in favor of the object of the bill. He should be glad to see the principle carried out, and the United States wholly relieved from the care and preservation of this road. He thought, however, that the bill stopped short in one important particular, and that was, the cession of the road to the State of Ohio. He should like, if it could be done, to introduce a provision into the bill providing for its cession—it was a matter of importance, in his opinion—and it would release the United States from all future legislation on the subject. Should this course be pursued, next year Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other States interested, would make a similar application to Congress, and, their wishes once granted, the United States would be relieved from an almost continual drain on their treasury. The construction and preservation of this road was an unfortunate event for the country; the United States had been, and would be, from the necessity of things, subjected to more expense in works of this nature, than either individuals or States. Mr. H. spoke of the sums paid for the construction of the road, and the great expense required to keep it in repair. He would ask the chairman of the committee if such a provision as he had suggested could not be introduced into the bill, and thus relieve the Government from any further appropriations.

Mr. BURNET, in reply, said, that as many of the members of both Houses were opposed to a cession of the road, as would appear by referring to the debate which took place on that subject two years ago, he was apprehensive that an attempt to amend the bill, as had been suggested by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, might be followed by its loss. He observed that the bill, in its present form, presented no obstacle to the accomplishment of the object which the honorable Senator had in view; that, as it now stood, it secured that object in part, and in a very important part, and he hoped that gentleman would not persist in putting that part at risk, by an attempt now to obtain the residue, which might as well be secured at a future day. That, as the proposition now made was one about which there was a great diversity of opinion, an attempt to introduce it into the bill would certainly induce a protracted debate, which, at this late hour of the session, must be fatal to the whole project. The Senator from South Carolina did not object because he was unwilling to permit the State of Ohio to do what she proposed; on the contrary, as far as the proposition went, it seemed to meet his approbation; but he desired to go further—he wished to make a complete cession of the road; that object would not be defeated by passing the bill in its present shape, but the bill would certainly be defeated by an attempt to amend it as proposed, for the purpose of gaining that object at the present time. On these considerations, Mr. B. objected to the proposition which had been made.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that there were at least two objections to the bill as it now stood, unless the provision suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina should be incorporated into it. The first was, that it undertook to transfer to the Legislature of Ohio a right to erect toll-gates, &c. with a view to the collection of revenue, to provide for keeping the road in repair—a power which the Congress of the United States did not itself possess. The matter had been more than once discussed in Congress, and bills providing for raising a revenue from tolls, for the repair of the road, had been rejected. If, then, Congress did not possess the power, could the right be transferred, by Congress, to the Legislature of the State of Ohio? In his opinion, it could only be done by ceding that part of the road lying within the State of Ohio to that State altogether, and thus give its Legislature a right to exercise the power now sought to be obtained. If the power were not given in this way, he could not see in what other way it could be done, when Congress did not possess the power itself. The second objection was, that, by the provisions of the bill, the justices of the peace in the State of Ohio were to exercise jurisdiction over offenders against the law, and to enforce its provisions. Certainly, said Mr. P., we cannot give this jurisdiction to those officers of the State of Ohio. The constitution provides, that “the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.” Can we travel out of the course laid down for us in the constitution, and give an authority to State officers to enforce our laws—give them a jurisdiction which we have no authority to do by the constitution? No, said Mr. P.; we have not the power to constitute these officers, quoad hoc, judicial officers of the United States. The course which he should prefer, and which should be pursued, was, to cede that part of the road to the State of Ohio, passing through her boundaries, and so on to other States, to the whole length of the road: for this was the worst Government in the world to have the management of the roads. He had thrown out these views for the consideration of the Senate, and he hoped honorable gentlemen would agree with him in the expediency of an entire cession.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said that the gentleman from Mississippi, who had just taken his seat, mistook, a little, the provisions of the bill. It did not grant a power to erect toll-gates, but simply gave the assent of Congress to the State of Ohio to do so. The road passed through the limits of the State, but was constructed by the United States. Many persons were of opinion that, because the road was made with the money of the United States, therefore it was the property of the United States—others were of opinion that the road was constructed in pursuance of the power possessed by the Government to make post roads; and on these two cases many disputes might arise. He was opposed to ceding the road to the States. Mr. L. remarked that it was the State of Ohio which gave the power referred to the justices of the peace, and not Congress; we, in sanctioning her law, simply assent that she shall have the power to give the jurisdiction to these officers expressed in the bill, and do not appoint them ourselves. Mr. L. made a reference to the inspection and other laws of the States, which were sanctioned by the United States' Government, but were not laws of Congress. He wished similar provisions to those contained in the present bill could be extended to every State through which roads ran, constructed by the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER thought he discovered, in the arguments of the Senator from Louisiana, a distinction without a difference. If the assent of Congress was necessary to give effect to a law of the State of Ohio, then we certainly transferred to her a power to do that which she could not do herself. If she had a right to exercise the power proposed to be given in this bill, without our consent, then the bill is useless; but if our assent is necessary, then our act is the only thing which gives a binding effect to the law of the State of Ohio. Where was the difference in our acting on subjects of this kind subsequently or anteriorly? In the present case the Legislature had acted beforehand, and sent their law to us for our assent to its provisions. If we were to pass a law beforehand, giving them the power now sought to be obtained, and they saw proper to act upon the subject, would it not amount to the same thing? The justices of the peace in Ohio, he maintained, would, in this instance, act entirely dependent on our will; and, in granting them the power sought to be obtained, we were going beyond the provisions of the constitution.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he would state the difference in the two cases, and it was the same difference which existed between a compromise and a suit at law. Might not, two parties being at variance, one offer a compromise for the settlement of their differences, and the other refuse, because, he would say, if I do agree to a compromise, you will say, that I admit you have the right on your side? As to the justices of the peace, when they came to act, it would not be by virtue of any law of Congress, but under the provisions of the law of Ohio.

Mr. FORSYTH said he could not vote for the bill in its present shape. He agreed with the gentleman from Mississippi in his views of the matter, and would cheerfully vote for a cession of the road, if the State of Ohio, or any other State concerned, was willing to take it. He was among those who believed that the United States could claim no jurisdiction over the property. The State of Ohio asked of us a jurisdiction which we could not give, said Mr. F., because we had not the power. Cede the property to her, and she might exercise such legislation in relation to the road as she might see proper. He regretted that he could not vote for the bill; he had assigned his reasons why he could not. He was willing to surrender every section of the road to the States interested, if they would keep it in repair.

Mr. RUGGLES said, this was the third effort which had been made to prevent the road from going to ruin. There was no other method that could be pursued to accomplish the end in view. Bills for the preservation of the road had been before Congress on several occasions, but without success. One did pass the two Houses, but was rejected by the then President—Mr. Monroe. Other projects had been tried, but nothing finally done. The State did not contemplate deriving a revenue from the tolls collected; their only object was, to keep the road in repair, and to this purpose the funds would be applied. It would be to the benefit of the United States to assent to the act; and if, in the present case, the assent of Congress was obtained, the States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, &c. would hereafter adopt similar measures. Some measure, to keep the road from dilapidation and ruin, should be speedily resorted to. It was the best road in the country; but, unless early attended to, must go to decay. He thought the bill prescribed the best course that could be adopted, and hoped it would pass. Ohio did not ask for or want the road; she simply wished the power to preserve it from destruction.

Mr. BURNET said, there was one point of view, in which the subject might be presented, which he thought would remove the difficulty under which the Senator from Mississippi seemed to labor. The national road, he said, had given rise to questions of doubtful or disputed jurisdiction. Many persons of information and legal talents were of opinion that the jurisdiction vested in the State through which the road passed; others, equally well informed and of equal legal talents, were of a different opinion; they thought the jurisdiction was in Congress, and in this state of things the road was fast going to ruin. For the purpose of obviating the effects of this collision of opinion, without meeting the contested question, the Legislature of Ohio, he said, has passed a law, exercising a jurisdiction in part, with a proviso that it should not be carried into effect without the consent of Congress. The whole amount of the matter then was, that the contending parties, by this bill, consented that Ohio should take charge of the road, for the purpose of preserving it, leaving the question of right as it heretofore stood—unsettled and undecided. The Senator from Mississippi had certainly misapprehended the bill; he had considered the language of the Legislature as being the language of Congress, by supposing that the latter was about to vest jurisdiction by this bill in the officers and courts of the State, when, in fact, it was the enactment of Ohio which gave the jurisdiction, and when Congress were required to do nothing more than express their approbation of the course pursued by that State—all the power to be exercised by those courts and officers would be derived from the State, by an express enactment, in which the United States were neither named nor referred to as having any agency in the matter. If a State, said he, by statute, gave jurisdiction to her own tribunals and officers, Congress, by expressing its approbation of the measure, will not become the grantor of that jurisdiction; it would still be an authority derived exclusively from the State.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and determined in the affirmative.

PUNISHMENT FOR DUELLING.

Mr. LIVINGSTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to examine and report whether any legislative provision is expedient, in order to prevent and punish the practice of duelling in the District of Columbia, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

In offering this resolution, Mr. L. remarked, that when the bill from the other House, for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia, was under consideration, some exception was made to that clause which related to the punishment for duelling. Not to hazard that bill, the clause had been stricken out, with a view to come at the subject by the appointment of a committee to prepare and report a special bill relative to duelling. With this view he had offered the resolution, and he doubted not that a bill might be reported in time to be acted on at the present session.

Mr. HAYNE was in favor of the adoption of the resolution. It was his object, in moving to strike out the clause of the bill referred to, that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] might have an opportunity to present his views on the subject in the shape of a specific bill. Should a bill be reported, as an individual he would cheerfully co-operate with him; and he thought such a bill might be matured, as would have a beneficial effect.

The resolution was then agreed to, and Messrs. LIVINGSTON, HAYNE, and CLAYTON were appointed the committee.

TURKISH MISSION.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the amendments to the appropriation bill, the question being on the motions of Messrs. TAZEWELL and KANE.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE.] He was satisfied of its strict propriety, by his recollection of what occurred in the House of Representatives in the year 1818, when he occupied in the House the position now occupied in the Senate by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] who first opened the discussion. Mr. Monroe had appointed three distinguished citizens commissioners to go to Spanish America, to examine into the political condition of the States struggling to maintain their independence. He had promised them salaries at the rate of $6,000 per annum each, and had given them a secretary with a salary of 2 or 3,000 dollars. These gentlemen had all been appointed during the recess of the Senate, and were not nominated at the ensuing session. They had left the United States on their mission before Congress met. Their mission was one of the topics of the Executive message at the opening of Congress. The appropriation bill of that year was reported with a clause making a specific appropriation for the payment of these commissioners and their secretary. The Speaker of the House, Mr. Clay, who was just beginning to display symptoms of hostility to the administration, inquired into the authority for making those appointments—doubted the propriety, and condemned the expediency of them. After a consultation with that distinguished statesman, the late Mr. Lowndes, the purity of whose character, the soundness of whose judgment, whose honorable ambition, with not enough of the alloy of selfishness in it to make it current in the world's traffic, gave to his opinions, while he lived, the most imposing weight. Mr. F. proposed to strike from the appropriation bill the specific appropriation, and to add the amount required for the payment of the commissioners to the sum set apart as the contingent fund for foreign intercourse. The amendment was adopted without a division, and proved acceptable to the Senate. The object was to throw the expenditure upon that fund which was entrusted to the absolute discretion of the President, to prevent any inferences unfavorable to the controlling power of the Senate in confirming appointments, and of the House in creating offices. The confidential agents appointed to negotiate a treaty with Turkey have been appointed under the same authority that was exercised in 1818 by Mr. Monroe. If there was any difference in principle, the difference was in favor of the present administration. The commissioners to Spanish America were public political agents with fixed salaries, protected by the flag of the United States in their voyage, and by the commissions from the Secretary of State, bearing letters to the Governments they were sent to visit, and entitled to respect in their known public political character from all civilized nations. The agents to Turkey were secret agents, without salaries, authorized to make a treaty of commerce, if practicable, without letters of credence to any Power, and entitled to no peculiar protection except from the Turkish Government, with whose officers it was necessary for them to confer, to ascertain the practicability of effecting the object in view. There certainly was no course of reasoning that would make Messrs. Rhind, Offley, and Biddle in the recent, and Messrs. Offley and Crane in the former, effort to negotiate secretly with Turkey, officers of Government, whose appointments ought to be provided for by law, or subject to the controlling power of the Senate, that would not more strongly apply to the case of the commissioners, Bland, Rodney, and Graham, and their secretary, Brackenridge, who were sent to the South American States by Mr. Monroe.

Mr. F. said he had hoped that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Illinois would have met the approbation of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] as he professed a perfect readiness to pay liberally for the services rendered, if no inference against the power of the Senate could be drawn from it. He contends, however, that such an inference will be justifiable, if the payment is not made on the personal application of the persons who rendered the service, by a bill specially reported for their relief, and originating in the House of Representatives. Mr. F. did not agree with the Senator on this point. All that could be legitimately inferred from the proposed increase of the contingent fund was, that Congress decided that the commissioners should be remunerated for services rendered in Turkey. The amendment proposed by the other Senator from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] appeared to be, therefore, unnecessary to the protection of the Senate, and objectionable; as, with the ostensible purpose of extracting a conclusion not liable to be drawn, it gave occasion to one, unjustifiable in itself, reflecting upon the present administration, and the present administration only. Mr. F., while he believed the present discussion neither called for, nor in place, was not unwilling to express his opinions on the question suggested by the Senators from Virginia, or those really involved in the appropriation for the payment of the Turkish commissioners. He coincided in opinion with the Senator on his right, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] that, since the establishment of the Federal Government, the Executive had gained upon the legislative branches of the Government, had encroached upon the authority of the Senate; and whenever any Senator presented himself to restore the true principles of the constitution—to vindicate the powers of the Senate, Mr. F. would afford his hearty support, without stopping to inquire over whose prostrate fortunes it was necessary to march, in effecting that great object. In the important business of foreign intercourse, it appeared to him that the framers of the constitution intended that every negotiation, from its inception to its consummation, should be made known to, and, to a certain extent, be under the control of, the Senate. In the first years of the Government such seemed to have been the practice. General Washington frequently presented to this body such questions as these: Shall a negotiation be opened with such a Power? Shall instructions to this or that effect be given? Shall a treaty be formed, if the mutual stipulations indicated could be agreed on? In this practice General Washington did not persist. An event occurred in 1795, having no doubt some influence in justifying, in the minds of our Presidents, if it did not occasion, this change. A subject of vast consequence was submitted to the decision of the Senate in secret executive session, under the most sacred obligation not to be disclosed by any Senator. No sooner had the Senate adjourned, than the whole matter was spread before the public by a Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Mason.] The whole country was thrown into confusion; warm, animated, angry discussion followed, and all the services, and virtues, and character of Washington were insufficient to save him from the censure and reproach of a part of the country. Mr. F. did not censure that disclosure; those to whom the Senator was responsible applauded the act; he would not question their decision.

It was soon found, as the Government moved on, that if a desire was felt that any subject should be bruted about in every corner of the United States, should become the topic of universal discussion, nothing more was necessary than to close the doors of the Senate chamber, and make it the object of secret, confidential deliberation. Our own experience shows that, in this respect, there has been no improvement; the art of keeping State secrets is no better understood now than it formerly was. Yet, with these facts before the public, the honorable Senator from Virginia, nearest to him, [Mr. TYLER,] asserts that the Senate is a perfectly safe depository for all the secrets of our foreign diplomacy.

This change in the course of the Executive Department had been submitted to without censure or resistance. No individual Senator, even as far as Mr. F. was informed, had ever made an effort to drive the Executive into a full and frank disclosure of the mysteries of our foreign intercourse, or to sustain a claim to control, by Senatorial advice, the character and extent of the instructions given to our foreign ministers or agents. Thinking, as Mr. F. did, that the constitution intended the Senate should be previously consulted on all points of foreign negotiation, he was yet compelled to admit that the usage of the Government had been uniformly inconsistent with that opinion. Upon the question of appointments to new foreign missions in the recess of the Senate, on which the gentleman from Virginia on his right [Mr. TAZEWELL] had dwelt with so much zeal and earnestness—the right of the President to originate new missions during the recess of the Senate, although exercised in many cases, and asserted on a recent occasion by the late President, had not been resisted by the Senate. Individual Senators had condemned, and had asked the Senate to join in the censure of such acts and pretensions; but the Senate had, on every occasion, evaded a decision.

Both the great parties into which the people were supposed to be divided, had united in the expediency of avoiding collision with the President on this question of power.

The motions of Mr. Gore, censuring the appointment by Mr. Madison during the recess of the Senate, of Messrs. Gallatin, Bayard, &c., to treat under the Russian mediation, were laid on the table by the republican votes of the Senate. The motion of the present Secretary of the Navy, (Mr. Branch,) condemning the pretensions of Mr. Adams, that he, as President, was competent to appoint ministers to the Congress of Panama, was laid on the table by the vote of the friends of the late administration. So far as a judgment was to be formed of the opinion of the Senate, any President had a right to conclude, whatever may be the opinion of his cabinet or of some of his distinguished friends in either or both Houses of Congress, that his power to make appointments to new missions during the recess of this body was admitted by the Senate itself. Mr. F. did not impute the failure on the part of the Senate to assert its constitutional rights to party considerations alone; although it had unfortunately happened that these questions were always stirred in high party times, and pressed with a view to party effect; the subject was one of difficulty; and whenever it is canvassed as it ought to be, with a single eye to the relative constitutional power of the President and Senate, it would be found that a decision either in favor of or against the power of the President alone to appoint to new missions, would be attended with serious danger to the public interest. He was prepared, whenever, in executive session, it was proposed unconnected with party strife, for the expression by the Senate of a fixed opinion; and to adhere to that opinion in all future intercourse with the Chief Magistrate.

Apart from these questions, the experience of the confederation having shown the necessity of secret confidential agencies in foreign countries, very early in the progress of the Federal Government, a fund was set apart, to be expended at the discretion of the President of the United States on his responsibility only, called the contingent fund of foreign intercourse. The gentleman from Virginia on his right [Mr. TAZEWELL] supposed that this fund was for the payment of spies in foreign countries, who might be imprisoned or hung, if detected, with his free will, as the United States were not bound to protect them. This would depend upon their character; if American citizens, they would be entitled to protection; and that protection should, at every hazard, be afforded; but this term spy, to which the gentleman chooses to confine the use of this contingent fund, will not answer his purpose. Foreign ministers are defined to be privileged spies, sent abroad to lie for the benefit of their country, (the last part of this definition Mr. F. hoped was not always accurate.) If the President can, on the strength of this contingent fund, appoint spies, he can appoint the privileged spies. But on what ground does the gentleman narrow down the use of this contingent fund? It was given for all purposes to which a secret service fund should or could be applied for the public benefit. For spies, if the gentlemen please; for persons sent publicly and secretly to search for important information, political or commercial; for agents to carry confidential instructions, written or verbal, to our foreign ministers, in negotiations where secrecy was the element of success; for agents to feel the pulse of foreign Governments, to ascertain if treaties, commercial or political, could be formed with them, and with power to form them, if practicable. Such uses have been frequently made of this fund; indeed, the propriety of thus using it is now, for the first time, doubted. Why is it publicly discussed? Mr. F. could not probably speak of what the executive journal did, but he was authorized to say what it did not contain. The Senate had not censured or doubted the propriety of the appointment of the agents to make a treaty with Turkey. No committee of that body, no individual Senator had proposed to the Senate to express any opinion on the subject. But, on this petty appropriation, the grave constitutional question is stirred here by both Senators from Virginia—the one [Mr. TAZEWELL] from despair—the other, [Mr. TRIEN], because an attack ought to be openly made.

To the first Senator, Mr. F. would suggest that patriotism should never despair of the republic; and that the people might possibly remind him that he should not invoke Hercules until he put his own shoulder to the wheel. The other Senator discloses the purpose of his movement; it is an attack. Certainly the place is well chosen, and the attack is in the nick of time. Mr. F. thought the executive session was the true place to vindicate the rights of the Senate in its intercourse with the Chief Magistrate—that the judgment of the Senate ought to be distinctly expressed, not left to obscure inferences from omissions or expressions in appropriation acts—these were proper in the House of Representatives, which could only through appropriations check the irregular or dangerous action of the Executive, but not in the Senate. Yet he admitted the propriety of taking any and every opportunity to give warning to the States and to the people. This being the avowed object, no allusion to the handwriting on the wall was necessary. The administration was in the balance, and the people will decide whether it is or is not wanting in fidelity to its trust. Some remarks had been indulged in, on the manner of the Senators from Virginia in their discussion of this subject. Mr. F. was too much in the habit of speaking freely to find fault with it in others—indeed, he was always like Locksley, the Robinhood of Ivanhoe, ready to add his halo “whenever he saw a good shot or a gallant blow.” If disposed to criticise, he should find the opposite fault with both the Senators—they were far too courtly for the meridian of the United States. They had adopted and acted upon the maxim of courtly continental Europe, and of the palace of St. James. The Chief Magistrate can do no wrong—the ministers are responsible—on them let the weight of public indignation fall; and one of the gentlemen [Mr. TAZEWELL] had gone so far as to express the sentiment, that he was willing to have the maxim universally acted upon, if the cabinet ministers could be, as in England, brought to the block for giving unconstitutional advice to the President. Until the constitution changes, the Chief only is responsible for Executive acts; he may take the advice of his Secretaries if he thinks proper; but there is no obligation upon him either to take or to follow that advice; and if he does both, he does not escape the consequences—he is morally, constitutionally, and legally answerable for all Executive acts; and Mr. F. thanked God that whenever there should be use for the headsmen's axe, there was no officer of this Government too high nor too low to escape its edge. The present Chief Magistrate asks not the introduction of this slavish doctrine—late discoveries show that he is not willing to assume the obligations of others, but he has never shrunk from his own. If there is one characteristic above all others peculiarly distinguishing the man, it is the fearlessness with which he throws himself upon responsibility; not with the reckless indifference of a profligate, but with the generous confidence of an honest mind. Surprised, as Mr. F. was, at this unusual effort to strike over the President's shoulders at objects behind him, and sheltered by his constitutional shield, he was still more struck with the distinctions made in selecting points of attack. The Senator who led the assault [Mr. TAZEWELL] charged upon the four members of the cabinet, who had been formerly members of the Senate, upbraided them for the inconsistency of the conduct of the Executive with certain opinions recorded in the journals of the Senate during the Panama discussions; and with giving to the President advice to violate the constitution. The Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, and the Attorney General, were condemned for having advised, or for not having prevented by their advice, a violation of that sacred instrument. Why is the Secretary of the Treasury excluded? He, too, is a constitutional adviser of the President, under the like obligations to give good counsel, and, by so doing, preventing violations of the laws and constitution of the country. On all the important questions arising out of the Panama mission, there was little difference of opinion among the then opposition party, of which the Secretary from Pennsylvania was a most active member; and, although not recorded here, his opinions stand upon record elsewhere on those questions. Why is he of Pennsylvania excused by the Senator, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] when he of New York, and he of Tennessee, and he of North Carolina, and he of Georgia, are condemned without scruple or mercy? Even this discrimination, singular as it is, is surpassed by that of the other gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER.] He, too, seems to have a favorite in the cabinet, the Secretary of the Navy, (Branch,) whom he has anxiously sought, to draw out of harm's way from the deadly range of the too hot fire of his colleague. Cannot our navy stand fire? Now this Secretary (Branch) was the author of the resolutions brought up in judgment against the cabinet—the appropriation of the other three Secretaries is inferred from their vote against the motion to lay them on the table—an inference, every Senator knows is not always correct. Yet the author is to be excused, the inferred approvers condemned. It cannot be supposed that the Secretary of the Navy was ignorant of this secret negotiation with Turkey. By the facts communicated to the Senate, he is the only one, besides the Secretary of State, who certainly was informed of it. The expenses of the agency were advanced by the Navy Department, and repaid out of the contingent fund of foreign intercourse.

The commander of the Mediterranean squadron was one of the commissioners, and had instructions from the Navy Department, about the funds to be used in the negotiation and the movements of his ships, to facilitate its success. Yet, although he did know, and it is uncertain whether two other members of the cabinet did or did not know any thing about it, he is not only carefully moved out of the way of reproach, but is made the subject of a special eulogium. He from North Carolina is the true republican of the old democratic principles. He is a star who never suffered dim eclipse, nor shed disastrous twilight over half the nations; nor, Mr. F. would add, with fear of change, perplexed monarchs—and Mr. F. would say further, if disposed to indulge in a prophetic spirit, that the honorable Secretary never would. No disparagement to the worthy gentlemen was intended; the poetry and the prophecy might be applied to all, and to any of his associates. Those who were disposed to speculate curiously into the circumstances of the hour, might investigate the causes of these strange discriminations. You and I, Mr. President, said Mr. F., adopting the habit of our New England brethren, might make shrewd guesses at the true causes; but whether our guesses would fly at random, or directly to the mark, is not at present of much importance—now, it is necessary only to mark the fact that the discrimination is made. Leaving the favored pair to rejoice, the one at his perfect, and the other at his partial immunity, and the unfortunate triumvirate to repine at their fate, and bear, with all the grace in their power, the galling fire of Virginia's wrath, Mr. F. would proceed to consider the attack as if made upon the only responsible officer, the President of the United States. He was charged with lawless acts, with the first violation of an important provision of the constitution of the United States, with a usurpation, into his own hands, of a power confided to him conjointly with the Senate.

The Senator from Virginia who first spoke on the subject, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] denied the correctness of the distinction between agents and officers of the Government. The distinction might not be sound; but one thing was certain, that it had always been made, and always had been and was now acted upon. Every head of a department occasionally employs and pays agents in the execution of the duties of his office, on the strength of the contingent fund submitted to his disbursement. We have consuls appointed under the constitution, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: commercial agents selected by the President with consular powers, about whose appointment the advice and consent of the Senate is never asked. We have agents or commissioners to make contracts, treaties they are called, with Indian tribes. These appointments were in the first days of the Government submitted to the Senate, but were soon made at the discretion of the President or his Secretary of War, without even the ceremony of stating to the Senate that they had been made. We have foreign ministers and chargés d'affaires appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and agencies committed to the Secretary of State to make treaties while the Senate is sitting, and secret agents to make treaties abroad; and in neither case is the Senate informed of the power given until it is executed, the treaty being signed by the empowered agents.

If these acts are lawless—if these are violations of the constitution, encroachments on the powers of the Senate, the remedy should come from Virginia, for Virginia was the author of the evil. If the constitution lies suffering under festering wounds, the blows were struck by her steel, and it is her duty to apply the sovereign balm—the rust of the weapon heals the wounds it has made. The first stab was given by the parental hand of Washington. Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, have each, in turn, struck deep into the vitals of the victim. Ay, sir, if her Senators are right in principle, they can point to as many gashes in the constitution, as Antony bared to the view of the Roman people on the mangled body of their dead Cæsar.

Mr. F. would not fatigue the Senate by bringing again into view all the examples of appointments like those of the commissioners to Turkey. He would touch only two or three of the most striking; some of the prominent circumstances of which had escaped the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON.]

On the 30th of March, 1795, David Humphreys, minister of the United States to Portugal, was appointed by General Washington, during the recess of the Senate, a commissioner to conclude a treaty of amity and commerce with Algiers. He negotiated a treaty, by his deputy, J. Donaldson, jun., in September, 1795, but signed it himself at Lisbon, on the 28th of November, 1795. This treaty was negotiated under a full power, bearing the sign manual of the President, and the broad seal of the United States. It was submitted to the Senate in February, 1796, and ratified on the 2d of March, 1796, by a vote of twenty-three to two. No nomination of Mr. Humphreys was made to the Senate. The tenth session of the Senate, an extra session called by President Washington, began on the 8th, and closed on the 26th of June, 1795. Here there was a confidential commissioner appointed under a full power, during the recess of the Senate, not nominated to the Senate at its succeeding session, and about whose movements nothing was known until late in the second session after his appointment; when this power having been successfully executed by the formation of a treaty, that treaty was submitted for approval, and ratified almost unanimously, without a whisper of disapprobation on the course pursued by General Washington, or a doubt as to his right to the exclusive power exercised by him.

A like commission was given to Mr. Humphreys at the same time, 30th March, 1795, to make a treaty of amity and commerce with Tripoli. Joel Barlow was substituted on the 10th of February, 1796; a treaty was negotiated on the 4th of January, 1797, and laid before the Senate on the 26th of May, 1797. Two sessions of Congress intervened, and three sessions of the Senate, between the appointment of the commissioner and the submission of the treaty to the Senate, during all of which General Washington was President. Mr. Adams submitted the treaty for ratification during the third session of Congress succeeding the appointment of the commissioner. No nomination was ever made, and the conduct of the Executive in both cases was approved. Mr. F. would not say that what had been done in those days was right, because it was done by the great model for statesmen and citizens; but he would say that the President could not be justly charged with now, for the first time, violating the constitution, when he had taken such examples for his guide, and squared his conduct by the rule of Washington. Mr. F. would not press the subsequent appointments made by the succeeding Presidents from Virginia, as all had been alluded to, except the remarkable one made by Mr. Madison in 1816. William Shaler and Isaac Chauncey were appointed on the 24th of August of that year, commissioners to alter the treaty then recently made with Algiers by Shaler and Decatur, under a commission to them and Captain Bainbridge. This alteration was made by treaty on the 23d of December, 1816, and ratified during Mr. Monroe's administration, 1st of February, 1822: yeas, 42—nays, none. Mr. F. had both commissions in his hands; they were full powers under the sign manual of the President and broad seal of the United States, in all respects like the powers granted to Biddle, Oflsey, and Rhind. In these instances also, the Virginia President did not ask the advice and consent of the Senate, and escaped, like his great predecessor, all censure and remark. The honorable Senators, however, admit that all these things have been done, and, as they say, rightfully done; and their opinions against this Turkish negotiation rest upon the correctness of certain distinctions they have presented to the Senate. They admit that the former Presidents, beginning with General Washington, have, during the recess of the Senate, rightfully appointed commissioners to treat of peace and commerce with the Barbary Powers, whose names were not sent to the Senate at subsequent sessions. They admit that Messrs. Gallatin, Bayard, and Adams were rightfully appointed during the recess of the Senate to treat with Great Britain under the Russian mediation. They admit that the President has rightfully negotiated treaties in Washington during the recess of the Senate, and during the sessions of this body, without asking its advice and consent, by the instrumentality of the State; and, admitting all this, they accuse the President of the United States of disregarding the constitution, for having negotiated, through the instrumentality of secret agents, a commercial treaty with Turkey.

The honorable Senators unite in resting this apparent inconsistency of opinion on these grounds:

First. On the ground that all the previous appointments of this kind were made during war. A state of war, in their judgment, justifies during the recess the appointment of commissioners to make peace; but does it justify, also, the failure to ask a confirmation of the appointment of these commissioners at the succeeding session of the Senate? It was not so contended when Mr. Gore's resolutions were discussed. This resort to the war power is, however, certainly convenient, as carried to its legitimate extent; it renders any participation of the Senate in the business of re-establishing the regulations of peace altogether superfluous. It proves too much for the gentleman's purpose. It involves besides the truth of one of these propositions, to both of which Mr. F. expressly dissented. Either that the sole power of the President over the foreign relations of the United States was enlarged, or the controlling power of the Senate over those relations diminished, by the state of war—propositions far more dangerous in their consequences than any that could arise from the practice of appointing secret confidential agents in negotiating treaties of commerce. Mr. F. did not believe that any gentleman would risk his reputation as a statesman, (if he might use the term without offence to the Senator behind him, [Mr. TYLER,] who had honored it with a peculiar sneer,) seriously contending that either was true; yet, he submitted with confidence to the judgment of the Senators, if one of them was not the inevitable result of the distinction taken by the gentleman from Virginia.

The facts in the cases referred to did not bear the gentlemen out, even if their distinction was just; all the appointments made, were not made during a state of war.

Here, however, a reliance is placed upon another ground, covering all the appointments made to treat with the Powers on the Barbary coast. It was said they were Barbarian Powers, and not to be treated as civilized nations. Indeed! Barbarian Powers! Foreign Barbarian Powers, certainly not dependents on the United States. The treaties formed by the commissioners mentioned made the United States, for a time, their tributaries. As this was a grave constitutional question, to be tried by the language of the instrument itself, Mr. F. would ask, with due respect, why the gentleman travelled out of the instrument to look into the character of the foreign Power with whom negotiation was directed by the President, and what degree of civilization in a foreign nation was necessary to bring the agents sent to them within the controlling power of the Senate. The honorable Senators did not as yet affirm that the treaties made with them were not beyond or below the Senator's orbit. But Mr. F. did not discover any reason for the participation of the Senate in the ratification of the treaty, which was not applicable to the appointment of the negotiators, if they were, as contended for by the gentlemen, officers in the technical language of the constitution. In their zeal to find them, they have struck upon distinctions much too broad for their purpose. Supposing the distinction sound, the distinction covers the Turkish negotiation, and upon their own doctrines the administration stands justified. Take the Algerines, for example's sake: how do they differ from the Turks? The European would call the Algerines barbarians—so he does the Turks: the Algerines are not christians, nor are the Turks; the Algerines are Mahometans, so are the Turks. In the event of a rupture, the Algerines imprison the consuls of the Power with whom they are at war, reduce its subjects or citizens to slavery, and confiscate all the property belonging to the enemy's nation within their power—so do the Turks: on the principle of the lex talionis, the Algerines are not entitled to the benefits of the rules of honorable war—nor are the Turks. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] says the Turks have been a formidable power before the American Government had existence—so have the Algerines, although their Dey is now kicked about with as little ceremony as a Cherokee chief. How long is it since Algiers has made the most formidable nations of Europe tremble? If antiquity of strength is of any importance in this discussion, the barbarians on the coast of Africa, so called while they were teaching Europe civilization, have been terrible for centuries. They foiled, in all the pride of his strength, the grandson of that monarch under whose patronage this continent was discovered. He who humbled France, was almost master of Europe, was himself reduced to extremity by these now despised Barbarians. Mr. F. was unable to discover any tangible distinction between the Mahometan Powers of Africa, and the Mahometan Powers of Europe and Asia. Turkey was distinguished from the others in the eyes of Europe, but that distinction was founded solely upon the geographical position of a part of the Sultan's dominions—a position that could not be important in the question before the Senate. Occupying an interesting and imposing position in Europe, the European Governments condescended to consider the Turkish Government as part of the European system. It was one of the make-weights in the balance of power—that chimera to which millions of lives had been sacrificed—which had enabled the wily diplomacy of artful despotism to stay for centuries the onward march of reason and liberty. In no other respect is there a distinction made between the Turks and other Mahometan Powers. War and peace, and treaties of commerce, are made with all, and with all the nations of the world regulate their intercourse as if they were christian Powers. Until the gentleman can find a stronger distinction than this, it must be admitted that the practice of former administrations in their intercourse with the Barbarian Powers, covers the case of this secret negotiation with the Barbarian Turk.

The gentlemen had not been more fortunate in maintaining the other ground chosen by them. Pressed by the force of the precedents urged of treaties made without the Senate's knowledge, by the instrumentality of the Secretary of State, during the recess, and during sessions of this body; treaties of commerce, of indemnity, of claims due to and by the United States; for the settlement of disputed boundaries, and for cessions of extensive territory, the Senators urge that the negotiators acted in these cases as the agents of the President, by virtue of their commissions as Secretaries of State. What was there in the commission of the Secretary of State that made him, ex officio, a negotiator? What was there in the law creating this office that warranted this distinction? There was certainly nothing, either in the commission or act of Congress. There was a mistake made by the gentlemen destructive of their conclusion; they assumed as a fact what did not exist. The Secretaries of State, acting as the agents of the President, did not negotiate by virtue of their commissions as Secretaries of State—they were appointed by the Presidents, under their sign manual and the broad seal of the United States, for the special purpose of making the treaties formed by them severally; they had full powers, such as were granted to Biddle, Oflsey, and Rhind. There was no difference but this: the Secretaries in Washington, in the face of the Senate and of the nation, negotiated; the Turkish commissioners transacted their business in secret at Constantinople. What constitutional principle justifies the appointment of an agent here, the Senate sitting, publicly or privately, to form a treaty with a foreign Power, that will not justify the appointment of a secret agent to form a treaty, if practicable, in London or Constantinople? The place where the power granted is to be carried, cannot affect the right of the President to grant that power. Suppose the Turkish Government had sent a secret and confidential agent to Washington, and a treaty had been concluded with him by the Secretary of State, as the agent of the President, can it be reasonably pretended that the appointment of the Secretary as agent would not have been a constitutional exercise of power by the President, according to all past usage? If it would have been, casuistry itself could not condemn the appointment of the secret agents who had been sent to Constantinople.

Mr. F. believed the conduct of the President strictly correct, if it could be shown that the negotiation with Turkey ought to have been kept secret. The motives for a secret negotiation were to him obvious and satisfactory. The United States could have no desire for any political connexion with Turkey; a commercial treaty had long been considered important, and it had always been deemed prudent to seek to establish commercial relations with that Government by informal secret agents. It has been thought that an informal agency would be more likely to succeed than a public minister; the mission of a confidential informal agent would not create a belief that we were too anxious to succeed, while his secret negotiation would not be liable to be defeated by the influence of the great Powers who were represented at Constantinople. It was apprehended that some of the European Governments, none of whom dislike to monopolize power and commerce, might not be pleased to see Jonathan's long sickle thrust into the golden harvests that grow on the borders of the Euxine, and might possibly use some little artifices to prevent it. There was some pride, too, in refraining from a public effort to make a treaty when success was so problematical, and with this pride was mingled no small portion of Yankee economy. A public mission to the Turkish Government, successful or unfortunate, was always expensive, and there was a wise determination not to expend the public money, if the object in view could not be accomplished. One of the Senators from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] had dwelt with strong emphasis upon the character Mr. Rhind gave himself in a letter to the Secretary of State. Suppose that the respectable and worthy man had, in the vanity of recent, and, as he honestly believed, important success, considered himself as a high diplomatic character, his view of it did not determine his character; and that could not, from the papers before the Senate, be mistaken. To the often repeated question, of how did these agents differ from public ministers, Mr. F. saw but one answer—they were not accredited by the heads of the foreign Government with whom they transacted business—they carried no letters credential, and were entitled to no privileges. It was not Mr. F.'s purpose, nor was it necessary for the vindication of the administration, to sustain the propriety of this distinction between agents and ministers; he had accomplished his object by proving that it had been early and constantly made, and by no Presidents more frequently than those who were given to us by Virginia.

The honorable Senator who led the way in this discussion, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] not satisfied with having charged the cabinet with a palpable violation of the constitution, seemed determined to make the impression that there had been an insidious design in the manner of asking for the appropriation to pay the Turkish commissioners. He imagined the Secretary of State wished to entrap the Senate into a sanction of the original appointment of these confidential agents. "The Secretary knew," the gentleman said, "at the beginning of the session of Congress, that this appropriation would be wanted. The Secretary asked it not of the House of Representatives, where appropriations ought properly to originate; but, at this late day of the Senate, through their Committee of Finance." No desire to receive a sanction of the appointment of these commissioners could exist, after the treaty formed by them had been ratified, without the slightest intimation from the Senate that there had been any irregularity in the manner of appointing them. The history of the transaction is an ample refutation of this ungenerous charge. The Turkish treaty was not disposed of until the general appropriation bill had passed the House of Representatives; the appropriation for the payment of the service rendered could not be asked for until the question on that treaty was decided here; and when it was decided, the appropriation was requested where only it could properly be made. The assertion of the gentleman, that appropriation bills ought properly to originate in the House of Representatives, was not American in its character; it was borrowed from England. The House of Commons of the English Parliament asserts its right to originate all money bills; the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States had no exclusive right to originate any bills but those for raising revenue; and recent circumstances were well calculated to raise a doubt of the propriety of that restriction upon the power of the Representatives of the States. Even revenue bills could be amended in the Senate, and the appropriation under discussion could be properly made if the English rule was to govern our practice. There was in this case a peculiar propriety in asking the appropriation of the Senate. When these commissioners were appointed by the President, he might have paid their services out of his contingent fund; but scrupulously desirous not to use the discretion over it vested in him, when it was not absolutely necessary, he directed the commissioners to be told, "your expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund, and such compensation for your services as Congress may allow." Now, sir, to have asked this appropriation of the House of Representatives in the first instance, would have been to apply to persons who had not, and cannot have, until the ratifications of the Turkish treaty are exchanged, the means of judging what sum ought to be paid for the service rendered. The Senate does know, and no doubt the House will so far rely upon our knowledge and discretion as to approve the sum that may be fixed upon here. The Executive is unfortunate, when his scrupulous anxiety to consult the representatives of the people, and of the States, in the expenditure of public money, gives birth to a charge of insidiously attempting to make the Senate connive at a violation of the constitution, and approve of his usurpation of their rightful power.

The services rendered by the commissioners had been slightly spoken of. Some supposed that a treaty with Turkey was of no consequence, since the treaty of Adrianople between Russia and Turkey had opened the channel into the Black Sea to all nations. It was true, that, by the stipulations of that treaty, the Turks bound themselves to Russia to admit all Powers at peace with the Ottoman Porte into the Black Sea; and Russia was expressly authorized to consider a disregard of that stipulation as just cause of war. Still the treaty of Adrianople, dependent, as it is, upon the continuance of peace between Russia and Turkey, gave the United States no claim upon Turkey to a free passage through the canal of Constantinople: in fact, Americans who ventured into the golden horn were not permitted to pass through the Black Sea. No doubt the Government might have solicited from the Emperor of Russia his interference to secure the observance of the treaty made with him. His answer would certainly have been, I wish you to have a commerce with all my dominions; but at present I cannot prudently go to war to compel the Turks to fulfil this engagement. Whenever circumstances permit, I shall recollect and punish this disregard of the promises made to me. Was it not better to procure from the Ottoman Porte itself the right to a participation of the commerce of the Black Sea—a right which would be independent of the state of war or peace with Russia, than thus to have solicited the exertion of Russian power for our benefit? The treaty of Adrianople, without doubt, facilitated our success. That our object could not have been reached without a treaty, is certain. We know that, under the Turkish construction of the treaty of Adrianople, nations not having treaties with Turkey are not admitted into the Black Sea—that nations having commercial treaties, since the treaty of Adrianople, have sought admission under the protection of the promise to Russia, and that it has been refused; the answer made to both was, the engagement made with Russia does not alter our treaties with other Powers. The honorable Senator from Virginia on his right [Mr. TAZEWELL] had spoken of the inconsiderable benefits likely to arise out of the commerce to the Turkish and Russian settlements on the Black Sea. There was no recent information on which a certain calculation could be made of the benefits that would probably result to the country from this negotiation. The commercial community would, as the most intelligent merchants believed, profit by it. The navigating interests certainly would, unless the owners of ships had lost their ancient skill and enterprise. In the present depressed condition of the navigating interest, perishing under the paralyzing influence of our internal policy, the administration had done its duty in looking to our external policy for its relief. Mr. F. had, with some diligence, sought for accurate information. Although his labor had not been as well rewarded as he could have wished, he had yet collected some facts, gleaned from the history of past years, which would afford gentlemen the means of approaching the truth in making an estimate of the probable benefits of a free commerce into the Black Sea.

After being closed by the Turks upon all the world for near three hundred years, from 1476 to 1774, the passage of the Black Sea was opened to Russian vessels by treaty in 1774. On the 25th of June, 1802, by a treaty formed at Paris, the French flag was admitted into the Black Sea; and, shortly after, the liberty of navigating it was successfully demanded by, and yielded to, the other commercial European Powers.

In 1803, 815 vessels took in cargoes in the Russian ports of the Black Sea: 552 at Odessa, 210 at Taganrog, 23 at Caffa, 19 at Kosloo, 7 at Sevastopol, and 4 at Cherson. Of these, 421 were Austrian, 329 Russian, 18 Ragusan, 16 Ionian, 15 French, 7 English, 6 Idriots, and 3 Spanish.

In 1817, 1925 vessels entered the port of Odessa alone: 480 Russian, 188 Austrian, 154 English, 43 French, 18 Spanish, 49 Swedish, 31 Sardinian, 65 Turkish, 7 Danish, 7 Neapolitan, 2 Sicilian, and 881 Russian, engaged in the coasting trade. In the same year, 400 entered the port of Taganrog. In 1808, there was an importation at Odessa of 33,131 bales of cotton. In 1817, the freight of a single article of commerce, wheat, shipped to Leghorn from the Black Sea, amounted to $1,350,000. All these facts related to the Russian dominions: when it was taken into view that the Turkish dominions on the borders of the Euxine included large cities, with a population exceeding 260,000 souls, standing on the borders of rich settlements, one of them, Trebisond, in the direct line of intercourse with the Persian Gulf, it might be fairly concluded that the owners of our ships would find, if true to themselves, profitable employment for their now almost useless property. The prospect of present advantage was nothing when compared to that which might be anticipated hereafter. The Black Sea had been, at more than one era, the heart of an active and lucrative industry. Prior to the establishment of the Ottoman empire, its waves had been ploughed by the keels of all commercial nations. Its shores had been studded with populous and prosperous cities, and with productive settlements. Under the power of Russian despotism, which is operating as the genius of civilization in that portion of the globe, it is again becoming the centre of attraction to commercial enterprise. The Russian dominions, from the mouths of the Danube to the ports of St. Nicholas, south of the Phasis or Rione, are advancing in population and wealth with a rapidity unexampled in the history of the old world, and rivalled only by the almost incredible progress of our own country. Sanguine tempers might be deceived in their estimate of the benefits to the country to be derived now or hereafter from this successful effort at negotiation. Mr. F. believed the country would applaud those who had made it, should the hopes of profit be disappointed, realized, or exceeded.

Mr. F. could not dismiss the subject of this appropriation, without again remonstrating on the course of the Senators from Virginia; against the unusual—the anti-American substitution of the irresponsible for the responsible. There was no head too high, no bosom too sacred, to be reached by the stroke of patriotism, if justice demanded the blow. Mr. F. spoke not to shield individuals; he remonstrated against the erroneous and dangerous principle acted upon, from public considerations. It was not Virginia. He deprecated it for the honor of the Ancient Dominion, from whose soil he sprang; for he, too, was a Virginian. Virginia had heretofore struck at the loftiest objects; the lightning of her indignation had shivered the gnarled oak—had not glided through its branches to blast the saplings that grew around its noble trunk. The Chief Magistrate and his Secretaries stand upon their respective responsibilities; let them be judged by facts, and upon facts only; and each in his respective sphere was ready to receive, and submit to the judgment of the people. If any or all of them deserve condemnation, let them perish; by Mr. F. they would fall unpitied and unwept.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., said he rose because he did not perceive that any other Senator was disposed to speak on the subject, and because he thought it his duty, as chairman, to sustain the amendment proposed to the appropriation bill by the Committee of Finance. What is that amendment? said Mr. S. Simply an appropriation to pay certain persons employed by the late President to negotiate with the Ottoman Porte, in which they had been nearly successful; and to pay certain other persons appointed by the present President, who had completely succeeded in making an excellent treaty with the Porte. Both commissions had similar powers and similar instructions. The treaty has been confirmed by the Senate; has been highly approved; and the question is, will you pay for the labor actually performed? An amendment has been offered by a Senator, [Mr. KANE,] to apply a sum fully adequate to the object in aid of the contingent fund, to enable the President to remunerate the parties in such manner as he may think proper. Either mode will be equally agreeable to me. All that the committee require is, that the persons employed shall be paid; and they are willing to adopt the amendment proposed, as they find that amendment most approved of by the Senate. It is proper, however, for me to state, that the committee had had before them both modes of remuneration, and, after consideration, proposed bringing the subject before the Senate in a substantive form, so that all who read might understand the object, and because they deemed it to be more consistent for Congress to designate what they meant to pay to each person, than to leave to the Executive discretion to allow what they pleased. The Senator from Georgia has shown a precedent in the case of Mr. Rodney, who, it was determined by Congress, should be paid from the contingent fund, and I acquiesced.

I little thought, Mr. President, that a constitutional question would or could have been raised upon a question to pay for services rendered; it has, however, and we must meet it as best we can. Early in my political life, I asked a friend whether it was true that "Rhode Island was without a written constitution;" he answered that "it was true;" that they did well under their charter from Charles; and he added, "that a written constitution was like a nose of wax, which could be moulded into a flat nose, a Roman, a Grecian, or pug nose, and in like manner an ingenious man might, he said, make the constitution of the United States to mean something, nothing, any thing, or every thing." We have seen that it has been made to mean every thing, by the construction put on the words "general welfare;" and the very ingenious Senator from Virginia shows that he thinks that it may be made to mean any thing. He contends, first, that the President has not the power to send a minister to a foreign court during the recess of the Senate, where no minister had previously been sent; that it is a new office which he has not the power to create alone; and, secondly, that the President has not the power to send a commissioner in the recess of the Senate, as a secret agent to treat with a foreign nation, without nominating such agent to the Senate.

Those subjects have been ably, and, to my mind, satisfactorily discussed by the Senators from Louisiana and Georgia; nor would I enter on those subjects, if the Senator from Virginia had not, in a manner very pleasing to me, observed, that I had been consistent in my opinion of the constitution on the first point; evidently conveying the idea, by his manner, and by what he said, that I studied more the expediency of a measure, than the true meaning of the words of the constitution. It therefore made it incumbent on me to state my understanding of the points submitted by that Senator. We are all bound by our oaths "to support the constitution of the United States." Each will, or ought to be governed by his conscience, and by his own judgment. I meddle not with those of that Senator, or any other; they are their own. I bottom the opinion I shall give on the powers vested in the President, in part, from never having heard the first doubted until the discussion on the Panama mission; and of the second, until this time. I consider both those powers as admitted. They may have been mooted. I will not say they have not. If they ever had been, it has totally escaped my recollection. My construction of the constitution is, "That ministers to foreign nations, is an office created by the constitution, and not by law." The article says, "that the President shall have power to appoint ambassadors, and other public ministers, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Again, he shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. I contend that the office of minister is an original vacancy, and that it can be filled in the recess of the Senate, to any place that, in the mind of the President, a minister may be required, by the exigency of the case. If the Senate think that such an exigency does not exist, they can reject the nomination, which must be sent to it on the first session thereafter, and this is the power of the Senate; more than that they have not, and, in my opinion, that power is amply sufficient for the correction of any probable evil that might arise from such a power. I will state a case. We have never had a minister to Austria. The President might, in my opinion, send, in the recess, a minister to that court. He has, I think, the power under the constitution, and we have the power to reject. Am I alone in this opinion? No, sir, my learned friend from Louisiana holds the same. We were both fellow-laborers on the democratic side a long time past, and both agree that it had been a received opinion. Have I, Mr. President, no other authority? Yes, sir, that of the great apostle of the democratic party, Mr. Jefferson. He gave a practical illustration of his opinion; and, with all proper deference to the Senators of Virginia, I must think that he was as able an expounder of the constitution as those gentlemen. Mr. Madison was then the Secretary of State, and must have concurred in the act, which he did. We have all been in the habit of believing that he was an expounder of the constitution, in whom we might safely trust; and yet the Senator [Mr. TAZEWELL] has implicated Mr. Jefferson in his charge of a violation of the constitution, by his appointment, in a recess, of Mr. Short to Russia, where no minister from the United States had been before. He did appoint Mr. Short to Russia. This amply proves that his opinion was, "that he had the power." Ay; but, says the Senator, "the Senate rejected the nomination, on the ground that the President had not the power." Admit it. Does that contradict what I have said? No, sir; Mr. Jefferson believed as I do, that he had the power, and he acted on it, which is the best possible proof. But did the Senate reject it, on the ground of its being a usurpation of power? Certainly not. I was then a Senator, and know that the rejection of Mr. Short was for causes and reasons entirely different. The question of power may have been incidentally mooted by some of our speakers. I will not trust to my memory to say that it was not. But this I can say, that, if animadverted on by any Senator, it has totally escaped my recollection. I think it would have made such an impression on my mind, that I should not have forgotten it. I repeat that it was not on the question of power that Mr. Short had been rejected. The first time I heard that the power was doubted, was on the Panama question, when Mr. Gore's resolutions were read. Those resolutions were presented on the nomination of the commissioners sent in the recess, by Mr. Madison, to make a treaty of peace with Great Britain. I was not then a Senator. Party spirit ran high at that time; and we all know that those resolutions were calculated for party purposes, merely electioneering. What was their fate? Scouted by every democratic Senator as untenable, and by some of the federal Senators. I can name three. The two members from Rhode Island, and one from Delaware. And this is the only document that the Senator has produced to sustain his charge against Mr. Jefferson, for a violation of the constitution—a simple resolution presented—not acted on—and not sustained by the Senate. It died, I believe, a natural death. Against those resolutions, and the opinion of the Senator, I am supported by the opinion of Jefferson, Madison, my learned friend from Louisiana, and by the conduct of other administrations, and the decision of the Senate on the Panama question. Let the people and my constituents judge which of us have produced the best authorities. But, on all constitutional questions, I am the sole judge for myself. I rest on my oath, and as my poor judgment directs.

The Senator has said, and truly said, that the constitution gives the same power to the President in the case of the appointment of judges, as it does in that of ministers to foreign nations. I agree that the power is exactly similar in every respect. He then asks triumphantly, "will any man say that the President could appoint in the recess as many judges as he might think proper?" I answer, yes—if he had not been restrained by law. I will state a case. Suppose the Senate had risen without confirming the nominations of the first judges made by General Washington; there would have been presented the anomaly of laws, without judges to expound and administer them. The President is bound by the constitution to attend to the execution of the laws. Without judges that duty could not have been performed. The constitution created the office of judge, and, in my opinion, it would have been the duty of President Washington to appoint judges in the recess, to be nominated to the Senate, at their next session, for their approbation or rejection. Offices recognised by the constitution or the laws must be filled by the appointment of the President during the recess of the Senate, when the public good requires it; and the corrective of his exercise of this power lies in the Senate's power of rejecting. "But," said the same Senator, "we have now seven judges; can the President appoint an eighth in the recess of the Senate?" I answer, no: because the law has established the number, which he cannot exceed, and that number is seven. He could not appoint an eighth either in the recess or during the session of the Senate, until the law is altered, and an increase of the number authorized.

The Senator [Mr. TAZEWELL] has emphatically told us, not on his opinion, but positively, peremptorily, that "the President had committed a palpable violation of the constitution in sending commissioners in the recess to make a treaty with the Porte, without nominating them to the Senate, in derogation of the rights of this body." This, Mr. President, is a grave charge against that high officer. What is the meaning of the word "palpable?" Johnson says that one of its meanings is "plain, easily perceptible." That is to say, so plain and easy to be understood, that he who reads must understand. Is it then so plain? It appears that the gentlemen from New Hampshire, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Georgia, do not find it so plain; they cannot, they have said, see any violation whatever, nor can I; nor has any of all our Presidents been able to see it. For, sir, in all but one of the administrations the same act has been done. All the Presidents have, then, been violators of the constitution; the Senate also, for every Senate has sanctioned the violation. And now, for the first time, it is to be understood that it is a violation; and it is to be charged home on Andrew Jackson, as the only one who has committed the sacrilege. Is this fair, is it proper? When the Senator must have known that Gen. Jackson had pursued and acted upon the course of all his predecessors from Washington down, as well as on his own opinion. The President is the only responsible officer. It will not do to go behind him to attack the Secretary of State, (for I think it probable that he alone was consulted, and he alone was the adviser.) It will not do for the Senator to say that he, the President, knew little of the subject, and acted because he was ignorant, and therefore ought to be excused. No, sir; if he has done wrong, if he has palpably violated the sacred instrument that he has sworn to support, ignorance can be no plea; and this excuse for him is a more violent insult than any that could be offered; at least so I understand it. But, Mr. President, has there been any violation of the constitution? The Senators who have preceded me, think not, and I concur with them in opinion. Has any President ever submitted to the Senate the nomination of commissioners such as those under consideration? Never: I challenge those Senators to show one solitary instance. I do not confine my question to Mahometan but to christian Powers, which if they cannot, (and I know they cannot,) then how can the Senator [Mr. TAZEWELL] charge the President, General Jackson, with having committed "a flagrant usurpation of power, in flagrant derogation of the powers of the Senate?" How can the Senator from Virginia urge "that he may like the treason, therefore voted for the treaty, but detests the traitor."

Mr. President, rising so late in the debate, I have found all that I mean to say taken from me by the Senators from Louisiana and Georgia, and more ably certainly than I would have conveyed them. I may, however, be pardoned for following them, and perhaps repeating after them. It cannot be too often urged that General Jackson has pursued the precedent set him by all, or almost every one of his predecessors. The Senator from Louisiana has read to you a variety of instances of commissioners who had been sent by different Presidents, treaties made by them, and confirmed by the Senate without any nomination, and not a word lisped of its being unconstitutional: the Senate thus confirming the constitutionality of the power that had been exercised. The Senator from Georgia has produced others. One by General Washington in 1795. In that, the power under the great seal and the sign manual of the "Father of his Country," was given to Mr. Humphreys, then a consul or minister resident (I know not which) at Lisbon to make a treaty with the Emperor of Morocco. Mr. Humphreys transferred his powers to Mr. Simpson, who made a treaty which became the law of the land. Was either Mr. Simpson or Mr. Humphreys ever nominated to the Senate? Never. Not a whimper of unconstitutionality. The Senate slept at their post, and now General Washington is found by the Senator from Virginia to be a palpable violator of the constitution. Again, Messrs. Rodney, Bland, and Graham were sent as commissioners to the South American States—christian States. Were they ever nominated to the Senate? No, sir. The late President gave a commission to Mr. Offley and Commodore Crane, to treat with the Porte. Were they ever nominated to the Senate? No, sir. So that Mr. Adams was also a violator; Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison did the same. Mr. Monroe followed after, and acted in like manner. Where were the advisers of those gentlemen. Where the advisers of Mr. Monroe? For it is well known that he acted on full advisement of his cabinet. Where, I ask, were they all, that they did not prevent him from committing this presumed violence of the constitution? Were they all asleep at their posts? We must conclude that none of them considered it a violation of power.

The Senator from Virginia said that it would be a thing unheard of, unknown to the history of the world, "that a Power at war should send a minister to the Power with which it was at war." Why, Mr. President, the Senator's reading and mine must have been very different. Mine says, that there is no event more common. I am now reading Sismondi's Italian Republics. The small States of Italy were in almost perpetual war with each other; and nothing more common than the sending ministers from one city to the other to treat whilst war raged between them. But, sir, I will read some recent cases, some in which we had an interest:

"Preliminary articles of the treaty of peace between

[SENATE.]

France and Great Britain, signed at Versailles, 20th January, 1783.

"The most Christian King and the King of Great Britain, wishing to put an end to the calamities of war, nominated to that effect, on the part of the former, the Count of Vergennes, and, of the latter, Alioy Fitzherbert, Esq. minister plenipotentiary of his said Majesty the King of Great Britain, who, having communicated their full powers in the form, have agreed upon the following preliminaries:"

SECOND.—Preliminary articles of peace signed at London, 1st October, 1801, between Lord Hawkesbury and Louis William Otto. They communicated their full powers in due form, and then agreed upon the articles.

In 1797, Lord Malmesbury was sent to Lisle, a city of the French republic, as ambassador with full powers to conclude a peace.

In 1806, Lord Lauderdale was sent to Paris to negotiate a treaty of peace.

Permit me to submit another; a very strong one. Queen Anne wanted peace; the allies were not so disposed, and she sent a secret agent, Matthew Prior, I believe a poet. He was not suspected; for who would suppose that a poet would be sent on a subject so important? He concluded the peace. It was then made public; and the Queen withdrew her troops from the allied army.

The late period of the session warns me that I ought not to occupy any more of your time, and I conclude with a hope that the discussion may now terminate.

Before I sit down, I will notice an observation made by the Senator, [Mr. TAZEWELL.] He significantly sneered at the employment of consuls and captains of our ships of war being clothed with plenipotentiary powers to make treaties. "Consuls!" said he, "What! are they superior to justices of the peace? Captains of the navy with their commission in their pockets," significantly. And yet, sir, consuls and captains have been so employed by the best of our Presidents. Washington employed Mr. Consul Humphreys, as has been shown. Jefferson employed Mr. Lear and Captain Preble to treat with Tripoli. Madison employed Consul Shaler and Captain Decatur to treat with Algiers. John Quincy Adams employed Captain Rodgers to sound the Turk, that he might know his disposition to make a treaty, and actually appointed Consul Offley and Captain Crane to make a treaty with the Porte; and General Jackson has employed consuls Rhind and Offley, and Captain Biddle, to make a treaty. They have done so to the satisfaction of the Senator. And now, for the first time, is fault found that such persons have been employed. Why? Because General Jackson has so acted, sir. We all understand the cause, and so will the people. I have done.

No other Senator rising to debate the subject, the Senate proceeded to take the question.

For the convenience of the reader, the various amendments are here repeated. The Committee of Finance of the Senate had reported the following additional items to the appropriation bill:

"For the outfit and salary of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; for the salaries of a secretary of legation, of a drogoman, and a student of languages, at Constantinople, and for the contingent expenses of the legation, seventy-four thousand dollars: that is to say, for the outfit of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, nine thousand dollars; for the salary of the same, nine thousand dollars; for salary of a secretary of legation, two thousand dollars; for the salary of a drogoman, two thousand five hundred dollars; for the salary of a student of languages, one thousand five hundred dollars; for the contingent expenses of the legation, fifty thousand dollars.

["For compensation to the commissioners employed in negotiating a treaty with the Sublime Porte:

"To Charles Rhind, an outfit of four thousand five hundred dollars, deducting therefrom whatever sum may have been paid to him for his personal expenses.

"To Charles Rhind, David Offley, and James Biddle, at the rate of four thousand five hundred dollars per annum for the time that each of them was engaged in the said negotiation.

"For compensation to the commissioners employed on a former occasion for a similar purpose:

"To William M. Crane and David Offley, at the rate of four thousand five hundred dollars per annum for the time that each of them was engaged in the said negotiation."]

Mr. TAZEWELL had moved to strike out all the foregoing included in brackets.

Mr. KANE's amendment was as follows:

Strike out all after the word "compensation," in the first line of the second paragraph above quoted, and insert "to the persons heretofore employed in our intercourse with the Sublime Porte, the further sum of fifteen thousand dollars, in addition to the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars appropriated for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse."

This motion of Mr. KANE to strike out and insert having precedence of Mr. TAZEWELL's motion, the question was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Troup, Woodbury.—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Bibb, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Tyler, Willey, Webster.—21.

The question was then taken on the following proviso, moved by Mr. TYLER, to be added to Mr. KANE's amendment, viz.

"Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as sanctioning, or in any way approving, the appointment of these persons by the President alone, during the recess of the Senate, and without their advice and consent, as commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Ottoman Porte."

Which was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Ellis, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Johnston, King, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Poindexter, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Tyler, Webster, Willey.—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, Livingston, McKinley, Robbins, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Troup, Woodbury.—18.

Mr. TAZEWELL then withdrew his motion to strike out, and the united amendments of Messrs. KANE and TYLER consequently became a substitute for that part of the amendment reported by the Committee of Finance, providing for the compensation of the commissioners appointed to conclude the treaty.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following amendment:

Strike out all that relates to the outfit and salary of a minister plenipotentiary, &c. and insert—

"For the outfit and salary of a chargé d'affaires; for the salary of a drogoman, and a student of languages, at Constantinople, and for the contingent expenses of the legation, thirty-eight thousand dollars: that is to say, for the outfit of a chargé d'affaires, four thousand five hundred dollars; for the salary of the same, four thousand five hundred dollars; for the salary of a drogoman, two thousand five hundred dollars; for the salary of a student of languages, one thousand five hundred dollars; for the contingent expenses of the legation, twenty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. WEBSTER said that this subject had been presented to the Senate in a double aspect by the President of the United States—the choice appeared to be left to that body whether they would send a minister plenipotentiary or a chargé d'affaires to the court of Constantinople; and the Committee of Finance had submitted an appropriation for the salary and outfit of the former. One of the letters read to the Senate, that from Mr. Olney, who certainly appeared to have had some experience on this subject, suggested the propriety of sending a chargé d'affaires, and in this opinion he [Mr. W.] most heartily concurred. Mr. W. spoke at some length in favor of his motion; said he could see no very great necessity for the mission—that he thought our relations with Turkey would continue pretty much in the same state as before—and that, for some time to come, our consul at Smyrna would be the most important agent of the United States in that quarter of the world. He spoke of the large salaries of the ministers of foreign Powers at the court of Constantinople, the great show and parade they made there, wholly for effect, and said that, if our ministers complained of the incompetence of their salaries at the courts of the civilized Powers of Europe, there certainly would be more cause of complaint at Constantinople. He would like to know whether the mission was to be continued; whether a similar call for salaries, &c. would be made next year; spoke of the large amount appropriated for contingencies; and asked if it was supposed that the minister could support himself at a salary of $9,000 per annum. If a representative must be sent, he thought a chargé d'affaires would be competent to perform all the necessary duties; though, even if his amendment prevailed, his opinion was, that another mission in Europe should not be established. He was not in favor of an increase of missions—he would rather reduce some of those now existing.

Mr. KING said that the subject had been submitted to the Committee of Finance without any recommendation from the Executive; and, after consultation, that committee had come to the conclusion that it would be best to submit an appropriation for the salary of a minister plenipotentiary. The salary would command the services of an individual who would be qualified to sustain the character and standing of the country, and enable him the better to keep up a suitable establishment. He was under the impression that it would not be necessary to keep a minister at Constantinople for any great length of time. The contingencies of the mission would not be greater than at the court of any other Power, except in the first instance; and this to comply with the usual custom there to make presents on the ratification of a treaty.

Mr. WOODBURY was in favor of the amendment submitted by Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. FORSYTH also preferred the amendment; though he saw no necessity, he said, for political relations between this country and Turkey.

Mr. SMITH recapitulated the views of the Committee of Finance in providing for a minister plenipotentiary, and said the Government did not intend keeping him there more than one year. The object was to send a minister of the highest grade, in the first instance, whose duty it would be to exchange the ratifications of the treaty, and afterwards a chargé d'affaires would be amply sufficient. A minister plenipotentiary, he remarked, had access to the Sultan; a chargé could not approach beyond the Grand Vizier.

The question was put on the amendment submitted by Mr. WEBSTER, and determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, Willey, Woodbury.—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Dudley, Ellis, King, Livingston, Sanford, Smith, of Md.—7.

And then the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. BENTON relative to the foreign commerce of the United States, was taken up for consideration; when Mr. B. remarked that he had not submitted the resolution with a view to its being acted on at the present session, but that it might receive the early consideration of the Senate at the next stated session of Congress. On his motion, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvement, and providing for surveys, was twice read, and referred.

NATIONAL ROAD IN OHIO.

The bill granting the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Ohio, for erecting toll-gates, &c., and otherwise providing for the preservation and repair of the United States' road within the limits of that State, was read the third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. POINDEXTER opposed the bill at some length, on the ground that the General Government had no power to give the authority proposed to the State of Ohio. If the right to collect tolls existed in the State, the permission was not only useless, but a usurpation of power on the part of the General Government over the rights and sovereignty of the State. If, on the contrary, the right belonged to the General Government, it was a power not transferable, as no legislative power could be. He cited the only clause in the constitution which gave a pretext for interfering with the internal regulation of a State—that relating to imposts. He asked what they were about to do? To pass a criminal law for the State of Ohio! For this was a bill enacting severe pains, penalties, and fines. It was also a law to create a local tax, which no article in the constitution had ever sanctioned. To contend that Congress possessed such powers, would be admitted on all hands to be an absurdity. He would willingly give up this road to the State—transferring all the right, title, and interest the General Government had in it—but he could not consent to any interference with State rights. He, therefore, felt constrained to ask for the yeas and nays on its final passage.

They were accordingly ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, some power must have an interest in this road. If it existed in the General Government, its preservation belonged to that power; but that Government had already declared that it would not erect toll-gates upon the road; and, if we refuse to preserve the road, why should we not allow some one else to do it? If we go upon the principle, that the right to do this exists in the State of Ohio, what harm can there be in our declaring our assent to the passage of this law by that State? Her proposition is certainly a liberal one; and all admit the necessity of keeping the road in repair. He thought the proposition to transfer the road to Ohio would be much more objectionable than the present one could be considered. The citizens of other States, Indiana, for instance, had a deep interest in it. It was their great thoroughfare, and its cession to a State would be a gross violation of the compact formed in its original construction.

The bill was then passed, by a vote of twenty-nine to seven, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md., Webster, Willey, Woodbury.—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Ellis, Hayne, Iredell, Poindexter, Smith, of S. C., Troup.—7.

Duties on Iron.

[SENATE.]

DUTIES ON IRON.

Mr. HAYNE, from the select committee to which was referred sundry memorials praying for a reduction of the duties on imported iron, and others remonstrating against the reduction, made a report in favor of reduction, and moved that it be printed.

Mr. DICKERSON said, the report was from the majority of the committee; the sentiments of the minority were directly at variance with those of the majority. The report had come under his eye for the first time on yesterday, and he had not yet had time to prepare a report of the views of the minority. He should probably be able to do so on Monday. He thought the views of both parties should go to the world together, and he therefore hoped the printing would not be ordered until the counter report was ready to go with the report of the majority of the committee. He moved to lay the report on the table, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. KING, who said the statement made by the Senator who had just taken his seat, was one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard. Committees were seldom unanimous; it was generally the majority of the committee which reported measures for consideration. If the minority were not satisfied, they had always an opportunity to present their individual views. He believed such a thing as a counter report had not been known in this body from the first commencement of the Government. It had been done, he believed, in the House of Representatives. When the report was made to the House, the committee ceased to exist, and it was not in the power of the minority to make a report.

Mr. DICKERSON thought that the views of the two branches of the committee should be published together. It was a frequent custom in the House of Representatives, and should be so here. The minority should have as good an opportunity to present their views as the majority of the committee.

Mr. HAYNE said this was the first proposition he had ever heard in that body to prevent the printing of a report of a committee. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Manufactures [Mr. DICKERSON] had made his reports, year after year, and no objection had ever been made to the printing of them. The report contained nothing more than the views of the committee, and the only object was to have it printed. The objection of the gentleman was, that he had not had time to prepare his views on the subject, and, therefore, the report of the committee must not be printed. How was it possible for the honorable Senator to make a report on the part of the minority, when the committee had made its report, and were consequently dissolved? If the gentleman wished to present his views, he could do it in writing or otherwise. He had understood that there was so much work in the hands of the public printer, that, if he did not get this report now, it could not be printed during the session. He hoped the gentleman would not renew the motion to lay the report on the table.

Mr. BROWN said, it appeared that an entirely new rule was about to be pursued by the Senate—one unparalleled in the annals of legislation—that subjects were to be sent to committees totally hostile to the objects asked by the memorialists, and known to be thus hostile. And when those who are friendly to a reduction of the existing burdensome system of taxation, had been so fortunate as to get this subject referred to a committee favorable to their views, and that committee had made a report to that effect, a new rule was to be adopted, and that report suppressed. Sir, said Mr. B., political truths have nothing to fear from the most scrutinizing investigation. Do gentlemen fear light upon their favorite schemes, that they would thus elude inquiry on this subject? Was this a time when the people of this country had every reason to demand a reduction of an oppressive system of taxation, that even the ordinary courtesy of printing a report, looking to that object, was to be refused? He would draw no other inference from such a course, but that it was to arrest the progress of truth, and prevent information from going abroad on this subject among the people—a principle at war with our free representative Government, which should seek, on all proper occasions, to enlighten public opinion on questions so deeply involving their interests, rather than to suppress information; it was characteristic of that course of policy which arbitrarily laid under contribution the industry of the great mass of the American people, for the benefit of a comparatively small number of capitalists. He expressed a hope that the report would be printed, and its arguments placed before the people for their calm consideration. He said he had great confidence in the justice and liberality of the Northern and Eastern sections of the country. Public opinion, in some of the Eastern States, he believed, was becoming adverse to a continuance of the restrictive policy; and he thought he could see a light arising in that direction, which assured him that the days of this "system" were numbered.

The spirit of liberty which had early distinguished the people of that portion of our country, would not much longer tolerate a system which flourished alone by sacrificing the interests of the many to those of the few. He believed it was now becoming well understood, that an excessive degree of taxation was not protection but oppression.

Mr. HOLMES said he was disposed to hear both sides of this question, and, therefore, he was in favor of allowing both reports, as they took different views of the subject, to go out together. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] says he will be prepared on Monday to submit the views of the minority; and, for his own part, he should prefer to see them go together. He could then be in favor of printing a larger number of copies. This had not, perhaps, been the usual practice of the Senate, but it certainly had been of the other House. He instanced particularly the report of the Committee on the Seminole War.

Mr. BELL said, the object of appointing committees was, to digest the subjects referred to them, and obtain their views in aid of the action of the Senate. In this instance, the committee had not only disagreed in relation to facts, but widely disagreed in their opinions deduced from those facts. The minority ask to give their views in conjunction with the majority. Without this, he conceived that they could get but a one-sided view of the matter. He asked who it was in the present case that appeared to be anxious to shut out the light? It surely was not the minority. They do not shrink from investigation. They rather court it. At this late period in the session, it was evident that there could be no legislative action upon it now. In relation to its being unparliamentary, he thought all legislative bodies should be governed in their rules by the eternal principles of justice.

Mr. WEBSTER said it would give him pleasure to gratify the views of all in the disposal of this subject. He was willing to give the people all the information on this topic that could be given. He could freely trust them with the disposal of it. Though the report had not been read, it was plainly understood that it was opposed to the opinions heretofore entertained and expressed by the Senate; and it was due to the people not to hold out to them the expectation that the existing policy was about to be changed, unless that expectation was soon to be realized. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Brown,] he conceived, had misapplied the rule he had adverted to. There was no particular parliamentary usage which was binding in the case. When a legislative body had come to a definite conclusion upon a subject—when its principles were settled, it could then have no hesitation in the direction to give it. But, suppose a proposition should come before them on which it would be quite impossible for them to act—a dissolution of the Union, for instance—could the rule then apply?

Mr. W. said he could have no motive in wishing to withhold the printing of this document; on the contrary, he would be willing to have a larger number printed; but he thought it was due to all that both sides of the question should be heard. In relation to the report, he could entertain no doubt, from the respectable character of the committee, that it contained many able arguments and clear views of the subject. He would go further. He had no doubt he would approve of it on many points. There were some positions taken in the memorials referred, which met his hearty concurrence.

After some further observations,

Mr. W. moved that the report be printed, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures. This course would, perhaps, meet the views of all.

Mr. BROWN said he disagreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] most widely in his views of parliamentary usage. He contended that it was the practice to commit matters to a committee favorable to the accomplishment of the propositions they contained. Such was the doctrine of Jefferson, and such was the doctrine laid down by all the British writers on parliamentary law. The reasoning was, that the lamb should not be sent to the wolf—that being to ensure its destruction. It did not, of course, apply to the case of bills peculiarly disrespectful to the feelings of all, or in direct contravention to the spirit of the constitution—such as the one referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] proposing a dissolution of the Union—and he hoped these words were not used by that gentleman invidiously.

Mr. WEBSTER. Not at all—I had no such intention.

Mr. BROWN. For I will not yield in my attachment to this Union, even to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TYLER addressed the Senate in opposition to the motion of Mr. WEBSTER to refer the report to the Committee on Manufactures. A report on the same subject had been made by that committee at the last session. He thought that one must be very fond of scribbling, (though he did not doubt the purity of the gentleman's motives,) to wish to make a report on the same subject every year. This report was merely a counter report to that submitted by the honorable gentleman last year—a rejoinder. We have now, said Mr. T., our butter and our rebutter. The honorable chairman, he contended, could attain his object simply by ordering his last year's report to be printed with this, and let them go to the world together. He presumed that no alteration had been made in the gentleman's views upon the subject within the last year.

Mr. DICKERSON replied. He was sure the delay till Monday was an inconsiderable one; but he was willing the question should first be taken on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER to refer it to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HAYNE then rose, and said, that he now distinctly understood that the proposition in its present form is, to recommit the report of the select committee before it had been either read or printed—before any member of this House (except the committee) are even acquainted with its contents; and to do this when it is known that the effect of the recommitment will be to prevent the printing of the report during the present session. But this is not all; it is proposed to commit a report (of the contents of which nothing is known, but that it is favorable to a reduction of the duty on iron) to the Committee on Manufactures—a committee known to be opposed to such a reduction. Such a motion, made under such circumstances, he would undertake to say, was not only without an example in the history of either branch of Congress, but without a parallel in the history of parliamentary proceedings any where. When a committee had examined any subject submitted to them by the Senate, and had made a report, the printing of such report for the information of the members was altogether a matter of course. It is not even proposed to print any extra number of copies for distribution, but simply to print the report for the use of the members, as every bill, every report, and every resolution, is disposed of by the uniform practice of this House. Mr. H. said he had now been a member of the Senate for near eight years, and he had never known an objection made to printing the report of any committee, on any subject; and he called upon every member of this body to say whether they ever knew or heard of such proceedings. The mere act of printing a report, committed the Senate in no way to an approval of any thing it contained—it was merely for information, and to enable the Senate to judge what course ought to be taken with regard to it. The Senate might agree or disagree to the report, or might, after examination, recommit it for further examination. But here they were called upon to take an important step, which, in parliamentary usage, amounted to a decision that the subject had not been fairly examined—without even making themselves acquainted with the contents of the report. Mr. H. would present, in behalf of this committee, no claim to the respect or consideration of the Senate, which was not due to every committee which they might think proper to create. But he could say that an act more unprecedented or extraordinary could not be conceived, than to raise a committee, refer to them an important question, and, when their report is received, without hearing it read, or having it printed, to refer it back to another committee (and one known to be hostile) for re-examination. Why was it, he would ask, that such a course was to be pursued on the present occasion? Because it was deemed necessary that the views of those favorable to a reduction of duties should not have the same opportunity of being known, that had invariably been extended to views of an opposite character. For years past has the Committee on Manufactures issued their annual reports, pointing out the excellencies of the American system, and deprecating any reduction of duties whatever. Only last year, a report was made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] in reply to a memorial of these very Philadelphia blacksmiths, denouncing them and their petition. These reports had all been printed and circulated without objection. In no instance had the attempt been made to force upon the Senate a counter report, or to send out an answer along with the report. We have waited until we could have a chance of presenting our views of this question. For the first time in several years, this has been now afforded us; and yet gentlemen rise up, and refuse us the poor privilege even of being heard. The Committee on Manufactures, and the gentleman from New Jersey, who is at their head, have been heard—repeatedly, fully, and patiently heard. They were heard last year on this very question—the reduction of the duty on iron. We now claim to be heard in reply, and it is to be refused us. Gentlemen refuse even to listen to what we have to say. After they have heard us, let them, if they choose, recommit our report or disagree to it, or dispose of it as they think proper. But to condemn it unheard, to commit it without knowing its contents, he must consider as the most exceptional proceeding that he had ever witnessed here or elsewhere. In another view of this question, it was still more objectionable. The subject of the reduction of duties was one which had deeply excited a large portion of this Union. Are we to be told, said Mr. H., that we are not to be heard? This is a subject, Mr. President, in which I am afraid to trust my feelings. I came here, sir, with very slender hopes, indeed, I can hardly say that I had any, that this system would receive some modification from Congress. I am sorry to say that General Appropriation Bill.

[SENATE.]

I have so far perceived no indications of any disposition here to relieve the people from the burdens of this protecting system. For this, I was, however, prepared; but, I will confess, sir, I was not prepared for a deliberate refusal, on the part of the Senate, even to print a report presenting our views, to find them condemned, unheard, and unknown, by an instant recommitment of the report to the Committee on Manufactures—a committee known to be hostile to them, where the report must remain buried for the remainder of the session. If this must be so, I claim a solemn decision on so important a question, and, therefore, ask that it may be taken by yeas and nays.

They were ordered.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was very sorry to see that this subject should excite any warmth in the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE.] He disclaimed the motives attributed to him. He denied any intention to prevent the sentiments of the committee from being heard. Had he not said he would vote for any number of copies the gentleman might propose? What grievance, then, was there in the course proposed? The gentleman had already remarked that the business before the public printer was so pressing, that, unless it was delivered immediately, it could not be performed. It was objected to referring the report without reading. It was with a view to save the time of the Senate, that this course was proposed. After some further remarks, Mr. W. concluded, by saying he should still vote for the printing, and reference of the report to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. KING, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, next addressed the Senate against the motion, and the question was then taken on the printing alone, and decided in the affirmative by a unanimous vote.

Mr. HAYNE asked, as a matter of justice to the select committee, that a censure might not be cast upon them in sending their report to another committee. The course proposed was unprecedented.

Mr. HOLMES said he should vote for the reference, and could not see in what manner it would be a censure on any body.

Mr. FOOT said such a course was altogether unprecedented.

Mr. WEBSTER then said that his object had been to accommodate all sides; but as he had failed in so doing, to save the time of the Senate, he moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question on this motion being taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative—23 to 20.

[So the report was laid on the table, and the decision of this motion in the affirmative had the effect to prevent the printing. It is understood that the views of the committee are in favor of a reduction of the duty on iron imported.]

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate again resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1831—the question being on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of Finance, as yesterday amended.

Mr. FOOT rose to make a few general remarks on the increasing expenditures of the Government.

Mr. F. said, we are indeed fallen on evil times. The application of the "searching operation," mentioned by General Jackson in his inaugural address, has become indispensable to save the treasury from bankruptcy. The siren song of retrenchment, economy, and reform, has lost its fascinating charms. Broad and bold assertions will no longer be received as proof of economy, while the public documents prove them to be false; the people will no longer be deceived by these hackneyed terms, nor can the present administration be screened from censure by charging their predecessors with "wasteful extravagance," when the documents furnish convincing proof that the present is the most extravagant administration that has ever wielded the destinies of the nation. He called the attention of the Senate to the documents in proof of his assertion, and presented a statement taken from the printed reports from the departments, from which he gave the comparative expenditures between the two last years of Mr. Adams's administration, and the two first of General Jackson's.

Making in the whole,	$2,171,779	64

This extraordinary increase of expenditure speaks a language not to be misunderstood. If any Senator doubts the fact, let him examine the printed documents, and he will find the statement correct—the statement before him was taken from those documents.

Do you ask, how can these things be? It is easily accounted for by the increased expense in every department—by establishing new bureaux—by creating new offices—by increasing salaries and contingent expenses—by increasing the number of clerks—and by every other possible means for rewarding political partisans. Fifty-two additional pages in the Blue Book, of names of officers, will give some evidence of an increase in the number—the recalling of four ministers, and some chargés d'affaires, will account for about $80,000 increased expense during the first year of this economical administration—the office of Solicitor of the Treasury, created at the last session to perform a part of the duties of the Fifth Auditor, as agent for the treasury, has called for an extra appropriation of near $10,000.

Sir, said Mr. F., we need the aid and faithful services of another "radical committee," as the select committee of 1820 has been called by the chairman of the Committee of Finance, which he himself has acknowledged saved three millions of dollars to the treasury, to arrest the progress of the Government in its downward road to bankruptcy and ruin.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Various other amendments were made, and the bill having been got through in Committee of the Whole, the bill and amendments were reported to the Senate; and

The amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER coming up, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out from the salary of a drogoman, $500; which was negatived.

Mr. HAYNE moved to strike out the provision for a student of languages; which was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 13.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER, as amended, and determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, Woodbury.—39.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Foot, McKinley, Ruggles.—4.

Mr. BIBB moved to strike out the proviso, yesterday adopted on the motion of Mr. TYLER; but gave way for

Mr. KING, who moved to strike out all after the word "Provided," and insert a proviso more general in its nature, referring not only to the present and past administration, but to all former administrations.

After some conversation between Messrs. WOODBURY, WEBSTER, and HOLMES,

Mr. WEBSTER called for a division of the question, so as first to determine on striking out.

The question was negatived—yeas 19, nays 23.

Mr. KING now renewed a motion he had before made, to strike out from the proviso the words "by the President alone," and "a treaty;" but the motion was declared not to be in order, the Senate having just determined that it would not strike out any part after the word "Provided."

Mr. BIBB now renewed the motion to strike out the whole of the proviso, which, after an explanation by Mr. TYLER, of his object in offering it, disclaiming any intention of giving it a particular application to the President, was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, Robbins, Robinson, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Troup, Woodbury.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Clayton, Ellis, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Poindexter, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Tyler, Webster.—25.

Mr. KANE's amendment was amended, by striking out the words "in addition to," and inserting the words, in aid of, and thus amended was agreed to.

So the sixth amendment was agreed to as follows:

"For the outfit and salary of a chargé d'affaires and a drogoman at Constantinople, and for the contingent expenses of the legation, $36,500; that is to say, for the outfit of a chargé d'affaires, $4,500; for the salary of the same, $4,500; for the salary of a drogoman, $2,500; for the contingent expenses of the legation, $25,000.

"For compensation to the persons heretofore employed in our intercourse with the Sublime Porte, the further sum of $15,000, in aid of the sum of $25,000, appropriated for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse: Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as sanctioning, or in any way approving, the appointment of these persons by the President alone, during the recess of the Senate, and without their advice and consent, as commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Ottoman Porte."

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time; and then

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

DEATH OF MR. NOBLE.

On the Senate being called to order—

Mr. HENDRICKS rose, and said, it becomes, Mr. President, my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of my respected colleague. He departed this life on Saturday evening last, at ten o'clock. His services in this body have been faithful and uninterrupted for the last fifteen years. They have been honorable to himself, and useful to his country; but man goeth to his long home, and with him these services have terminated in the meridian of life. He had indeed lived to see his early associates in the business of this House retire to other spheres of life, or, like himself, pass silently into the grave; yet his friends might reasonably have hoped and expected for him a longer period of usefulness and distinction. On an occurrence like the present, and especially standing, as I do, in the midst of a circle so intimately acquainted with the deceased, it will not be expected of me to pronounce his eulogy; but I can speak, and I may be permitted to speak in the language of early and well-tryed personal friendship of one highly prized, not only by myself, but by the State he has so long had the honor to represent, of an individual idolized by almost every circle in which he ever moved. He was a bold and fearless politician, warm and generous in his feelings. He had a heart that responded to every advance of sympathy and benevolence; a heart formed for the most ardent attachments. Open and undisguised, the prominent traits of his character were always before the world; but a long period of familiar acquaintance could only develop the ardor, the devotion, and the value of his friendship. For such an associate, it may well be permitted us to mourn, and well assured am I, that, in paying these last honors to his memory, we are but giving expression to the feelings of every member of the Senate. His society I have enjoyed when he was in health. In sickness I have frequently been near him, and endeavored to soothe his hours of anguish and distress; and I had an opportunity of watching with intense anxiety, and great solicitude, the last moments of his life.

Mr. BURNET then submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the Hon. JAMES NOBLE, deceased, which will take place at half past eleven o'clock this day, and that the Senate will attend the same; and that notice of this event be given to the House of Representatives.

The CHAIR stated that, under the circumstances of the case, upon being yesterday informed of the death of the late Senator from Indiana, he had appointed a Committee of Arrangement, and pall bearers; and hoped the course he had pursued would not be disapproved of.

Mr. BURNET then submitted the following resolutions; which were adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. JAMES NOBLE, deceased, their late associate, will go into mourning for him for one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm.

Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. JAMES NOBLE, the Senate do now adjourn.

[The body of the deceased was then brought into the chamber of the Senate, and placed in front of the Secretary's desk. Soon after which, the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker and Clerk, together with their Sergeant-at-Arms, entered the chamber, and were immediately followed by the President of the United States, the Heads of Departments, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, who respectively took the seats prepared for them. The Chaplain to the Senate (the Rev. Mr. Johns) then rose, and delivered an eloquent and very impressive address, which was followed by a fervent prayer by the Rev. Mr. Gurley, the Chaplain to the House. A procession was then formed, and proceeded to the Eastern Branch burial ground, where the remains of the deceased were solemnly interred.]

At half past one o'clock the Senate again assembled.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, supposing the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures was prepared to make the counter report, (of which he had spoken on Saturday,) he would move to take up the report of the select committee on the subject of a reduction of the duties on iron, with a view to ordering it to be printed.

Mr. HAYNE withdrew the motion which was made by Mr. WEBSTER on Saturday, and accepted by him, for its reference to the Committee on Manufactures; and so the printing was ordered.

Mr. DICKERSON then presented a paper, which he stated to be the views of the minority of the select committee; but the CHAIR declared that it could not be received as such.

Mr. D. then presented it as an individual Senator.

Mr. HAYNE called for the reading of the paper.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to lay the whole subject on the table, with a view to give an opportunity to order the general appropriation bill, as amended, to a third reading.

On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was decided in the negative—15 to 20.

The question then being on receiving the paper, a short debate arose between Messrs. KING, DICKERSON, and HAYNE; which was arrested by a motion of Mr. FOOT to lay it on the table; which motion prevailed.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, it was ordered, that when the Senate take a recess to-day, it shall be till six o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate met again at six o'clock, and continued in session till eleven. A great number of bills was passed, but nothing of material importance was transacted.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1.

DUTIES ON IRON.

Mr. DICKERSON moved that the Senate now proceed to consider the paper yesterday submitted by him as the views of the minority of the select committee on the subject of reducing the duties on iron.

Mr. HAYNE said he would be glad to know what course should be adopted respecting it when taken up—if it were intended to have it printed as an argument against the report of the select committee which he had presented, he wished to know if the gentleman would have any objection to his having an answer to that argument in like manner printed. The report of the committee—of the majority of the committee, had already been ordered to be printed, and the document of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] which exhibited the views of the minority of that committee, could not now go with it unless an extra number of copies of the original report were ordered to be printed. To this he would have no objection, provided his answer or rejoinder to that argument went along with it. If the printing of the original report for the use of the Senate had not in the first place been refused—a course which had been well said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] was altogether unprecedented, and out of the regular mode adopted with every report of a committee, he [Mr. HAYNE] might not have thought of standing on his right. As it was, he conceived he had an equal right, if this practice of allowing individual members of a committee to print their arguments against a report were tolerated, to expect his rejoinder to that argument to be printed—and if the gentleman chose to reply to that, he [Mr. H.] would be prepared with a replication to that argument, and thus go on and ask for all to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON replied that his sole object was to present the views of the minority of the committee on the subject. But he only presented it as the views of himself and another in their individual capacity, and as individuals they had a right to ask for those views to be printed. It was a right which they in common with others possessed; and was it not the case that the views of individuals respecting the subjects of memorials even were frequently printed? He would have no objection to the gentleman's rejoinder being printed, provided he was informed what it would be; but, before deciding, it would be but proper to know something respecting it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, if this practice were sanctioned, it would put an end to all their former rules of proceedings; it was unparliamentary and quite unprecedented. It would now appear that we were to have a counter report—an answer to that, and thus he did not know where it was to have an end. The subject appeared to lead to debate; there were many bills from the other House which it was necessary to take up without loss of time, and he would therefore move that the paper be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMES said, for his part he would have no objection to the plan which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] had laid out for himself to pursue, if he [Mr. H.] were allowed also to adopt it, and to write during the recess, while time might hang heavy on his hands, a further replication to the gentleman's replication, and this too to be printed at the public expense. He had also, he confessed, like the honorable Senator, a penchant for making an occasional speech, and for seeing himself in print now and again; and he hoped, if this new system were to be adopted, that the privilege which he laid claim to, would also be extended to him.

Mr. CLAYTON suggested that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] might better accomplish his purpose, if the Committee on Manufactures, of which he was chairman, were to report on the same subject.

Mr. DICKERSON explained, and insisted on his right, from former precedents, that his paper, which exhibited a view of two individuals who had formed a minority of the committee, should be received; and said, if it were not intended to carry the matter ad infinitum, the Senate could say where it was to stop.

After some further remarks from Mr. HAYNE and Mr. KING, the question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion to lay on the table, when it was negatived by a vote of 19 to 12.

Mr. HAYNE then moved, as an amendment to the original motion for the receiving of Mr. DICKERSON's report, which was still pending, that the views of the majority of the committee in replication to that paper be also printed.

The question on this last amendment being first taken, it was agreed to, and Mr. HAYNE handed in the replication accordingly.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, in regard to a report from a minority of a committee, although, strictly speaking, there could be no such thing, as a committee was a regular appointed body and constituted a whole, still, although it might be irregular for the minority to report as such, in a case like the present, he thought they were entitled to give their views as individuals on the policy of a measure to which they had always been opposed, and which went to recommend a system to the country which was altogether new. He would therefore vote in favor of the document being received.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would vote against it, because he thought any other individual in the Senate had an equal right to offer his views on the subject, and have them printed.

The question was then taken on receiving the paper presented by Mr. DRICKERSON, when the motion was carried by a vote of 19 to 18.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it shall adjourn to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock. The motion was agreed to.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States was then taken up, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. WEBSTER then said, the object of this important and long desired measure was to enable the Government, in proper cases, and by a just and safe proceeding, to compromise with certain of its insolvent debtors. He looked on this object as equally politic and humane. The relation of debtor and creditor was a delicate one; many practical consequences ordinarily sprang from it; and it was not expedient that large numbers of persons should bear this relation to the Government, without the hope of ever changing it. It naturally cherished feelings not the most friendly, to the discharge of social and political duties. Hopeless debt, too, terminates the active agency and effective efforts of most of those who have become subject to it. Their exertions, their enterprise, their usefulness, are in a great measure lost to society. Few will struggle under a weight which they know, struggle as they may, can never be moved. Few will exert themselves, under the consciousness that the utmost exertion will never enable them to throw off or to break the chain which binds them, and to place themselves again in a condition to enter the employments, the business, and the engagements of society. It was wise, therefore, in his opinion, that every hopelessly insolvent debtor to Government, should be able to ask inquiry into his case, and the causes of his inability, and to show his honesty and his misfortune, and then have the power of making his peace with his creditor; to have his quietus, in the language of the old law, and be encouraged, once more, to such efforts, and such services, as his social and domestic duties may require of him.

This being the general object of the bill, said Mr. W., it proceeds, in the first place, to distinguish clearly and broadly between mere debt and official delinquency. This distinction is founded, not only in true policy, but in correct morals also. Unpaid debt is one thing; violated trust very much another thing. Delinquency, or failure in the discharge of official duty, finds neither favor nor indulgence in any of the provisions of this bill. Principals in official bonds, and all persons who have received money to be paid into the treasury, or who have received it from the treasury, for public disbursement, are cut off from all its benefits. This is just. It is not unworthy of remark, however, that, in the history of our Government, the public has lost infinitely less by public debtors, than by public officers and servants. Six or seven hundred millions of dollars have been received into the treasury, almost all by being first secured by bond, with only a loss of the half of one per cent. This fact speaks much, not only to the credit of the system, but also for the integrity and punctuality of the American mercantile character. No Government in the world, I believe, collects its revenues with more certainty, or more economy, than ours. But it must be confessed, that when we proceed to the next stage, and look into the disbursements made out of the treasury for the objects of Government, and to the degree of fidelity and correctness which has there prevailed, our experience has been far less gratifying. The selected servants of the Government have lost us thousands, where those whom the laws and the course of business have compelled to become our debtors at the custom-house, have hardly lost us a dollar. The mercantile character has richly earned this distinction. In all times it has shown itself worthy to be relied on; in all times, in prosperity and adversity, in peace and in war, amidst all the events that usually affect national income, or shock systems of finance, the Government has always felt that what was due to it from the commercial community was to be counted on as so much already in its coffers. Debtors of this class, becoming insolvent without imputation of fraud or dishonesty, have fair claims to a discharge. On the other hand, let the severity of the law continue towards public delinquency. Let those who solicit public trusts understand, once for all, that a rigorous rule will be applied; that a perfect accounting will be exacted; and that debts, created by disregarded duty, and a violated trust, is a fetter never to be broken.

The bill, sir, proposes a public and open proceeding, to ascertain the facts in each particular case. The insolvent debtor is to apply by petition, setting forth the facts of his case. The petition is to be referred to commissioners, who are to inquire into it, with power to examine the petitioner, and any other persons, on oath, respecting the whole matter before them; and they are to be attended by an agent on the part of the Government, to interpose objections, and demand explanations of whatever may appear to require explanation. The facts thus ascertained are to be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; and thereupon he is authorized to compound and compromise the debt, according to the circumstances, and discharge the debtor.

It might be expected, perhaps, that the bill would have provided that, in every case, if no fraud or unfairness appeared, and clear insolvency and inability to pay were made manifest, a discharge should be granted of course. But, from what was known in regard to some existing cases, it was thought better still to leave the Secretary some discretion. It is known that there are cases in which, by the contributions of friends and connexions, or other means, considerable sums would have been paid if discharges could have been obtained; which cases, without such prospect of discharge, would be cases of great and total loss. So that one effect of this very measure will doubtless be, to cause receipts into the treasury of considerable sums, on account of debts, no part of which, without it, would ever have been collected.

The next important characteristic of the bill is, that in its operation it is altogether retrospective. It is not a standing provision. It applies only to past cases. Its object is to settle up and close cases of insolvency, long since happening, and still existing; to make a sort of half century jubilee, and set all the honest and unfortunate once more free from the demands of Government debts.

We see that, in the individual concerns of commercial men, it is found indispensable that some system, having the actual effect of a system of bankruptcy, should be adopted. Congress does not seem disposed to exercise its undisputed power of establishing such a system for the whole country, by law; no State can establish such a system, except to a partial extent; and most of the States have not attempted to provide any at all. But voluntary assignments, and voluntary discharges, have come into very general use, from the absolute necessity of the case. Individuals thus establish rules of distribution of effects, and for the discharge from debts, for themselves. But Government has not the power which belongs thus to a private creditor. The treasury cannot compromise or discharge the debt, in any case, without full payment. Under this act, as to past obligations, it will possess that power; and when its operation shall have been seen and tried by experience, it will be competent to Congress to repeat the provision, at a proper time hereafter, or not to repeat it, as its wisdom shall see fit.

As I do not anticipate any objection to the principle of the bill, I shall no longer press a claim on that time and that attention of the Senate, which are demanded by so many other urgent subjects. I wish, however, not to resume my seat before I express my sense of the obligation which the public is under to the distinguished gentleman in the other House, on whom it devolved, in the discharge of his duties there, to take the lead in this measure. I feel that he has rendered a substantial service to the country; that the bill which he has matured and supported through the House to which he belongs, will be a joyous relief, and a great blessing, to many honest and valuable citizens; and both useful and safe to the Government. I am happy in seconding here that which he has so well sustained elsewhere; and am desirous, for one, of expressing my thanks for his zealous devotion to this object, and his successful lead in its accomplishment.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate then, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1831. The several amendments reported by the Committee of Finance were agreed to, the most important of which was to strike out 100,000 dollars, and insert 200,000, as the sum to be appropriated for the present year for arming the new fortifications.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted a further amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the purchase of small arms for the militia, that amount having been withdrawn from the fund for arming the militia, for the purchase of artillery.

Mr. KING opposed the motion, and Mr. CLAYTON supported it.

After a few words from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were then reported to the Senate, and severally concurred in.

Mr. CLAYTON renewed his motion to amend, and called for the yeas and nays on its adoption; which were ordered.

Messrs. SMITH, of Md., KING, and HAYNE opposed the amendment, and Messrs. CHAMBERS and CLAYTON supported it.

The question being finally put on the amendment, it was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Silsbee, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Burnet, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Seymour, Smith, of Md., Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Woodbury.—25.

CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

The bill from the House, making provision for a subscription to a compilation of Congressional Documents, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved its reference to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. LIVINGSTON hoped it would not be referred; if it was, it would have the effect to destroy the bill. The subject had been before so fully discussed in the Senate, that it was wholly unnecessary a reference should take place, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the proposed reference was unnecessary, as the subject had already been before the joint Library Committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER then withdrew his motion for recommitment, and submitted an amendment which should confine the selection to documents which had already been printed.

Mr. CHAMBERS thought an amendment of this kind would tend to enlarge the number of volumes to be printed.

Mr. HAYNE thought the bill should be referred.

After some remarks between Messrs. CHAMBERS, WOODBURY, HAYNE, ROBBINS, and DICKERSON, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was decided as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of S. C., Sprague, Webster, Willey.—23.

A motion was then made to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, King, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Woodbury.—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of S. C., Sprague, Webster, Willey.—17.

Mr. POINDEXTER then spoke in favor of his amendment, and Mr. LIVINGSTON against it; when

Mr. WOODBURY moved to lay the bill on the table; which was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Woodbury.—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—23.

After a question from Mr. WEBSTER, and a few observations by Messrs. HAYNE and KING, the latter moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Contingent Fund of the Senate. This motion was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Woodbury.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—27.

The question was then put on Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—23.

SENATE.]

Election of a President pro tem.

[MARCH 1, 1831.]

After a few remarks from Mr. HAYNE, he moved to strike out 750, as the number of copies to be printed, which was also negatived, thus:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Woodbury.—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—24.

Mr. WOODBURY then submitted an amendment, to reduce the price of the proposed printing twenty per cent. below that paid to the Congress printer; which motion was negatived—18 to 23.

Mr. HAYNE then submitted an amendment, limiting the number of volumes to be printed to fifteen.

This amendment was opposed by Mr. HENDRICKS, who stated his reasons for the vote he should give; and the amendment was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Robinson, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Woodbury.—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Willey, Webster.—23.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved to amend the bill by adding a new section, providing for a subscription to a proposed publication of a stereotype edition of the laws, by Duff Green.

This motion, after some conversation between Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. CLAYTON, and the reading of the report of the Library Committee on the subject, was rejected, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Poindexter, Tyler.—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Webster, Willey.—31.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment; and the question being put on ordering it to a third reading, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Webster, Willey.—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Poindexter, Sanford, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, Tyler, Woodbury.—19.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate determined to take a recess from four to six o'clock P. M. this evening.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a letter from the Postmaster General, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th of May, 1830, transmitting a statement of the amount of postage received in that department from the 1st of April, 1829, to the 31st of August, 1830; which was referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT having stated that he should not again attend the meetings of the Senate at the present session, availed himself of this opportunity of wishing the Senators a very pleasant return to their homes.

The Senate then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT having retired from the Chair of presiding officer, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tem.

The votes were, (first ballot:)

For Mr. Smith, of Maryland,	-	-	-	17
Mr. Bell, of New Hampshire,	-	-	-	12
Mr. Tazewell, of Virginia,	-	-	-	3
Scattering,	-	-	-	4

On a second balloting, there were

For Mr. Smith, of Maryland,	-	-	-	18
Mr. Tazewell,	-	-	-	9
Mr. Bell,	-	-	-	8
Scattering,	-	-	-	2

On a third balloting, there were

For Mr. Smith, of Maryland,	-	-	-	15
Mr. Tazewell,	-	-	-	21
Scattering,	-	-	-	3

So Mr. TAZEWELL was elected President pro tempore of the Senate.

Whereupon, Mr. TAZEWELL rose, and with a profession of his sincere distrust of his ability to discharge the duties of the Chair with satisfaction to himself or to the Senate, begged to be excused from accepting the honorable station which the Senate had assigned to him.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his hope that the honorable Senator from Virginia would reconsider his determination, and would not be excused from the duty to which the vote of the Senate had called him.

Mr. TYLER, expressing his high respect for his colleague, and declaring that he himself, with all the sincere respect which he had for his colleague, not expecting such a course, had voted for the venerable Senator from Maryland, and, desirous to pay due regard to the wishes of his colleague, moved that his colleague be excused from serving as President pro tempore.

The Secretary of the Senate having put the question on this motion, it was decided in the affirmative, by 20 votes to 14.

The Senate then proceeded to another balloting for President of this body; and it resulted as follows:

For Mr. Smith, of Maryland,	-	-	-	20
Mr. Bell, of New Hampshire,	-	-	-	11
Mr. Ruggles, of Ohio,	-	-	-	4
Mr. King, of Alabama,	-	-	-	4

So Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate; and, being conducted to the chair, made his acknowledgments for the honor which he said he was satisfied was paid rather to his age than to his ability, and said that the only return he could make, would be to devote his best ability to the proper despatch of the business before the Senate.

The Senate then proceeded to the despatch of a variety of business, of which the following was the most prominent:

The bill to carry into effect certain Indian treaties was read the second time, and, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was amended by striking out the clause which provides for taking the sum appropriated for carrying into effect the Choctaw treaty, from the fund of $500,000 last year appropriated for the removal of the Southern Indians, and the expense of carrying into effect that treaty was ordered to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated. Thus amended, it was ordered to a third reading.

The amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill were all agreed to, with the exception of that which goes to strike out the clause inserted on the motions of Mr. KANE and Mr. TYLER, and inserting $15,000 for the services of the commissioners employed to conclude the treaty with the Sublime Porte.

A variety of motions were made on this subject, several points of order were discussed, and then some remarks were made on the constitutionality of the appointment of the commissioners. The effect that the amendment of the House would have, as preventing the Senate from expressing their disapprobation of the course of the Executive, was also spoken of, when, finally, the Senate refused to agree to the amendment, and appointed a committee of conference on its part, consisting of Messrs. TAZEWELL, WEBSTER, and KING, to meet conferees to be appointed by the House of Representatives.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.

CLAIM OF JAMES MONROE.

Mr. HAYNE said he was about to make a motion—such a one as he seldom made, and to which he was in general opposed—a motion which would have been unnecessary, if the bill had been suffered to come up in its order, but which had been prevented by the many motions made by gentlemen to take up bills out of their order—and that was, to take up the bill for the relief of James Monroe.

The motion prevailed—yeas 25.

The motion to amend, heretofore submitted, to strike from the bill the words “for public services, losses, and sacrifices,” was, on motion of Mr. HAYNE, disagreed to, to save time.

After a remark or two from Mr. FORSYTH and Mr. BELL,

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he would premise what he had to say on this subject by a declaration that he intended to vote for the bill. I am obliged, said he, in this case, as all of us must, for the most part, in cases of claims for services, or the settlement of accounts, to trust very much to the investigation made by our committees, and to the correctness of their reports. Were each member to investigate the details of the numerous cases that come before us, we should spend all our time in this examination, and then do the business imperfectly, leaving no time for attention to the great interests of the nation. In this case, a committee of the other House, that House itself, and our own committee, have informed us that Mr. Monroe has an equitable claim on the nation: and they propose that the amount of this claim shall be settled by our accounting officers on equitable principles. I must believe, therefore, that something is due, and therefore will vote for the bill. But, sir, a private duty which I owe to the memory of a very near and very dear relative, a public duty to a statesman who had no inconsiderable share in the establishment of our independence, who was one of the committee which sanctioned the declaration that proclaimed it to the world, and whose subsequent life was a series of important services to his country: these duties oblige me to notice an attempt to deprive him of the credit of one of the most important of those services. Among the claims which Mr. Monroe urges to the gratitude of the country, is the acquisition of Louisiana to the Union. Forgetting the agency of his colleague, scarcely mentioning him, except only to say that he had the merit of agreeing with him, (Mr. M.) he directly assumes the whole credit of the negotiation, by saying that nothing was done, or could be done, until his arrival; intimating clearly that it was his agency alone which produced the important result. I beg leave, sir, in order to test the justice of this pretension, to advert to the history of this transaction.

In the year 1801, Robert R. Livingston was sent by Mr. Jefferson as plenipotentiary to France. Important claims, the payment of which had been promised by the treaty of the preceding year, were yet unsatisfied; and the deranged finances of the republic rendered it very difficult for them to procure the means of discharging them. The first part of the year 1802 was spent by our minister in unceasing but fruitless attempts to procure the justice due to our citizens. Other causes soon combined to give a more important turn to the negotiation. The suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans excited a just and violent sensation in the Western country. Its citizens could scarcely be restrained from marching down, and securing by force of arms the free navigation of the Mississippi, so essential to their commerce. About the same time, Mr. Ross, a Senator from Pennsylvania, made a formal proposal to authorize the President to take possession of New Orleans: a measure which it was thought more urgent, because, about this time, May, 1802, it was known in the United States that Spain had, in the preceding year, ceded Louisiana to France. And it was feared that if a war broke out again (which was apprehended, and shortly after happened) between that Power and England, that this last Power would make a conquest of it, and thus enclose us on our whole frontier. Instructions were therefore sent to Mr. Livingston, to endeavor to purchase New Orleans and the Floridas for a price, of which the payment of the debt due to our citizens was to form a part. In obedience to these instructions, Mr. Livingston turned his whole attention to the accomplishment of this great object. While urging on the one hand the payment of the debt, on the other he was endeavoring to demonstrate the policy of making the cession to the United States, not only as the means of discharging the claims of our citizens, but as the only mode of preventing Great Britain from acquiring that valuable colony. In a memoir which he published in December, he not only insisted on these topics, but showed the advantage to France of encouraging the commerce and naval power of the United States, by the same act which would prevent the rapid accession to those of the rival of France.

In February, of the year 1803, finding that he could get no explicit answer from the ministry of France, he took a step dictated by a close study of the character of the extraordinary man who as First Consul then directed the affairs of France. Quitting the established form of communication, he addressed a letter directly to the First Consul himself, appealing to his honor as a soldier, and personal sense of justice, for the performance of a treaty he himself had made. This bold proceeding had its effect. An answer was given, positively promising a prompt liquidation and payment of the claims. To give greater effect to this promise, and increase the obligation of performing it, the contents of the answer were immediately communicated to the agents of the claimants at Paris; they were advised not to dispose of their claims, and told that they might rely on the word of the First Consul. This was done, with a knowledge that no other means could be found by France for discharging the debt, but the cession of New Orleans. In the mean time, Mr. Monroe had been appointed on a special mission to effect the same object. His arrival was expected about the beginning of April, and, so far from expediting, would, by waiting for his arrival, have delayed the termination of our difficulties, but for the concurrence of events which brought the matter to a conclusion in the mind of the First Consul before Mr. Monroe had set his foot in Paris. A history lately published by M. de Marbois, one of the confidential ministers of Napoleon, has raised the curtain, and exhibited to us what passed in his cabinet on this subject. On the 16th April, two days before Mr. Monroe's arrival in Paris, this important council was held. Louisiana, although ceded, had not yet been delivered to France. The stipulations of the peace of Amiens had not been performed; a renewal of hostilities was daily apprehended, and one of the first acts of those hostilities was expected to be the seizure of Louisiana by the British. France, too, wanted money for carrying on the war; and the First Consul was pressed for the performance of his promise to pay the American debt. Under these circumstances, he submitted to the two counsellors, on the day I have named, the question, whether it would be most expedient to transfer Louisiana to the United States, or to send on the expedition which had been prepared to take possession, and to risk the subsequent conquest of it by England. His two counsellors took different sides of this question; their arguments are given in detail by the historian, who was himself one of them, and who advocated the cession. The deliberations, he tells us, continued till late in the night. At daybreak on the morning of the 11th, he summoned M. Marbois to hear and execute his decision; he gave it in these words: "Irresolution and deliberation are no longer in season. I renounce Louisiana. It is not only New Orleans that I will cede; it is the whole colony, without any reservation. I know the price of what I abandon. I renounce it with the greatest regret: to attempt obstinately to retain it, would be folly. I direct you to negotiate this affair with the envoys of the United States; do not even wait the arrival of Mr. Monroe; have an interview this very day with Mr. Livingston. But I require a great deal of money for this war, and I would not like to commence it with new contribution. I will be moderate, in consideration of the necessity in which I am of making the sale, but keep this to yourself; I want fifty millions of livres, and for less than that I will not treat." On that very day M. Marbois did make the overture to Mr. Livingston, the price was discussed, but, of course, Mr. Livingston, knowing that Mr. Monroe was joined with him in the mission, and that he had arrived at Havre, could not conclude any thing until his arrival; he had another conference on the 13th (before Mr. Monroe had been presented) with M. Marbois, with whom he had been on a footing of intimacy as old a date as the revolutionary war, when Mr. Livingston was Minister for Foreign Affairs, and M. Marbois held a diplomatic employment to the old Congress, which considerably facilitated their intercourse on the present occasion. Mr. Monroe arrived on the 12th, and soon after joined his colleague in the negotiation; and the treaty was signed on the 30th of April.

Two circumstances are remarkable in this transaction: first, that the arguments employed in the consultation of the First Consul's cabinet in favor of the cession are precisely those suggested by Mr. Livingston in his memoir of December, 1802, and expressed in nearly the same language; the other, that the arrival of Mr. Monroe, and the part he took in the negotiation, did not change an item in the propositions made by the First Consul.

Two things are adduced, however, as proofs that Mr. Livingston could effect nothing without the aid of Mr. Monroe, and, consequently, that all the merit of the cession is due to him. One is, a private letter written hastily to congratulate him on his arrival, in which he (Mr. L.) speaks doubtfully of final success, unless Mr. Monroe should bring the account of Mr. Ross's resolutions having passed, and says they would negotiate to much better effect with New Orleans in our possession; and most undoubtedly we should. The purchase would have been made for half the price. But it must be remarked that this letter was written on the morning of the 10th, before the resolution which was the result of the Consul's cabinet council was taken. But, in this very letter, Mr. Livingston tells his colleague he had paved the way for him. What did he mean by this, if he had lost all hope?

It is said, too, that this same language was repeated on the night of the 12th, and that it was recorded in Mr. Monroe's journal. There is something that always struck me singular in thus recording what was said in a friendly visit made at the moment of his arrival. Why was this treasured up, even if it was rightly apprehended? But, sir, there was evident misapprehension or inaccuracy; for Mr. Livingston could not, on the 12th, at night, have used this language, when he had the day before received the overtures from M. Marbois, and even discussed the price. He very probably did repeat that they would have negotiated to greater advantage if New Orleans had been taken; and is it not probable, too, that he might not think it prudent to express what he really thought in the presence of a young gentleman he did not know, and of whose discretion he could not be assured, and that he reserved the communication of the overtures that had been made to him for a fitter occasion? It is said, indeed, that he did not believe the overtures to have been sincere; but whether he thought so or not, he would have been bound to communicate them to Mr. Monroe; and his not doing so on that occasion gives force to the conjecture that he was restrained by the presence of a third person, and used vague expressions, which were not accurately rendered in transferring them to the journal. But Marbois, it is said, also thought that Mr. Livingston was suspicious of the sincerity of the offers; but for this argument it unfortunately happens that M. Marbois takes his fact from Mr. Monroe, and quotes his memoir for his authority; so that, in relying on Marbois's authority, Mr. Monroe only quotes his own.

But whatever were Mr. Livingston's impressions, they could not alter the facts, that the decision to cede Louisiana was taken two days before Mr. Monroe arrived in Paris, and that decision made under the pressure of causes which Mr. Monroe had no share in producing, and of which he was totally ignorant—that the cession would have been made if he had never arrived—that the conditions even were not modified by his interference. The sale of the whole province being resolved on, instead of the part for which he came to treat, and the price fixed by the First Consul on the 11th, before his arrival, being that which was agreed upon afterwards, his merit consists in having agreed with his colleague in exceeding their instructions, and taking the whole instead of part. And yet he assumes to himself the whole credit of the treaty; makes no allowance to the memory of a man, to whose able and laborious negotiation, whatever there was of merit, in the preparatory steps taken to ensure the cession, was due. Near two years of unremitting exertion to bring about this end are considered as nothing! The dilemma to which the First Consul was reduced by his renewed promise to pay the debts—a promise procured by a bold and hazardous departure from the usual modes of negotiation—and the suggestion, urged with so much force in the memoir of the previous December, that they were used as arguments, and had their effect in bringing about the decision of the First Consul—all these are passed over in silence, and the arrival of Mr. Monroe, the bare weight of whose name before he had arrived, it is given to understand, had more weight than all these; and Mr. Livingston's name is only mentioned to give him the great merit of agreeing with his colleague.

Sir, I lament that Mr. Monroe should have thought it necessary to pursue this course. It is unworthy of him, and of the memory of a man with whom, to say the least, he would not have lessened himself by acknowledging as an equal. His course has obliged me to make these observations, which, I repeat, are not intended to injure his claim on the justice or gratitude of the country. My duty to a brother's memory has forced from me these explanations. I know the value he placed on the share he had in annexing the vast territory of Louisiana to our confederacy, and should be unworthy of the honor of my relation to him, unfaithful to his memory, and ungrateful for his fraternal affection, if I stood by and silently permitted any one to assume the sole credit of it.

What I have said is not intended to injure any claim Mr. Monroe may have on the justice of the country. I should be grieved if it had that effect; nor can I believe it possible that it should.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was decided as follows:

MARCH 2, 1831.]

Internal Improvement.

[SENATE.]

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnston, Livingston, Marks, Poindexter, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Tyler, Willey, Woodbury.—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Burnet, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Iredell, Kane, McKinley, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Maryland, Troup.—15.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCKINLEY, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and sat with closed doors till near four o'clock;

After agreeing to the amendments of the House to the bill relative to punishments for contempts of court, the Senate took a recess till seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, assigning the reasons why the annual statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States cannot be laid before the Senate at the present session; which was ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The Senate took up the bill for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvement, and to provide for surveys, together with an amendment reported by the Committee on Internal Improvements, to strike certain words from the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and to insert, instead thereof, the words $150,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from Pittsburg to New Orleans, and for removing snags, &c. and requiring bonds of the superintendent of the work to the amount of $300,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted a further amendment, re-appropriating certain unexpended moneys for works of internal improvement, which have been carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. TAZEWELL said he should oppose this, and all other amendments that might be offered, unless satisfactory information was given of the necessity for each appropriation.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, the estimates for the amendment had been handed to him by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House; they had been received there too late to be inserted in the bill when it was before the House of Representatives, and, as it could not be acted on there, it had been brought here.

Mr. TAZEWELL said that it also came too late here.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS then moved a further amendment, appropriating $15,000 towards making the road from Memphis to Little Rock, in the Territory of Arkansas. Mr. H. remarked that a bill providing for this road had been reported in the House, but not reached on the calendar—the only resource, therefore, which the Delegate from that Territory had, was to ask its insertion in the present bill. The Delegate had spoken to him on the subject, and he trusted it would be adopted.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that, from information he had received at home, he thought the appropriation should be made. As an individual he had no objection to it; but he would ask if the Senate was prepared to act on this appropriation, without the subject having been referred to a committee of this House, or without any information of the necessity for the appropriation from any of their committees.

Mr. HENDRICKS said a few words in favor of the amendment. It was no more than just, as the bill of the House on the subject had not been reached in that body, and as the Delegate from the Territory of Arkansas had no alternative but to bring it here, that the Senate should adopt the amendment.

The question being put on the amendment, it was rejected.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, as before stated, was then considered.

Mr. DUDLEY remarked that he was a member of the committee which reported the amendment; but there was not sufficient evidence to convince him of its correctness. He demanded the yeas and nays on its adoption.

Mr. POINDEXTER explained the object of the amendment.

Mr. BENTON supported the amendment.

Mr. TAZEWELL called for a division of the question, so that it might be first taken on striking out.

Mr. JOHNSTON preferred the amendment to the bill as it came from the House.

Messrs. JOHNSTON, DUDLEY, POINDEXTER, IREDELL, and WEBSTER severally addressed the Senate; when, the question being put on striking out the clause of the bill on the subject, as it came from the House, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 2.

Some conversation now took place as to the amount of security which should be required of the superintendent, when it was finally fixed at double the sum which might at any time be in his hands.

Mr. BENTON moved an amendment providing for an engineer to be associated with the superintendent in the execution of the work; which was agreed to.

The question being put on the amendment as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 9.

Mr. KING moved to strike out $25,000, the sum proposed for further surveys, and to insert $5,000; which, after some conversation, was negatived—18 to 19.

Mr. HAYNE then, in a speech of some length, opposed the bill.

He was replied to by Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. HAYNE rejoined, and Mr. LIVINGSTON again answered Mr. HAYNE.

After a few words from Mr. FOOT, and an explanation by Mr. LIVINGSTON,

The question was put on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative. The bill, as amended, was subsequently read the third time, and passed, and the House concurred in the amendments.

The Senate concurred with the House in agreeing to the report of the managers appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments to the general appropriation bill.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the Northern and Northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes, were read and concurred in, and the bill read the third time, and passed. [The amendments were to insert "Northeastern," and "otherwise than by sea."] The bill making additional appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors, and removing obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers, was read the third time, and passed; the question on ordering it to a third reading being decided by yeas and nays—28 to 6.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to suspend so much of the seventeenth joint rule as respects bills which have this day passed both Houses, so as to permit them to be presented to the President on the last day of the session.

Mr. FOOT, being temporarily in the chair, decided that a motion to suspend a rule must lie one day, unless the Senate unanimously agree upon the suspension.

From this decision, Mr. WOODBURY appealed, and referred to a decision by Mr. Macon in a similar case, in the year 1826—which was directly the reverse.

The question being put, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" It was decided in the negative—16 to 18.

After a few remarks as to a point of order, in which Messrs. KING, HOLMES, HAYNE, SPRAGUE, WOODBURY, BIBB, and FRELINGHUYSEN participated,

[MARCH 3, 1831.]

Mr. KING moved to lay the motion for suspending the rule on the table; which was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BENTON moved to go into the consideration of executive business; the motion was negatived—15 to 17.

A number of bills were successively taken up, and finally acted on.

Mr. BENTON, for the third time, moved to go into the consideration of executive business. The motion prevailed—yeas 19. It was now half past twelve o'clock.

The doors remained closed for about thirty minutes.

On motion, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourns, it will adjourn to "Thursday, the 3d of March, at eleven o'clock A. M."

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to take up the bill to alter the draw and bridge over the river Potomac.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the motion, and moved to lay it on the table. No quorum voting.

Mr. FORSYTH moved an adjournment—negatived—yeas 10, nays 20.

The question was then again put on laying the motion on the table, but there was no quorum present: when

Mr. FORSYTH again moved an adjournment—yeas 5, nays 19—no quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERS then submitted a motion that absent members be sent for.

Mr. HAYNE said, if the motion prevailed, he hoped it would be carried through. He understood the intention to be, that every member in the city should be sent for, and this would take till daylight.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he saw no other course to pursue; and if it took six hours to carry his motion into effect, he should nevertheless persevere.

A quorum being now present, Mr. CHAMBERS withdrew his motion; and

The question was then again put on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 19.

The bill was then taken up, and Mr. CHAMBERS explained its objects, and spoke in its support.

Mr. KING moved that the Senate do now adjourn, and that "the hour of the night, five minutes of two o'clock, on the 3d of March, be entered on the journal."

The yeas and nays were taken on the motion to adjourn, and stood 7 to 21.

Mr. TYLER observed that the President of the United States had left the capitol, and as it was immaterial whether the bill passed to-night or after daylight, he saw no use in gentlemen exhausting themselves—he was of opinion they had better go home, and, therefore, moved an adjournment. Negatived—yeas 7, nays 18.

Several bills were now brought from the House for the signature of the President; after they were signed, at half past two o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the seventeenth joint rule was suspended for this day, so far as respects those bills which have passed both Houses, or require for their final passage an assent only to amendment.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the select committee appointed on the 15th December last to inquire into the present state of the Post Office Department, made a report, enumerating certain papers communicated by the Postmaster General, which he was instructed by the committee to move to have printed. The printing was ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERS presented the following memorial from Abraham Bradley, late Assistant Postmaster General: To the Honorable the Senate of the United States:

The memorial of Abraham Bradley, late Assistant Postmaster General, most respectfully represents—

That, after his removal from office, he, as is well known to the Senate, presented to the President of the United States a letter, in which, among other things, he stated that Mr. Barry, the present Postmaster General, had made an extra allowance to a Mr. Harrall, a mail contractor, and to others, as this memorialist conceived, without warrant of law.

A copy of this letter having been called for, was presented by this memorialist to the present select committee of the Senate on the Post Office Department.

During the last session of Congress, a call was made on that department, at the instance of one of the Senators from Ohio, for information relative to the extra allowances which had been made to mail contractors.

The response of the department to that call was submitted to the view of this memorialist as containing matters in which he was deeply concerned. Upon examining it to ascertain if his recollection of Harrall's case was correct, he was unmeasurably astonished to find that the extra allowance was there charged to have been made by him, acting as Postmaster General. It was evident that the documents had been originally different, that an erasure had been made, and the name of this memorialist inserted. Induced by this to examine further, he found that forty-nine cases of extra allowance were in that document charged to have been made by him. Thirty-six of these were similar to the case of Harrall; the original document had been mutilated, and the name of A. Bradley, Jr., acting as Postmaster General, carefully inserted.

This memorialist called the attention of the committee to these circumstances, as evidence of an attempt to impeach his testimony, and to load his official conduct with opprobrium, being public documentary proof from the books of the department, that he had squandered the public funds during the few days he had acted as Postmaster General, between the 10th of March, when Mr. McLean left the office, and the 5th of April, when Mr. Barry came into it, and that, in order to screen himself, he had charged these things upon the latter gentleman. The committee kindly authorized a sub-committee to accompany this memorialist to the department yesterday, the 28th instant, to ascertain whether his statements were correct. Your memorialist confidently appeals to those gentlemen, in support of the fact, that it satisfactorily appeared to them, that in this case of Harrall's, as well as in every other case but one in which an erasure had been made, Mr. Barry was originally and properly charged—and that it was there asserted that these erasures had been made by mistake, and his name inserted by mistake. The gentlemen had not time to pursue their inquiry, and no examination was made into those cases originally charged to your memorialist.

In whatever manner these mutilations of the original document may have occurred, and these false amendments to it made by mistake or not, the effect must be, if it goes to the world, to injure, if not to destroy, a reputation upon which your memorialist, after nearly forty years' public service, must mainly rely for support. The Senate has, as he has been informed, directed this report to be printed.

If this should be done, and it should, with all its falsehoods and injurious tendency, be spread before the people under the sanction of the Senate of the United States, your memorialist submits that great injustice must necessarily follow to him. He therefore prays that such order may be taken by the Senate, as will secure his right, and especially preserve the reputation which documents published by the authority of the Senate should always possess. And your memorialist, as in duty bound, &c.

March 1, 1831.

ABRAHAM BRADLEY.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the order for the printing of the report referred to be rescinded.

Mr. GRUNDY thought the better course would be—the right way to do justice—to print the report, and subjoin to it the memorial of Mr. Bradley, and the testimony of Messrs. Brown, Suter, et al.

Mr. CLAYTON, chairman of the select committee to whom those documents had been referred, rose, and observed that they were very voluminous, purporting to be answers to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th April last, which directed the Postmaster General to report “copies of all existing contracts made by him or his predecessor in office, on which allowances have been made for additional services; designating, in each case, how much and what additional service has been performed, and by whom it was required, and designating also what sum has been allowed in each case for such additional service, and by whom it was allowed.” The answer to this call was kept back until about the 10th of last month. During the debate which occurred here on the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, among other things then said, I complained of this delay as an evidence of a design to baffle inquiry into the “concerns of the department; and, after that, the report called for in April, 1830, came in. It was first referred to the standing committee on the Post Office, although I prayed for its reference to the select committee, to whom unquestionably, as we now see, it properly belonged. The standing committee, without examination, as we must suppose, recommended it to be printed, and the Senate ordered it to be printed. After this, and about a week since, it was referred to the select committee. They examined it, and have ascertained that in thirty-six cases of extra allowance to contractors scattered through these documents, embracing some of the grossest violations of the law in granting away the public money to mail contractors, the allowances have been falsely set down as having been made by Abraham Bradley, as acting or assistant Postmaster General, when, in these very cases, the allowances were actually made by the present Postmaster General; and for the truth of this I refer to the deposition of Mr. Bradley, those of the clerks in the department, and the report itself of the Postmaster General in answer to the call, all now on the table before you, as well as to the statements of the Senators from Maine and Tennessee, [Messrs. HOLMES and GUNDSY,] who went to the department as a sub-committee, by our direction, to ascertain the facts. These documents, in each of these cases, exhibit to your eye palpable erasures, where the name of “William T. Barry, Postmaster General,” has been rubbed out, and that of “Abraham Bradley, acting Postmaster General,” inserted. The result of the examination was, that Mr. Barry’s name was originally written down on the documents as the person who made the allowances, according to the truth—that the name of Mr. Bradley was afterwards inserted, and now stands in each of these thirty-six cases, which, call them falsehoods, errors, or what you please, certainly misrepresent the fact. Then it is also necessary to state that the letter of Abraham Bradley to the President, which was read in the debate here on the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee, charging Mr. Barry with gross violation of the law in some of these cases, (particularly in the case of the South Carolina contract,) was written more than a year ago, and shortly after his removal from office; that this letter had been sworn to by Mr. Bradley in the committee; and that the tendency of this falsification of the documents, if undetected, was to convict Mr. Bradley of swearing falsely, who, in saying, on his oath, that the Postmaster General made the allowances, stated the exact truth. Sir, I have bestowed much attention on these papers, and I do not undertake to say that these are all the misrepresentations contained in them. They are enough, however, to induce the Senate, both in justice to its own character, and the reputation of an excellent citizen and an innocent man, to refuse to give any publicity to documents which all can see, and all now admit to be spurious and mutilated. If they be printed, even with the evidence which proves them false, still injustice may possibly result from it; for it will appear to the world, that the Senate had some confidence in these papers; and it may happen that those who shall hereafter read the calumny will not, among such a mass of papers, also advert to the refutation of it. At the time these papers were sent in, Bradley was a witness against the department, and under examination before the committee. All here know what an effort was made in public discussion to impeach his veracity, and I trust all will now admit how entirely that effort failed. But I will not stop to inquire into the motives of those who directed those alterations to be made. With motives we have now nothing to do. But the fact is incontrovertible, that these documents are unworthy of credit. It is therefore unworthy of the Senate to publish them, and I hope the order for their publication, made in an unguarded moment, may be rescinded.

Mr. HOLMES said: Mr. President, having been selected by the committee as a sub-committee with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GUNDSY,] to go to the department, examine the books, and ascertain what was the truth, we took with us the witness under examination, and proceeded to the General Post Office. We took also the abstract of allowances, now before the Senate. This abstract was obtained by a call made on the 14th of April last, made by a Senator from Ohio, [Mr. BURNET,] requiring, among other things, information of extra allowances made to contractors, and for what additional services, that the Senate might compare the value of the service with the compensation. The answer to this call did not come to the Senate until the 10th of February of this session, near nine months. It was referred to the Committee on the Post Office, &c., and by them returned to the Senate on the 22d, and ordered to be printed; and was then referred to the committee of inquiry. It was voluminous, and exceedingly confused; but some members of the committee discovered at once that it must be erroneous, to say the least. The fact is, that Mr. McLean left the department about the 10th of March, 1829—that Mr. A. Bradley, the senior assistant, was then the acting Postmaster General, as locum tenens, from that time until the 7th of April, less than four weeks. Still, within that time, additional allowances appeared by this “abstract” to have been made, of about 42,000 dollars. Upon examining this “abstract,” it appeared, moreover, that there had been thirty-six erasures, and A. Bradley’s name inserted. The allowance to Harrall appeared the most extraordinary. This was a case of erasure. It seems that Bradley had, on the 17th of October, 1829, in a letter to the President, among other things, charged Mr. Barry with prodigality, and had instanced this allowance to Harrall. Harrall’s contract was for carrying the mail from Georgetown to Charleston, South Carolina, for 6,000 dollars, and the extra allowance was 1,992 dollars, about thirty-three per cent.; and the cause alleged was two hours’ expedition; the law allowing only a pro rata addition, which would have been about eight per cent. if the two hours’ expedition had been required. But here was another error in the abstract, the expedition required being only one and a half hours.

This extravagance, which Bradley, in his letter to the President, had charged upon Barry, and had before the committee verified it by his oath, Barry had, in an official communication, charged back upon Bradley. The reputation of these two gentlemen seemed, therefore, to be so deeply involved, that it became the duty of the committee to ascertain how the fact was, and the sub-committee was accordingly appointed.

In pursuance of this appointment, we proceeded to the department; Mr. Barry was not there; we inquired of Mr. Gardner, the assistant, and others, for the persons who made out the "abstracts," and Mr. Taylor and Mr. Dundas were introduced, and, after a preliminary examination, were sworn and testified. We recurred to the erasures, and asked what was erased to make the blanks which were filled by Mr. Bradley's name? They answered, Mr. Barry's and Mr. McLean's, but chiefly Mr. Barry's. Why were Messrs. McLean and Barry's names first inserted? Because they supposed it was right; but Mr. Brown, by order of the Postmaster General, as he said, had determined otherwise, and directed this rule: to take the ledger, and look at the account of the contractor which was adjusted for each quarter, and, if the credit of the allowance at the end of the quarter is carried into Bradley's time, charge the allowance to him. It appeared that the account with Harrall was adjusted and balanced to the end of the quarter, to wit, the 1st of April; and, as Bradley was then acting Postmaster General, this allowance was consequently charged to him. I inquired if this quarter's account was adjusted and balanced at the time it bears date? The answer was, no; and not, probably, until June. Whether, if the allowance had been made between the 1st of April (the end of the quarter) and June, the time of actual adjustment, it would have been carried to Harrall's credit in that quarter? The answer was, that it would. Do not you, then, we asked, see the fallacy of your rule in proving who was the Postmaster General who made the allowance? Your quarter closed on the 1st of April, and Bradley's functions ceased on the 7th, and your adjustment of the quarter was made on the 1st of June. If this allowance had been made any time between the 7th of April and 1st of June, and you had carried it back to the 1st of April, do not you see that you fix on Bradley an allowance made by Barry? Bring your original entry, where, concerning this allowance, you first put pen to paper, no matter what is the name of the book or the document. They brought "the cash book;" there the allowance was stated, and the time for which it was made, but not when the decision was made. But I perceived, in a small note in red ink, "see letter of 13th April." I demanded the letter, and it was brought; and, behold, it was a letter of Phineas Bradley to Harrall, six days after Abraham's functions had ceased, stating that the Postmaster General (Barry) had examined his claim for extra compensation, and had directed him to pass the sum of $1,992 50 per annum to his credit, as extra allowance. Here the thing was settled. The charge of Bradley to the President, of Barry's extra allowance, was true; the attempt in Barry's official report to shoulder it off on Bradley was entirely defeated. The Assistant Postmaster General, Gardner, and Chief Clerk, Brown, were forced to admit the error, and that the rule which had fixed about $40,000 of allowances upon Bradley, took these allowances from McLean, but chiefly from Barry, where they in fact belonged, and charged them upon Bradley, where they did not belong. It was strange, indeed, that this abstract should have been, at first, made out correctly, and that McLean and Barry's names should have been improperly erased and Bradley's improperly inserted. Now, it is not to be presumed that charges so grave as those presented by Bradley to the President of the United States, in his letter of the 17th of October, were never communicated to the Postmaster General. Mr. Bradley had been an Assistant Postmaster General full thirty years, and, in all that time, had maintained an irreproachable character. He had been removed without being permitted to know the cause. One of the charges (to wit, prodigality) which he prefers against the Postmaster General, (Barry,) is attempted to be shouldered off on him. This the witness declares on oath was the act of Barry himself, and proves it in the way I have stated.

The depositions of Brown, Dundas, Taylor, Suter, and Gardner, admit the misrepresentation in this "abstract;" but "it is an innocent mistake." It may be so, and we wish, in all charity, that we had better grounds to presume it. This "abstract" is neither an original record, nor a copy from any record. It states briefly in each case the amount of the contract, the name of the contractor, the amount of the extra allowance, and for what time. It is neither an extract nor abstract from any record or document. It is rather a compilation of these facts from the letters, the cash book, and the ledger. It seems singular that there is no direct record of the time when these allowances were granted. But, nevertheless, it happened in this case that the subordinate officers found no difficulty in ascertaining which Postmaster General did make the allowances; and nothing but the rule promulgated by Mr. O. B. Brown changed the right into a wrong. Now, it would seem that a rule so utterly fallacious as this, would operate sometimes for, and sometimes against, Mr. Bradley; but this (strange to tell) operated in every case against him, and fixed upon him the most numerous and extravagant extra allowances that were ever made in twice that distance of time. Considering, therefore, that Mr. Barry had been, long before this, presented to the President for extravagance in these allowances; that his answer to a call from the Senate had been altered, by erasures, so as to remove this charge from him, and fix it on Bradley; that the falsity of the official document had been detected, and acknowledged by the officers who have the chief management of the department; it is for the public to decide whether such errors in such a department, which combine to destroy the fair fame of a worthy and highly distinguished citizen, are to be ascribed to gross ignorance or base design.

From all the evidence which we obtained from the department, it would seem that, in less than four weeks, Mr. Bradley is made to have given extra allowances in forty-seven cases; in thirty-six of which Mr. McLean and Barry were rightly charged, but their names were erased, and Bradley's wrongfully inserted. It appears further, that though the call as to these extra allowances, which was made nine months before it was answered, extended also to the reasons or consideration for them, yet in very few instances has the reason or consideration been given; and in some it is found that it has been erroneously given. In this very case of Harrall, all that is pretended to have been gained for this $1,992 per annum, is expediting two hours in twenty-four, which, upon inquiry, turns out to be but an hour and a half. In the short time that this mass of matter has been before us, we have discovered enough to convince me that this mutilated, mangled, perverted document never ought to go to the public with the sanction of the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee suggests that the petition and this document may both be published. But the committee know that the petition is true, and the document is not. Shall we, then, give currency to official slander against a citizen who has served you near forty years with distinguished ability and stern integrity? If his faithful services could not save him from a relentless proscription, but he must be cast upon the world in the evening of his days, pennyless, and without employ, surely we will not give currency to that which, if true, would consign him to infamy, but which we know is a gross fabrication. If you will consent to adopt a resolution, directing the printer to enclose the erasures in brackets, and insert this resolution in a note at the bottom of each page which shall contain an erasure, the antidote would then go with the poison, and no harm would be done. But, as it is, I protest against such injustice.

Mr. GRUNDY remarked, that he should not oppose the adoption of the resolution. He never could see any public utility in either obtaining or printing the abstracts; and if any member supposed that injustice would be inflicted on any one, he should be still less inclined to have them printed. He was one of the members of the committee who examined this subject at the General Post Office, and believed no improper conclusion could be drawn. If the abstracts, the memorial of Mr. Bradley, and the depositions of Mr. Brown, Mr. Suter, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Dundas, were printed together, the whole truth of the case would then be presented, and no imputation would be thrown on any one. Mr. Bradley alleged that certain extra allowances purported by the abstracts to have been made by him, which were not made by him; but it should be noticed, that there was no evidence that these allowances were not properly made. It was only material to investigate the matter, because Mr. Bradley had stated in his letter to the President that Major Barry had made one or more of them. It was a matter touching Mr. Bradley's veracity, which it was deemed proper should be put upon the true ground. Mr. G. was desirous that full justice should be done to Mr. Bradley, but protested against the effort which seemed to have for its object the inculpation of the Post Office Department in the transaction alluded to; and a reference to the depositions of the witnesses before named would entirely free the department from all censure.

It was required by the resolution that the department should state not only all extra allowances made, but the officers by whom made. The clerks, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Dundas, were directed by Mr. Brown, the Chief Clerk, to proceed with the work. Mr. Brown was detained from the office by sickness. In the execution of the business, it was discovered that the books of the office, from its commencement, contained nothing showing by whom extra allowances had been made, but the dates of the entries; and Mr. Dundas had gone on to state the extra allowances as made by Mr. McLean up to the day of his resignation, and from that period as made wholly by Major Barry. After he had proceeded in this way for some time, a question arose as to its correctness, and it was agreed by Mr. Taylor and Mr. Dundas to take the opinion of Mr. Brown upon the subject, on which they differed in opinion. They stated to him the principle of difference, without reference to any particular case, (as sworn to by Mr. Taylor.) Mr. Brown was of opinion that the criterion would be, to take from the books the dates of the first entries for the payments of extra allowances, and charge the making of these to the Postmaster General then in office; and to state all allowances as made by Postmaster General McLean up to the day of his resignation, and all allowances as made by Mr. Bradley, who was by law acting Postmaster General, up to the day Mr. Barry was sworn into office; and to Mr. Barry all allowances made from that day subsequently. This was the rule adopted; and, in conformity with it, the name of Mr. Barry was erased in several instances, and Mr. Bradley's inserted, before the report was completed. This was the whole of the matter; the original books and documents all stand fair and unaltered, and he could see no ground of imputation against any one. That some of these alterations in the abstract which those clerks were making were erroneously made, no one doubted. Mr. Brown stated it in his deposition, and, taking all the depositions mentioned, it is explained in the most satisfactory manner. It arose from the rule or principle on which the books have at all times been kept; and the abstracts were taken from the books as kept, and from the entries actually made under Mr. Bradley, and from no intention to do injustice to any one. Mr. G. was himself convinced that perfect accuracy could not be arrived at, as to the persons making the extra allowances, from an inspection of the books of the department. It might be done possibly by an examination of the correspondence in each case; but that would be an almost endless labor; and five months would not have been sufficient to examine the necessary letters and documents. He would unite with gentlemen in voting to suspend the printing, but protested against any inference being drawn even to the prejudice of the department from the transactions which were called in question.

Mr. CLAYTON said, he wished the gentleman from Tennessee, when he expressed his opinion that others believed no fraud was intended by the erasures, had confined himself to what he knew, or had better reason to believe, than he had condescended to name. The other members of the committee would think for themselves, and had not made that gentleman their organ to express any opinion on this subject. He said, he understood the gentleman to say, by way of excuse for these mutilated documents, that, in some of the cases, Mr. McLean had made the allowances. Sir, an inspection of the evidence will show that, in nearly all, if not in every case, the reverse is the fact. The select committee this morning reported on the affairs of the department; and the depositions and papers to show this, which have all been ordered to be printed, are referred to in, and form a part of, the report. Among these is a communication from Mr. McLean, in which he informs the committee that Mr. Bradley never made an allowance while he was in the office of Postmaster General. But, sir, there is yet another reason why these documents should not be printed. They are entirely evasive of the resolution of the Senate. In a majority of all the cases of extra compensation set forth in them, they do not state the "additional service" to be performed, and which was the consideration for the allowance. They are now spread on the Secretary's table, and you may see that they do not constitute, without the contracts, even an apology for an answer to the requisition made by the Senate. Generally, they do not give the length of the routes, or of the time in which they were to be performed—but leave you to refer to the contracts themselves, which it is not proposed to print. And in one case, where the excuse for the extra allowance is set down to be an increase of expedition, by carrying the mail through two hours sooner, the proof, as you will see by the depositions, is, that it was to be carried through only one hour and a half sooner than before the extra compensation was allowed. The law explicitly directs that the extra allowance shall be regulated by the original contract, and apportioned according to the increase of duty to be performed. To determine the propriety of the allowance, the additional service must be distinctly stated; and as this has not been done in most of the cases, the documents, without reference to the contracts, showing nothing, are not worth the cost of printing. But it is enough now to say that the Senate will not deliberately give publicity to what they know to be untrue.

Mr. GRUNDY hoped he had not mistaken the object of the motion now before the Senate. He had thought it was with a view to do justice to Mr. Bradley; so far he was willing to go; but let it be understood that he did not acquiesce in any denunciation of the officers of the Post Office Department. It was true Mr. Barry's name had been erased, and Mr. Bradley's substituted in its place; but the clerks tell us it was a mistake—that it was innocently done. He did not understand that the answer of the Postmaster General to the resolution of the Senate was evasive; he had not been able to give so full an answer as was desirable, perhaps, but at the next session it might be obtained. He knew that Mr. Bradley was charged with paying money, which he should not have been; but he also knew that it resulted from an innocent mistake of young clerks.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had yielded the floor to afford other Senators an opportunity to explain their views. It was now proper to explain the objects of the memorial. It was no part of his duty to go into the proofs upon the subject, to show that the present Postmaster General has wilfully and corruptly made an allegation injurious to the reputation of the memorialist; or that erasures of Mr. Barry's name, and interlineations of Mr. Bradley's, now admitted to have been made at the department, were made fraudulently and corruptly. His object required no such course, and therefore he did not pursue it.

Mr. Bradley has stated, and sworn, that the extra allowances mentioned in the memorial were made by Mr. Barry, and had made this fact the foundation of a charge preferred against Mr. Barry to the President of the United States. Mr. Barry's report, bearing the authority of his official station and his signature, asserts, that the extra allowances were made by Mr. Bradley. It therefore charges the statement and affidavit of the memorialist to be false. It is now admitted on all hands, and conclusively proved by an examination of the books of the department, that the allowances were made by the present Postmaster General, Mr. Barry, and not by Mr. Bradley; and that the name of Mr. Barry, originally and properly inserted in the abstract alluded to, has been erased, and the name of Mr. Bradley substituted; and it is therefore conceded that the representation given by Mr. Bradley is true, and that given by the report of Mr. Barry, the Postmaster General, false. This false report has been ordered by the Senate to be printed. The memorialist asks a suspension of this order. This, sir, said Mr. C., is the history of this singular affair. The question for consideration is, whether the Senate will contribute their aid to circulate a falsehood, and thereby make itself auxiliary to the distribution of a charge, now admitted to be utterly untrue, deeply offensive to the character of a man who has grown grey in useful service to his country, and who has attained an honorable old age in the midst of active life without reproach to his integrity. As a citizen of the same State, he had asked his protection; it had cheerfully been accorded; and he was happy to believe no member of the Senate would withhold a vote, now become necessary, to preserve an innocent man from an unmerited and unfounded imputation.

The question was then put on suspending the printing, and determined in the affirmative, nem. con.

PENAL CODE.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, said, it would be remembered, that, on the last day of the last session, he had laid on the table a bill to establish a system of penal law, with the avowed intention of submitting it to the consideration of the Senate at this session. The time occupied by the trial of the impeachment during the beginning, and the extraordinary press of business during the remainder of the session, concurred with other circumstances in preventing him from bringing it up. Among them was a proposition for appointing commissioners to frame a code of laws for the District of Columbia; for that part of which, relating to penal law, this system forms an important point. That proposition having, within a few days, failed, Mr. L. said he would now, in pursuance of notice given on a former day, move for leave to bring in his bill. It was his intention, had time permitted, to have developed the principles of the bill, some of which would be found extremely important. Under present circumstances, he would confine himself to saying that it laid down general principles applicable to the subject, provided for the cases of those general acts which ought to be punishable under the powers vested in the General Government, in whatever part of the United States they may be committed, and those which may be committed in places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, including, of course, the District of Columbia—that it accurately defined all offences, provided as well for their prevention as their punishment—includes a complete system of procedure—a code of prison discipline, and a book of definitions, explaining all the technical words used in every part of the system. He would mention two important features in the plan—the one was, providing, by positive law, for defining and punishing offences against the laws of nations, and, among them, some which had hitherto been left without any sanction; such as offences against that law which regulated, in modern times, the conduct of civilized nations with respect to each other in time of war as well as of peace. As these were entirely new, Mr. L. said he wished, when the document was put in the hands of the Senators, they would pay particular attention to its provisions, as well to one most important principle which pervades the whole—the total abolition of the punishment of death. To this he invited the Senators to give a most serious reflection, that they might be prepared to meet the discussion which he should think it a duty to invite at the next session.

Having been prevented, by the reasons which he had mentioned, from explaining the provisions of the system in an address to the Senate, he would supply it by an introductory report which would be delivered to the members of both Houses, together with the system. Mr. L. then moved for leave to bring in the bill, which was granted.

Mr. ROBBINS said that he held a document on the subject of the abolition of the punishment of death, which he thought would be very useful to the Senate in forming an opinion on that subject. It consisted of extracts from reports made to the Legislature of Louisiana by the Senator from that State, which had been lately republished in Pennsylvania. He moved that it might be printed; which was ordered.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the Senate then went into executive business, and sat with closed doors till four o'clock, when they took a recess till six.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at six o'clock, and immediately went into the consideration of executive business, and sat with closed doors until half past seven.

Messrs. WOODBURY and BURNER were then appointed a committee, to join the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that, unless he had some further communications to make to that body, it was ready to adjourn.

The committee soon after returned, and notified the Senate that the committee had attended to the duty assigned them, and that the President informed them he had no further communications to make.

On motion,

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, having concluded the legislative business before it, are now ready to adjourn.

The Secretary having returned,

The PRESIDENT pro. tem. adjourned the Senate sine die.

To the Senate of the United States:

Since my message of the 20th of December last, transmitting to the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, with information requested by the resolution of the Senate of the 14th December, in relation to the treaty concluded at Dancing Rabbit creek with the Choctaw Indians, I have received the two letters which are herewith enclosed, containing further information on the subject.

ANDREW JACKSON.

January 3, 1831.

The message and the accompanying documents were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and be printed under an injunction of secrecy.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred, on the 9th December, the treaty with the Choctaw Indians, together with the messages relating thereto, of the 20th December, and the 3d instant, reported the treaty without amendment.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

The treaty with the Choctaw Indians was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The following motion, submitted by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be authorized to call before them any persons now in Washington city, and take their examinations, on oath, relative to the country destined for the use of the Choctaws, and other Indians, beyond the Mississippi, and the actual condition of the Indians who have removed; and report the said examinations to the Senate.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were authorized, by the resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, to take depositions relative to the country destined for the use of the Indians beyond the Mississippi, submitted the answers of William Clark, superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, to certain interrogatories propounded by the committee.

The document was read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians; and, no amendment having been made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States of America and the Mingoes, chiefs, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, concluded at Dancing Rabbit creek on the 15th of September, 1830, together with the supplement thereto, concluded at the same place the 28th of September, 1830.

A motion was made by Mr. KNIGHT to amend the resolution, by inserting after "That," in the second line, the following: "disavowing the principle asserted by the commissioners, in the preamble, that the President cannot protect the Choctaw people in their rights and possessions in the State of Mississippi; but, on the contrary, he has full power and authority so to do, and with this asseveration."

And, after debate,

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, it was agreed to recommit the treaty to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, to strike out the preamble of the treaty, the question was put—Shall the following words, "Whereas the General Assembly of the State of Mississippi has extended the laws of said State to persons and property within the chartered limits of the same; and the President of the United States has said that he cannot protect the Choctaw people from the operation of these laws: Now, therefore, that the Choctaws may live under their own laws, in peace with the United States and the State of Mississippi, they have determined to sell their lands east of the Mississippi, and have accordingly agreed to the following articles of treaty"—stand part of the treaty? And it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 32.

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Messrs. Benton, Brown, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, King, Livingston, Tazewell, White.—11.

Those who voted in the negative, are,

So the motion to strike out the preamble was agreed to.

No further amendment having been made, the treaty was reported to the Senate, the question again put, and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States of America and the Mingoes, chiefs, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw nation, concluded at Dancing Rabbit creek on the 15th of September, 1830, together with the supplement thereto, concluded at the same place the 28th September, 1830, with the exception of the preamble.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians, together with the resolution, submitted the 19th instant, to ratify the same.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT to amend the resolution, by inserting after the word "That," in the second line, the following words: "disavowing the principle asserted by the commissioners, in their negotiation, that the President cannot protect the Choctaw people in their property, rights, and possessions in the State of Mississippi"—it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 25.

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 12.

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Those who voted in the negative, are,

Messrs. Barton, Burnet, Chambers, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague.—12.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1830.

At 12 o'clock precisely, the roll of members was called over by the Clerk of the House, (MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE,) and it appeared that one hundred and seventy-five Members and two Delegates were present.

The Clerk having announced that a quorum of the House was present—

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, rose, and said that he was requested by his colleague, the SPEAKER of this House, to state, that he was prevented from attending by indisposition; but that he expected to be able to reach the city before the usual hour of sitting of the House to-morrow. A gentleman who had arrived in the city in this morning's mail-boat, brought information that he passed the Speaker yesterday on his road to this place. In anticipation of the question which might be presented by the absence of the Speaker, Mr. A. said he had looked to the records, to ascertain what had been the practice of the House on like cases heretofore. He found that it had been twofold: in one or more cases, the House having, on the absence of the Speaker, adjourned from day to day, and in two cases, occurring in one year, (1798,) having elected a Speaker pro tempore. He had risen, he said, only to make the communication which he had done from the Speaker, and to state what had been the practice heretofore. It would be for the House to determine what course it would pursue on the present occasion.

Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, said, after the communication which had just been made to the House, it being probable that the Speaker would be here to-morrow, he should propose that the House do now adjourn until to-morrow.

The question was taken on this motion, and decided in the affirmative.

So the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

The SPEAKER (the Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia) being present this day, took the chair at 12 o'clock.

President's Message.

[H. or R.]

The journal of yesterday having been read, the members elected since the last session were sworn in.

Messages were then interchanged between the two Houses, that they were respectively ready to proceed to business.

A committee was then appointed, to join such committee as should be appointed on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President, and inform him that the two Houses were formed, and ready to receive any communication which he might have to make.

Soon after which, Mr. HAYNES reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned to them.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, it was determined that two chaplains should be appointed, as usual, of different denominations, to interchange weekly between the two Houses.

The message of the President of the United States was then brought in by his private Secretary, Mr. Donelson, read, and ordered to be printed—referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[The message and accompanying documents will be found in the Appendix.]

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8,

Mr. J. W. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the standing committees be now appointed, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House."

Mr. HOFFMAN remarked, that the Speaker did not arrive until yesterday; that he had been, and still was, laboring under a painful indisposition; and he, therefore, moved that the resolve lie on the table, to allow him further time to make a selection of the committees.

Mr. TAYLOR hoped that his colleague would withdraw his motion for the present, to give him an opportunity to explain the reasons which had induced him to offer the resolution.

Mr. H. having withdrawn his motion,

Mr. TAYLOR observed, that yesterday the message of the President had been referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and he supposed the House would this day resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the message of the President. Before going into committee, the standing committees must be appointed; for the Committee of the Whole would come to no resolutions for referring the different subjects contained in the message until the standing committees were appointed. If, however, it was the wish of the Speaker to defer the appointment of the standing committees of the House, he certainly should not object to it.

Mr. HOFFMAN entirely concurred with his colleague as to the propriety of appointing the standing committees before taking up the message for distribution to committees, but again referred to the short time the Speaker had been in the city, and his late severe and continued illness. Mr. H. concluded by again moving that the resolution lie on the table.

After a few words from the SPEAKER, intimating that he had the physical power to make the appointments, but that he had not yet received a list of the members who had taken their seats,

The question was put on the motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, and decided in the affirmative.

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution yesterday submitted by him for the appointment of the standing committees of the House; and the question being taken thereon,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to.

So the House agreed that the standing committees should now be appointed. [They will be appointed by the Speaker, and probably reported to the House tomorrow.]

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WICKLIFFE in the chair.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved resolutions referring the various subjects of the President's message to different standing and select committees.

Some conversation then took place between Messrs. STRONG, HOFFMAN, WAYNE, and VANCE, as to the propriety of referring some of the subjects above noticed to a standing or select committee, when the Chairman suggested that the better mode would be to take the question on each resolution separately.

The first and second resolutions were adopted without objection.

The third resolution being read as follows, viz.

"Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the subscribing to the stock of private companies for internal improvement; and so much of the said message as relates to the distribution among the several States of the surplus revenue, after the payment of the public debt, be referred to a select committee."

Mr. STRONG considering the two subjects involved in the resolution to be distinct, and to depend on different principles, moved a division of the question, so as to refer the first clause to a select committee; and the last clause also to another select committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN, professing a willingness to separate the subjects if his colleague moved, and the House desired it,

The motion of Mr. STRONG was agreed to, and the subjects referred to distinct select committees.

The sixth resolution being read as follows:

"Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the public debt, the revenue, its security, and collection, the Bank of the United States, and the organization of a bank founded on public and individual deposits, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. WAYNE moved to amend the said resolution, by striking out the words "the Bank of the United States, and the organization of a bank founded on public and individual deposits," and at the end of the said resolution to add the following:

"And that so much of the said message as refers to the Bank of the United States, and to the organization of a bank as a branch of the Treasury Department, be referred to a select committee."

Mr. TAYLOR moved for a division of the question, so that the sense of the committee should first be had on striking out.

The motion was agreed to; and,

The question being put by the CHAIR,

It was decided in the negative—only fifty-four rising in favor of striking out.

The remainder of the resolutions were then severally agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported the resolutions as amended to the House.

The question being stated from the CHAIR to agree to the resolutions, as amended in committee,

Mr. WAYNE moved that the question be put on agreeing to all but the sixth.

No objection being made, the question was so taken, and all the resolutions were agreed to by the House, with the exception of the sixth.

Mr. WAYNE now renewed the motion which he had made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WAYNE, in supporting this motion, apologized for President's Message.

troubling the House with a remark or two on this topic, at so early a period of the session. The first communication made to Congress by the present Executive, (at the last session,) intimated a doubt in his mind as to the propriety of rechartering the existing Bank of the United States. The portion of his message on this subject had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who submitted to the House a report, in which they exhibited at great length their views, which were opposed to those expressed by the President. Should the present portion of his message be referred to the same committee, unless some great and unexpected change had taken place in their opinions since the last session, the subject would be met by men whose minds were already made up, whose sentiments had been publicly expressed, and who, therefore, could not be expected to give it that fair and unbiased consideration which its great importance demanded. The importance of the question touching the bank must be acknowledged by every one, as well as its agitating effect on the public mind, throughout every portion of the Union. He conceived it as only respectful to the President, when such a subject was by him officially recommended to the attention of Congress, to place it in such an attitude as should secure to it a calm investigation by persons who had not prejudged it. Mr. W. said he should not disguise the fact that his own views in relation to the rechartering of the present bank were such as would induce him to vote against it in every event; but what he wished at present was, that the House might ascertain whether it was practicable or not to organize an institution resting on the funds of the country, which, while it secured all the advantages intended to be attained by the existing bank, should avoid the dangers with which that establishment was by many conceived to be fraught. The inclination of his own mind was to the opinion that this was practicable; but he desired, at all events, that the question should be submitted to those who would go to its discussion untrammelled by any previous judgment. It was not from any feeling of hostility to the bank that he was induced to desire this, but from a wish for fairness in the treatment of the subject itself, and from respect to a communication made to Congress by the Chief Magistrate.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, said, that whilst he had, he trusted, a proper regard for the President of the United States, he had some regard also for the committee to whom it was proposed to refer this subject. He did not himself feel any particular interest in this matter, either for or against the bank. But, at the last session of Congress, a very able report upon the subject had been made by the Committee of Ways and Means, which he had no doubt placed the subject in as fair a point of view as it could be placed by a select or any other committee. He had heard no sufficient reason why the subject should now be taken out of the hands of that committee. As this subject, moreover, had been heretofore referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, to give it a different direction now, would be to cast a reflection on that highly respectable committee, at the head of which stands a gentleman whose character for firmness on the one hand, and integrity and abilities on the other, could not be questioned. Mr. C. was therefore opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, desired that the question on Mr. WAYNE's amendment should be taken by yeas and nays, and it was ordered accordingly to be so taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, proposed to amend the amendment, so as to strike out the latter clause, and refer simply the question concerning the present bank, without the establishment of a substitute for it, to the consideration of a select committee.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said that, if the subject referred to in the message had been entirely new, he should have no objections to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE;] but when it was considered that, by the rules of the House, the report made at the last session by the Committee of Ways and Means was continued as a part of the business of the present session, that fact, he thought, furnished an objection against the sending of the same subject to a select committee. Such a measure would amount, in substance, to sending the report of one of the standing committees of this House to be reviewed by a select committee. Would this be respectful? Would it be treating the Committee of Ways and Means with that deference which was due to them, to take their report, (whether it was before the House, or had been referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or a Committee of the Whole,) and send it to a select committee? What direction had been given to the report of last session, he had been unable to ascertain, the means not being at this time within reach of the officers of the House; but, whatever it had been, the report was a part of the business of the House continued over from last session, and was to be viewed in all respects the same as if it had been rendered at the present session. And he put it to the House whether it would be proper to send a report now made by one committee of the House, and submit it to another?

[The CHAIR here stated that he was informed by the Clerk that the report of the Committee of Ways and Means was at the last session laid on the table of the House.]

Mr. TAYLOR said, if that were the case, could any one disapprove an arrangement which would eventuate in sending the subject to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that it might there receive the fullest examination that any of its advocates could desire? He suggested to the House, therefore, that the course in the original motion was evidently the proper one.

Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, said that, in making the motion he had done in reference to this clause of the President's message, he had not intended to express either approbation, or the contrary, as to the reasoning or the statement of facts it contained; nor had he supposed that his motion involved the slightest disrespect towards the Executive. He had been led to propose the disposition to be given to the subject, from no friendship or hostility to the present Bank of the United States: no expression of opinion on that subject was now called for.

[The CHAIR observed that the merits of the measure proposed in the message were not before the House, but simply a question as to the proper committee to whom it was to go.]

Mr. H. resumed, and said that he had made the foregoing observations expressly for the purpose of doing away any inference, from his motion, of his personal friendship or hostility toward the bank as now organized. That subject had always, heretofore, been referred to the standing committee of the House having cognizance of the finances of the country. He could not bring himself to believe that the opinions of the gentlemen forming that committee were so irrevocably fixed, as not to remain open to the developments of time and the influence of sound reasoning. Could he suppose this, he should certainly be in favor of referring the subject to some committee which should be differently constituted. It was indifferent to him what might be the disposition made by the House of this part of the message. If it was referred to a select committee, he hoped that such a committee would be selected as would be perfectly competent to the consideration of the matter; and if it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, he trusted that they would consider it dispassionately, and without prejudice. Either course would secure, he doubted not, a full and able investigation.

Mr. WAYNE again rose. It was, he said, from no want of respect to the Committee of Ways and Means that he had been induced to desire that this important subject should be referred to a select committee. He again insisted, that when the subject of a national bank had been a second time, and in a more explicit and particular manner, recommended to the consideration of the House, it would not be respectful to the Chief Magistrate to send it back to a committee who had made up their opinion in opposition to that intimated by the Executive. He had not the least doubt that if the light of truth could be made manifest to them, the minds of those gentlemen were open to conviction on this as on every other subject; but all knew that truth was often difficult of access, and sometimes not less difficult to be received, and this acknowledgment involved no imputation whatever on the uprightness of that committee. He had another reason for wishing the amendment to prevail; it was not to be expected that, unless the question was submitted to a few minds which felt a strong interest in regard to it, it would be examined with that application and industry which were indispensable to the full development of the subject. The suggestion of the President involved a reference to the amount and places of deposits, their effect upon commerce, &c. &c. which could not be gone into at large unless by a committee specially devoted to the subject. If the House approached the investigation through its Committee of Ways and Means, could it expect as full and detailed a report as if by a select committee, whose views corresponded with those of the President? He knew that gentlemen would object, to his proposition; that the reference to a select committee would excite a belief in the community that the United States' Bank was not to be rechartered, and thus greatly depress the price of bank stock. Admit that such might be the effect, was this a valid objection? Was the House bound to preclude inquiry on a most important subject, from a fear that the discussion might affect the price of stocks? Suppose the question should be deferred, it must come up at last; and would it not affect stock then as much as now? Mr. W. said, when the question came up on rechartering the bank as now organized, he should vote against it, because its benefits enured to individuals and not to the Government, who might by means of such an institution contribute to relieve the people of the Union from unjust taxation to the amount perhaps of millions annually. He should, however, abstain from entering upon the merits of the main question at this time. He was aware that it would not be in order to touch upon them. He had had the honor of offering a resolution on the same subject at the last session, and should renew it at the present session. His only motive then, as now, had been to promote an inquiry after truth. He believed that the appointment of a select committee would elicit a mass of facts which it was desirable to obtain, and which would not otherwise come before the House, tending to show whether the measure proposed by the Executive were practicable or not.

DEC. 10 to 13, 1830.]

Judge Peck.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, said that if the yeas and nays had not been ordered on this subject, he should not have risen. He was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, because he viewed the whole question as premature at this time. When the proper time arrived for its consideration, he should certainly be in favor of referring it to a select committee. It had been so referred when the bank petitioned for a renewal of its charter. He had the greatest respect for the gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] but he thought the subject ought never to come before the House until the bank should again appear as a petitioner for the renewal of its charter. The President, in presenting his message to Congress, had glanced his eye over the whole interests of the country, and had, very properly, given to the House his views of a great and weighty question of public policy. It was a question which involved the circulating medium, and, in fact, the property of the whole nation. As such, the question was before the people—it was a question for the nation to decide. In this House, it was not fairly presented as a subject of inquiry until the bank should apply for a new charter; when that time arrived, Mr. C. said he should be for sending it to a select committee; but at present the whole matter was premature.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. WAYNE, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Angel, Barnwell, Baylor, Bell, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Borst, Brodhead, Carson, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Coke, Conner, Daniel, Davenport, Warren R. Davis, Earll, Findlay, Ford, Foster, Fry, Gaither, Gordon, Hall, Halsey, Hammons, Haynes, Hinds, Leonard Jarvis, Cave Johnson, Kennon, Perkins King, Lamar, Lea, Leavitt, Lecompte, Lewis, Loyall, Lumpkin, Thomas Maxwell, Monell, Norton, Nuckolls, Pettis, Polk, Potter, Powers, Rencher, Roane, Sanford, Scott, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Standefer, Taliaferro, Wiley Thompson, John Thomson, Trezvant, Tucker, Wayne, Weeks, Wickliffe, Yancey.—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Arnold, Bailey, Barber, Barringer, Bartley, Beekman, Bockee, Brown, Buchanan, Butman, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Chilton, Clark, Coleman, Condict, Cooper, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Denny, Dickinson, Draper, Drayton, Dudley, Duncan, Eager, Ellsworth, G. Evans, J. Evans, H. Everett, Finch, Gilmore, Gorham, Green, Grennell, Harvey, Hemphill, Hodges, Hoffman, Holland, Howard, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Irwin, Irvin, Jennings, Johns, Kendall, Kincaid, A. King, Lent, Letcher, Lyon, Magee, Mallary, Marr, Martindale, Lewis Maxwell, McCreery, McIntire, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Overton, Patton, Pearce, Pierson, Randolph, Reed, Richardson, Rose, Russel, William B. White, Williams, Wilson, Wingate, Young.—108.

So the House refused to amend the resolution, and the resolution, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10.

After the reception of a great number of petitions and resolutions:

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, in order to give time for the House to make the preliminary arrangements for the trial of Judge Peck, which commences in the Senate chamber at 12 o'clock on Monday next, the House agreed to meet at 11 o'clock on that day.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. BUCHANAN, on behalf of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Judge James H. Peck, submitted the following report, which was agreed to:

The Committee of Managers appointed by the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, report, that they have had under consideration the answer of Judge Peck to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution thereto:

H. of R.]

Duties on Sugar.—United States and Denmark.—Election of Chaplain.

[DEC. 13, 1830.]

REPLICATION

By the House of Representatives of the United States to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the said House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States having considered the answer and plea of James H. Peck, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment against him by them exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, reply, that the said James H. Peck is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him at such convenient time and place as shall be appointed for that purpose.

Resolved, That the foregoing replication be put in to the answer and plea of the aforesaid James H. Peck, on behalf of this House; and that the managers be instructed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the duties on sugar imported from foreign countries into the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND required that the question be taken upon the consideration of the resolution; and Mr. WILLIAMS demand the yeas and nays on the question. They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Armstrong, Barbour, Barnwell, Barringer, Baylor, Bell, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Brodhead, Brown, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Claiborne, Clay, Coke, Conner, Craig, Crocheron, Warren R. So the House refused to consider the resolution.

UNITED STATES AND DENMARK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives printed copies of the convention between the United States and his Majesty the King of Denmark, concluded at Copenhagen on the 28th of March, 1830, and ratified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 10, 1830.

The message and convention were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER likewise laid before the House the following letter, which was read; and, on motion of Mr. SPENCER, of New York, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

PHILADELPHIA, December 7, 1830.

SIR: You will receive with this letter a silken flag, bearing the colors of the United States. This flag is made entirely of American silk, reeled from the cocoons, prepared and woven by Mr. John D'Honergue, silk manufacturer. The coloring has been done by the best artist he could procure in the city of Philadelphia; he himself not professing to be a dyer.

The staff of this flag, with the eagle, measures about fifteen feet; the flag itself is twelve feet and a half long, and six feet wide. It is woven all in one piece, without a seam.

I beg, sir, you will be so good as to present this flag, most respectfully, in my name, to the honorable House over which you preside, as a sample of American industry, thus applied, for the first time, to the most valuable of American productions; and as a result of the efforts they have made during the last five years for the promotion of the important branch of agriculture to which we owe the rich material of which this flag is composed.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

PETER S. DUPONCEAU.

Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they were in their public chamber, and ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck: and that seats were provided for the accommodation of the members of the House.

Whereupon, Mr. BUCHANAN submitted the following resolution; which was carried, nem. con.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have agreed to a replication, on their part, to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment exhibited to the Senate against him by this House, and have directed the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment to carry the said replication to the Senate, and to maintain the same at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the House do now proceed to the election of a chaplain; which motion was agreed to.

Messrs. ARCHER, WHITTLESEY, and FORWARD were appointed tellers: whereupon,

Mr. ARCHER nominated the reverend Mr. Post; Mr. FORWARD nominated the reverend Mr. Thomas; Mr. WHITTLESEY nominated the reverend Mr. Gurley; and Mr. HUBBARD nominated the reverend Mr. Palfrey.

On counting the first ballot, it appeared that 180 votes were given in—necessary to a choice 91: of which Mr. Post received 83; Mr. Gurley, 46; Mr. Palfrey, 34; Mr. Thomas, 12; and there were five blank votes.

After two other ineffectual ballotings,

Sunday Mails.—The Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

On the fourth ballot there were 170 votes—necessary to a choice, 86: Mr. Gurley received 91; Mr. Post, 75; and there were four scattering.

So the reverend Ralph R. Gurley was duly elected Chaplain in the part of the House of Representatives for the present session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, remarked that there was a difference of opinion, at least in his quarter of the House, as to the order which should be taken in attending the trial of Judge Peck, in the Senate of the United States. Some were of opinion that the House should attend in a body; others thought that it would only be necessary for the managers on the part of the House to attend during the trial. At the last session, said Mr. J., the House were in attendance; and it was thought by many members that the same course would be pursued at this session. He wished, for his own part, to have a correct understanding of the subject, and he would thank the Chair to give to the House his opinion as to the course that should be pursued.

The SPEAKER stated that the resolution of the House at the last session was confined to its attendance before the court of impeachment for a single day. The Clerk, however, would read the resolution.

[The resolution having been read, which was, in effect, that the House would in a body attend in the Senate chamber for a certain day, to support the charges against Judge Peck]—

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and observed, that there seemed to be a misunderstanding upon the subject. With the permission of the House he would state the course that had been pursued by the managers. They had examined all the precedents which had occurred in this country, to guide them to a correct performance of their duty. It was ascertained that, since the adoption of the present constitution, there had been three impeachments, viz. those of Messrs. Blount, and Pickering, and Judge Chase. On the trial of the two first, the House did not attend in a body, but left it to the managers to conduct the impeachment; on the trial of Judge Chase, they did attend every day. It not being considered by the managers of the pending trial that any principle so important as to interrupt the legislative business of the House was involved in the present case, they had gone to the Senate this day, as managers, and presented to that body the replication agreed upon by the House. Mr. B. further remarked, that he had consulted the English precedents. On the trial of Warren Hastings, the House of Commons attended at the commencement of the trial, but they did not continue to do so. On the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield, they did not attend until his conviction by the House of Lords; and then they attended in consequence of a message having been sent them by that body, that they were ready to pronounce judgment on the impeached, if the House of Commons would attend and demand it.

Mr. B. would not advocate the attendance or non-attendance of the House at the trial which was to take place. He had felt it to be his duty to state the course which had been pursued on previous occasions of impeachment, and what had been done by the managers in the present case, and to state that his sole object was to do that which would best please the House. No motion having been made this morning on the subject, the managers had felt it to be their imperative duty to attend at the bar of the Senate, and present the replication which had been agreed upon.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that one great object of his rising had been to obtain from the managers an explanation of the course which they had taken. For his part, he wanted to go on with the public business. He recollected, however, the great debate in the Senate at the last session, and that it was nearly impossible to retain a quorum of the House; if it were probable such would be the case on the present occasion, and the House should be compelled to adjourn from day to day for want of a quorum, how much soever he wished the public business attended to, he would prefer that the House itself should conduct the impeachment.

Mr. J. was about to proceed, when the SPEAKER reminded him that there was no proposition before the House, and suggested the propriety of his submitting a resolution on the subject.

Mr. J. declining to make any distinct motion at this time, Adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

SUNDAY MAILS.

A memorial was presented by Mr. COULTER, on the subject of Sunday mails—recommending that the mail should be discontinued on the sabbath. On its presentation, he moved its reference to the Committee on the Post Office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., objected to giving the petition the direction moved by the gentleman who presented it. He observed, that if the authors of the petition had an advocate or advocates on this floor, he was perfectly willing that the report formerly made by the Post Office committee on the general subject should at any time be called up. Let the House hear what gentlemen had to say on a subject which he had always thought, and would now say, ought never to have been brought into the Hall of Congress. He was desirous to hear what could be said in favor of Congress interfering with religious considerations. The committee had acted on the subject, and it would not do so again, unless compelled to do so by an express order of the House. He hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COULTER] would acquiesce in the motion which he would now make, that the petition be laid upon the table, or, rather, that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and he made that motion.

Mr. COULTER said that he felt very indifferent what direction should be given to the petition. He had always considered it proper, when the House was addressed in a decorous manner, on any subject proper for legislation, to give the petition a respectful consideration. In the present case, as the course indicated by the chairman of the Post Office committee was likely to effect the very object which the petitioners had in view, viz. to have the subject discussed, and obtain some action of Congress in relation to it, he was entirely willing it should be adopted. He had made a different motion, only out of the courtesy which he supposed due to the Post Office committee, and in compliance with the custom of the House. He had no doubt that the honorable chairman of the Post Office committee was both competent and willing to meet the discussion, which it was the object of the prayer of the petitioners to invite. If they had an advocate in the House, that advocate would doubtless avail himself of the privilege of debating the question without being specially invited so to do by any one. Mr. C. said it was not his purpose to avow himself as their champion, as he did not feel himself pledged to any particular course in the matter; he should endeavor, on this as on other occasions, to do what he considered his duty to his constituents demanded. If that duty led him to advocate the cause of these petitioners, he should be ready, in so doing, to meet even the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON again rose, but the SPEAKER suggesting that there was no proposition before the House, the petition was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by the acquiescence of the mover.

Mr. HAYNES moved the reference of a petition to another committee; which was assented to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. BARRINGER submitted the following resolution:

H. OF R.]

Live Oak Plantations.

[DEC. 15, 16, 1830.]

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill reducing the duty on bar iron, made by hammering, to the amount of duty imposed by the law of 1816.

Also, to reduce the duty on cotton bagging to two cents per square yard.

Also, to reduce the duty on coarse woollen goods, costing less than fifty cents per square yard at the place whence imported, to an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent.

Also, to reduce the duty on coarse wool, costing less than ten cents per pound at the place whence imported, to an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent.

Also, to reduce the duty on brown sugar to two cents per pound.

Mr. CONDUCT demanded the question of consideration on this resolution; and Mr. FINCH called for the yeas and nays on the question. They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows:

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 15.

This day was consumed in the reception and reference of petitions and resolutions of inquiry.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16.

Mr. TRACY, on rising to present a petition, remarked, that the subject-matter of the petition which he was about to present, was one of great importance, not only to his own immediate constituents, but to the whole section of the country bordering on Lake Ontario.

It might be recollected, he said, that, at the last session of the present Congress, a law was passed, making an appropriation for the survey of the mouth of Oak Orchard creek, about middle distant between Niagara and Genesee rivers. This survey was carried into effect the last summer, by General Swift, an experienced engineer, whose report accompanied the petitions, by reference to which report it would appear that the benefits which would result from the improvement of the mouth of said creek, for the purpose of a harbor, would exceed the most sanguine expectations of its projectors.

Mr. T. remarked, that the formation of a harbor on the contemplated site was one of a strictly national character. That it would greatly enlarge the facilities of commerce on the Northern lakes, but, in case of war, would contribute to the common defence of the country, in a proportionate degree to those on the seacoast. Mr. T. concluded by saying that the section of the country bordering on the Northern lakes had never asked much aid from the General Government for the promotion of national objects, and that they had received but a small proportion of what they had asked; and he hoped this subject would receive from the appropriate committee, to whom it would be referred, all the attention which its importance required.

The resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. BOON, of Indiana, was taken up, considered, and agreed to.

The following resolution, yesterday submitted by Mr. WHITE, of Florida, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House copies of the correspondence of the superintendent, and reports of the overseer of the live oak plantations near the navy yard at Pensacola.

Mr. SPEIGHT offered the following amendment:

"And that he be further directed to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence, contracts, deeds, or other papers, connected with the purchase of live oak lands in Florida, in the possession of, or within the control of the Navy Department; the quantity purchased; the persons from whom the purchases were made; the prices given; to whom paid, when paid, and on what authority; together with all other information tending to show the value of such lands at the time of the purchase, as well as the quantity and value of the live oak timber on each tract, fit for naval purposes."

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said he did not object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, and would accept it as a modification of his resolution, although all the information called for by it had at the last session been communicated to Congress. The object he had in view was a simple one, and related to a subject of more importance than might at first be imagined. The Secretary of the Navy, in his report to the President, and by him communicated to Congress, holds the following language:

"Further efforts have been made for the execution of this act, as far as it relates to the preservation of the live oak growing on the coasts of the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico.

"By the fourth section of this act, the President is authorized to provide for the preservation of this timber; but it seems to have been intended that the power should be limited to that object. An interpretation of the law has heretofore been entertained, extending this power not only to the planting of the acorns, and the cultivation of plantations of young trees, but to the purchase from individuals of lands producing them. The paper accompanying this, marked D, shows the amount which has been expended on these plantations, and the sums which have been paid to individuals for the purchase of tracts of such land.

"When it is considered that this timber is the natural product of the coast of the United States, from the St. Mary's to the Sabine; that the greater part of this belongs to the United States, and is proposed to be retained with a view to preserving a supply of this important material for the navy, it can scarcely be necessary for the present to engage in its artificial propagation or culture.

"Under an impression that this system is neither expedient, nor in conformity to the intentions of the act, an order has been given to discontinue the works after the expiration of the present year.

"But the preservation of this timber is an object of

DEC. 16, 1830.]

Live Oak Plantations.

great importance, and should be prosecuted with an active and undeviating purpose."

He has exhibited in this report the expenses of a public work recommended by his predecessor, upon the concurrence of the most experienced naval officers, and sanctioned by Congress, and has announced his determination to discontinue it at the end of this year. The expenses to which the Government have been subjected, are only disclosed by him. The extent, progress, and benefit of the work is not presented, and can only be understood by having copies of the papers called for in the resolution he had the honor to submit. To form a just idea of any public improvement, the advantages as well as expenses should be exhibited to those who are to decide whether the policy of the country requires its continuance.

From a perusal of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, one would be led to believe that an unauthorized interpretation had been put by his predecessor upon the third (erroneously called fourth) section of the act for the gradual improvement of the navy. It had fallen to his lot to know something about this subject, which, as it has not been disclosed in the report, ought now to be stated here.

The subject of forming plantations of live oak for the future supply of that valuable timber for the navy, was first introduced by a resolution in this House, on the 12th of January, 1827. By that resolution, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of forming plantations for rearing live oak for the future supply of the navy. It passed by an almost unanimous vote; and it was then distinctly announced that the timber was so rapidly disappearing, that, unless artificial propagation and culture were resorted to, there would not be a sufficient quantity in a few years for naval purposes.

It never was conceived that the act for the gradual improvement of the navy conferred power to make purchases of land. No such "interpretation was ever entertained," and no such power claimed or exercised. On the contrary, it was believed that the Executive had no such authority; and as it was considered that the public interests would be promoted by the purchase of a few individual claims, to complete a proposed reservation of the public land near a navy yard, a specific appropriation was made in the bill making appropriation for the navy in 1828, and will be found in the third section of that bill, as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated for the purchase of such lands as the President of the United States may think necessary and proper to provide live oak and other timber for the use of the navy of the United States, a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars," &c.

This is the authority under which the purchases were made, and not the fourth section of the act for the gradual improvement of the navy.

The object of this provision was distinctly explained in a communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate and House of Representatives, and by them to the respective branches of Congress to which they belonged. It was proposed by the President to make a reservation of the peninsula formed by Pensacola bay and St. Rosa's sound, near to the navy yard, for the live oak then upon it, and to make an experiment of, or its further propagation by, artificial culture. The situation was perhaps the best in the United States. The promontory between these two bodies of salt water, from its peculiar position and almost insular form, presented advantages which were not offered on any other part of that coast. At the distance of eighteen or twenty miles up the sound, the waters approached within half a mile, which afforded an opportunity of keeping out, with little care and expense, the fires which are so destructive to the young trees.

There were within this boundary a few individual claims to be extinguished, to give the United States exclusive jurisdiction and possession of the land. The contiguity of this land, too, to the navy yard, rendered it accessible at all times to the officers, and subject to their superintendence. A plan was made at the General Land Office, the price to be paid stipulated, the situation well understood, and the intention of the Government made known, and, with a full knowledge of all these facts, Congress made the appropriation. This took place in that year, when a majority of both committees, and of both Houses of Congress, were opposed to the administration, so that there was no overstrained construction, no absurd and arbitrary interpretation, to make these purchases. If the attack is intended to be made upon the policy of the measure, it is impugning the decision of Congress. The Secretary has also stated that live oak is the "natural product" of the whole coast from St. Mary's to the Sabine. This is assumed as the ground for abandoning the policy adopted by Congress, and continued by this administration from the 4th of March, 1829, up to this time. I regret that I am under the necessity of differing from the Secretary so widely in this statement. If the honorable Secretary had referred to the respectable naval officers in the other end of the building, they would have told him, from information acquired from an intimate personal acquaintance with that coast, that the live oak is found sparsely scattered at most remote distances, and in small bodies. If artificial culture is not resorted to, and the fires kept out of the reservations, there will not be enough in fifty years to build a West India squadron.

As I have the honor to represent the territory in which this establishment is located, I desire to have the subject fairly placed before Congress, and let them decide whether the public interests will not be promoted by the continuance of the experiment. The reports will show that there are 70,000 live oak trees upon the land purchased, which, in half a century, or even a quarter, will be worth ten times the amount ever expended upon them.

Mr. WHITE having accepted the amendment of Mr. SPEIGHT as a modification of his resolution,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved further to amend it, by adding the following:

"And all other information in the power of the department to give, relative to a production and providing a supply of live oak, and the measures taken respecting the growing thereof, and the expenses of such measures."

Mr. HOFFMAN, on offering this amendment, said, that the subject of this resolution was now before the Committee on Naval Affairs, in consequence of a reference to that committee of a part of the annual message of the President. His object in moving this amendment was to enlarge the proposed call, so as to embrace all the information on the subject which it was in the power of the department to communicate. He was not aware, he said, whether Congress had, or had not, in any way, sanctioned the policy of planting. He did not rise to express any opinion on that question at present, but only desired to have all the information which could be brought to bear upon it.

Mr. WHITE accepted the amendment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, proposed an amendment, to include also an inquiry into the measures adopted for "the preservation" of the live oak timber. He wanted to get at information on this subject. He understood that there had been a corps of overseers employed about that business for the last and several preceding years. He wished to know, from authority, what they were about.

Mr. WHITE accepted also this amendment.

The resolution, as thus amended, was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. RICHARDSON submitted the following:

Resolved, That a select committee on education be appointed to take into consideration all measures and propositions relative thereto, which shall be referred to them, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

On offering the above resolution,

Mr. RICHARDSON said, that, in explanation of his object in submitting the resolution proposing the appointment of a select committee on education, he begged leave to offer a few remarks. At the last session of Congress, said Mr. R., I proposed the establishment of a standing committee on education. That proposition was not sustained. The object of the proposition, I think, was misapprehended. All that passed at the last session gave cause of regret that there was no appropriate committee to whom to refer the numerous applications touching that subject. In the form of memorials, resolutions, and motions, there were at the last session not less than thirty applications to this House for acts of legislation for purposes of education. These applications were from various parts of the Union, and few only were finally acted on. From Arkansas there was a call for legislation for the benefit of common schools. From Alabama, for the benefit of Belleville Academy, of Green Academy, of La Grange College, and the University of Alabama. From Michigan, for the benefit of the University of Michigan. From Louisiana, for the benefit of Jefferson College, in that State. From Rhode Island, for the benefit of Brown University, in that State. From Kentucky, for the benefit of the Asylum of Deaf and Dumb, the Hardin Academy, and Transylvania University, in that State. From Ohio, for the benefit of common schools, the education of deaf and dumb, a female academy, and of Kenyon and Ripley Colleges, in that State. From Pennsylvania, for the benefit of Jefferson and Washington, Madison and Alleghany Colleges, and the Western University, in that State. From Mississippi, for the Franklin Academy. From New York, for the benefit of the Institution of Deaf and Dumb, and of the Academy of Arts and Design, in that State. From the District of Columbia, for the benefit of free schools in Alexandria and in the city of Washington, and of the Columbian College, in this District. Other applications from other quarters were made in relation to the same subject. They all evince great solicitude in relation to this momentous concern. These applications were referred to various committees charged with other interests of importance. A number of them were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. I have, said Mr. R., in the ability and fidelity of that committee the most perfect confidence. But the labors of that committee are arduous. It could never have been intended that that committee should have charge of the great subject of education. The applications mentioned would be sufficient of themselves to occupy the whole attention of an able committee. For the want of an appropriate committee, there is much reason to apprehend that they never will have due consideration. And, sir, said Mr. R., may not the applicants connected with seminaries of learning of high order and of strong claims in various parts of this Union reasonably expect that their applications shall receive the due attention of an appropriate committee? And you have, sir, committees on agriculture, manufactures, Indian affairs, and various subjects, not because the constitution has made them objects of special care, but because they are objects of general interest to the country. The education of the youth of this republic is an object of vital importance; and why ought it not to have the fostering care of this Government? Indeed, already some millions of dollars in public lands and in money have been appropriated for the support of common schools and other seminaries of learning. Is it not time to consider whether these benefits have been dispensed with an equal hand, and whether they subserve the purpose of their appropriation. Sir, Massachusetts has made no call upon Congress for aid in support of her seminaries. I trust I am not actuated by any local considerations. If I know myself, I am actuated by a solicitude to secure the safety and promote the prosperity of this republic. Without further remarks, I submit the resolution, with the hope that it may be adopted.

Mr. ARCHER moved that the resolution lie on the table.

On this motion, Mr. RICHARDSON called for the yeas and nays: they were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows:

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: From information received at the Department of State, it is ascertained that, owing to unforeseen circumstances, several of the marshals have been unable to complete the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, within the time prescribed by the act of the 23d March, 1830, viz. by the first day of the present month.

As the completion of the fifth census, as respects several of the States of the Union, will have been defeated, unless Congress, to whom the case is submitted, should, by an act of the present session, allow further time for making the returns in question, the expediency is suggested of allowing such an act to pass at as early a day as possible.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1830.

The message was read, referred to a select committee, and ordered to be printed.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was recommended the bill of the last session to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights, made a report thereon, (for which see Appendix.)

THE POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to establish certain post routes and to discontinue others; and all the amendments made to the bill in Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The question being about to be put on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to insert in the bill the following proviso, to come in at the end of the first section, viz.

"Provided, The said post routes be put in operation as soon as the funds of the department will, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, justify the increased expense of the same."

[It is proper to state here, that the Committee of the Whole yesterday struck out a section of the bill which proposed to appropriate $86,000, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, in aid of the funds of the Post Office Department.]

In support of his amendment, Mr. WICKLIFFE went into a brief explanation of the reasons which had induced him to offer it. He did not profess to have any certain knowledge of the amount of money that might be required to carry into effect the numerous post routes contained in the present bill. It might, very possibly, amount to $200,000 annually. It would be recollected, by those members who had been in Congress two or three years ago, that a bill passed Congress in 1828, designating various post routes, in addition to those previously existing, the whole expense of which fell upon the revenue of the department for the year 1829. Prior to the passage of that bill, the Post Office Department had been in a course of the most successful operation. It sustained itself by the amount of its receipts. But, when the additional burdens imposed by the passage of that bill were thrown on the department, it was found that no corresponding increase of receipts took place; and the difference was so great as to occasion a deficiency of $25,000 the very first year, and an excess of the expenses above the receipts of the department had continued ever since. According to the report of the Postmaster General, the excess within the last year amounted to $83,000; yet the House was told by the head of the department, that, if left to itself, the Post Office would be enabled, in a short time, to meet all its expenses, without requiring any aid from the treasury, inasmuch as the amount of receipts was fast gaining upon that of the expenditures. He need not remind gentlemen that loud complaints had lately arisen, both in that House and elsewhere; and committees of investigation were said to have been gotten up, for the purpose of inquiring into the past management and present condition of the Post Office Department. If such were the fact, those committees would find, as the result of their examination, that as much economy, and as prompt a responsibility, existed throughout every part of this Department of Government, as at any former period. Yet, with the knowledge of these clamors immediately before their view, gentlemen were in favor of laying an additional burden, to the tune of $200,000 a year on the expenses of the Post Office. He asked where the money was to come from. By this bill, said Mr. W., you order the Postmaster General to carry the mail on a great number of new routes. He has no discretion as to the obedience of this order. He is at once obliged to enter into the contracts, whether the department has or has not funds to comply with them. How was he to meet the demand? He expressly tells you that he has not the funds, and you yesterday refused, very properly, in my judgment, to make any appropriation for the purpose. Under these circumstances, I am induced to offer the proposed amendment, with a view to relieve a meritorious officer from such a dilemma, by allowing him the exercise of some discretion in the case. I have no doubt that some of the routes designated by this bill, especially some of those upon the frontier, are required by the state of the country; to these, no doubt, the Postmaster General will first turn his attention; but there are others which I cannot think are called for by the exigencies of the community, or, at least, not so urgently required, that they must be maintained at the expense of the department, and at a sacrifice of its credit.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., observed, in reply, that, in deciding upon the propriety of passing this or any other similar bill, he put to himself the simple inquiry, whether the interests of his constituents, and of his country, required the additional channels of intelligence which the bill provided. He had not stopped to inquire, nor did he know that it was his duty to inquire, from the worthy gentleman at the head of the Post Office Department, whether he was or was not willing that so many additional post routes should be enacted by law. Neither did he hold himself under any imperative obligation to ascertain whether the funds of the department would or would not enable that officer to execute the will of Congress. He was convinced that the rapidly extending settlements, and still more rapidly multiplying population of the country, required the continuance of the rule, which had hitherto prevailed, of passing a bill of the kind every two years. He could not see the necessity of suspending an operation so salutary to the public, whether its completion might or might not require money from the treasury. He would not stand to inquire whether these routes would cost $80,000, as had been estimated by the Postmaster General, or $200,000 as seemed to be imagined by his worthy colleague, [Mr. WICKLIFFE.] He felt well assured that there was no portion of our country that would not rather see that amount, or even a greater, expended in this form, than in almost any other which could be mentioned. If there was any one operation of this Government, which, more than any other, came home to the people, which made itself felt in every portion of the country, and brought a sense of its benefits to every man's door, it surely was the action of the Post Office Department. The operation of a bill like this went to multiply the channels of intercourse and knowledge through the country. It diffused information of every kind, whether commercial, agricultural, mechanical, or social, public or private. Its benefits were widely diffused and immediately felt. No restriction, like that proposed by his friend and colleague in the present amendment, had ever before been inserted in a bill of this kind. Where any thing resembling it had been appended, the bill was annual, and, not like this, biennial. The House had, in some cases, passed a bill for new post routes every year. But it had now got back to the old practice of enacting them biennially. Mr. J. said that he was sorry to differ in opinion from his worthy colleague, but he really could not concur in the present amendment, whatever might be the amount required to carry the bill into effect; he could not bring himself to withhold so great an accommodation from the citizens, for the sake of what it might cost. The House was not called on to make any appropriation. The appropriating clause had been stricken from the bill; and, whatever might be the fears of some gentlemen, he would venture to predict, that, before the period of the next September and October contracts, the department would find itself in circumstances to meet the expenses which would be incurred by the provisions of the bill, without applying to the treasury. He would further predict, that, if a statement should hereafter be made to this House, that this bill had caused an expense of fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, which the department would not meet, there would be a unanimous vote in both Houses to give whatever amount might be found necessary. No blame could, at all events, fall upon the Postmaster General. Will the people blame him? No, sir. Can clamor reach him? No, sir; all the clamor against the Post Office Department, raised for mere party purposes, when the facts of the case come to be investigated, prove like the idle wind which passes by this magnificent capital. Whether that clamor existed in the House or out of it, for himself he had but one simple rule: he brought every consideration down to the simple test of his duty. He never listened, for one moment, to the clamors which had been raised against his worthy friend the Postmaster General, any more than if the silence of despotism reigned around him; nor would the people regard it more than he, or be so unjust as to blame the head of a department for what was the act of Congress alone. Mr. J. said that a large portion of the post routes in this bill he knew to be indispensably necessary to the comfort and accommodation of great districts of the country. Why, then, limit the bill? He differed totally from his very worthy colleague in this matter; and, however accountable he held himself to his constituents, he was not afraid to avow, either in that House or elsewhere, that, so long as they had a dollar to appropriate out of all the millions they had contributed for the welfare of our common country, he should not be afraid to appropriate it for an object so essential to their comfort and happiness. This he conceived to be the right way to treat the people. They put millions into the treasury, and they would never complain that a part of their own treasure was taken out to promote their own best good.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rejoined. He was well acquainted with the boldness and independence of his colleague in voting for any appropriation of money which he considered to be demanded by the public good. He only regretted that, if he considered an appropriation in this case necessary and proper, he had not retained the clause for that purpose as it originally stood in the bill, but had himself moved to have it stricken out: for Mr. W. felt fully convinced that if the bill were passed in its present form, the department would have at once to come to the treasury. To this he for one was utterly opposed. He considered that the duty he owed to himself, and to his constituents, required him to keep the expenses of the Post Office Department within the amount of its receipts. With that view he was desirous to repose in the officer at its head such a discretion as might relieve him from the necessity of applying to the treasury, however abundant its contents might be, (though he did not believe they would be so very abundant either.) He should not urge any thing further in support of its amendments, but would content himself with requesting that the vote upon it might be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON rose to correct a misapprehension of his colleague, as to what he had said. He had never asserted that any appropriation from the treasury would be required to carry this bill into effect, but had only expressed his willingness to make such an appropriation should it be required.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said, he hoped the House would not act on a subject of this kind without due deliberation. By the acknowledgment of the honorable and very generous chairman of the Post Office committee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the policy heretofore invariably pursued in relation to the Post Office is now to be changed. As a tax, the contributors to this branch of the Government have had that characteristic which renders any tax the most popular, viz. its being paid by those who personally enjoy the beneficial consequences. The department, said Mr. B., has heretofore been managed with very great care, and has been very popular; the most so, perhaps, of any of the branches of the Government; great harmony also has generally prevailed between Congress and the head of that department. One great reason of the popularity, as well as the general prosperity it has enjoyed, is to be found in the fact, that it has been thus far sustained by its own resources; the revenue from postage has paid the expenses of transporting the mail. But if the extension and multiplication of mail routes is to be pursued without regard to the receipts of the department, one of the most salutary checks in the administration of its affairs will have been removed. He hoped the House would consider maturely before they entrusted this branch of the Government with a discretionary power to demand appropriations from the treasury; and, if it is further to have the discretion of applying the appropriations when obtained, its concerns could not fail to fall into great disorder: a looser system of administration would be adopted; the tax would lose its equitable character, and soon cease to be popular. He had urged these considerations because the honorable chairman of the committee had avowed it as his plan to call for appropriations where the funds of the department should fall short.

As to the interest of the country in this multitude of new routes—(he did not know how many were proposed by the bill—a gentleman near him said seven hundred)—he could only say that heretofore the Post Office committee in the House had always moved in concert with the head of the department; and it was reasonable and fit that they should do so. It was not to be expected that that committee could possess the same extent and minute accuracy of knowledge which belonged to the department—no committee during its term of service here could obtain such a mass of geographical information. The present bill, however, had, it seemed, been got up without any consultation with the department. Here were seven hundred new post routes proposed at once.

[Mr. VANCE here interposed to explain. He feared he had unintentionally misled the gentleman—the bill contained not seven, but about three hundred routes.]

Be it so, said Mr. BELL, the objection is the same in principle, if there are but one hundred. No committee can judge of their utility with the same degree of safety as the Post Office Department can. Yet the honorable chairman declares that he did not consider it his duty to consult the Postmaster General in each of these three hundred routes. Any committee, charged with a duty of this kind, is, from the nature of the case, liable to great impositions. He did not mean to say that honorable members of this House would wilfully and intentionally deceive or impose upon any committee; but they might, in effect, produce a very false impression by their representations, which, however sincere, were chiefly based on a narrow circle of topographical information. Each member looked mainly at his own immediate neighborhood, without consulting the general interest of his region of the Union, and without an accurate knowledge, perhaps, of the routes already existing. He meant not the slightest imputation on the patience, diligence, or fidelity of the committee, or on the motives or conduct of any member of the House; but it was obvious, that, from the necessity of the case, most of these routes could receive from a committee but a comparatively slight investigation.

There was another point he considered important: supposing that the Post Office Department had hitherto sustained itself out of its revenues, the House could not be sure that, in departing from previous policy, they would be sustained by public opinion. The vote of yesterday to strike out the appropriation at first introduced into the bill, seemed to indicate that this House had not yet made up its mind to enter upon a new course of policy in relation to this department. The consequence of too great a multiplication of mail routes was, that the department had to narrow down its contracts where the mail was most wanted. The whole country received a slight accommodation, which was not graduated by the comparative wants of its different parts, and many of the routes became scarce worth sustaining.

No one could think more highly of the usefulness of a wide-spread dissemination of intelligence than he did; but might not greater facilities be granted in routes already existing, in preference to the opening of new routes? Would it not conduce more to a general diffusion of knowledge, if the same facilities of circulating information which are now confined to members of Congress should be extended to members of the State Legislatures in the several States? It had often struck him, said Mr. B., that if they were the real and sincere friends to a general diffusion of intelligence, which might be inferred from their zeal for multiplying mail routes, would they not more effectually promote that object by some such arrangement as he had alluded to? The members of the State Legislatures were more spread among the people, and lived more among them, and were consequently the best acquainted with their wants and wishes; an arrangement of this character would overbalance a thousand of these small routes, while it added less to the expenditure of the department. Mr. B. concluded by saying that he had esteemed it his duty to submit these views on the general subject, and expressing his hope that the House would act with great coolness and caution in so important a department of legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, disclaimed any intention of entering into a discussion of the general subject, but would offer one or two words in explanation of the reasons which would induce him to vote against the amendment. Waiving the question whether this bill ought to pass or not, he objected to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] because it vested the Postmaster General with an absolute discretion in the application of the funds of his department, and enabled him to decide without appeal among three hundred conflicting claims for the new mail routes proposed in the bill. This confided to a single officer a weight of responsibility which pertained to Congress alone. Mr. B. said he entertained both respect and friendship for the distinguished officer at the head of the General Post Office; and as his friend, he felt unwilling to impose upon him so onerous a burden. Exercise this discretion how he might, he was sure to give great offence. Each applicant for favor would esteem his own route best entitled to preference, and there would be three or four hundred of these applicants struggling with each other for a boon which, perhaps, could be extended to but three or four individuals; the rest were sure to feel offended. What, asked Mr. B., is the duty of Congress in this matter? To put only such routes into the law as the resources of the department will enable it to meet; and between the various claims for such admission, Congress should itself decide, and not devolve its own responsibility on the head of any individual. In both these views of the subject, he felt opposed to the amendment. He should rather appropriate at once the sums that might be thought necessary, than entrust such a responsibility as was proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky to the head of any department.

Mr. JOHNSON again addressed the House. He considered himself very unfortunate in not having been understood—he knew with certainty that his friends would not wilfully misunderstand him—he must, therefore, attribute the mistake to some defect on his own part. He had not said, as seemed to be supposed, that the Post Office committee had acted in total independence of the Post Office Department, in judging of the necessity of the various routes proposed to them; but that they had acted without holding themselves obliged to consult the department, whether routes should be adopted that would require appropriations from the treasury. On some of the routes in this bill, the committee had obtained the details from the department. Whenever they had rejected a route asked for, the rejection was recorded, together with the reasons for it. But, supposing the committee had acted in entire independence of the department, who, he asked, could be better qualified to give the committee all the information it needed to enlighten its judgment than the members of this House? Men who come from the country where the route must run? Men who reside with the people, and are sent here to express their wants and wishes? If a committee of this House are incapable of deciding on a post route, without first obtaining the approbation of the Post Office Department, (except so far as mere courtesy is concerned,) then that clause of the constitution which gives to Congress the power to establish post offices and post roads, had better have been so worded as to confide that power to the Executive branch of the Government. Mr. J. said he was truly very unfortunate in being thus exposed to the buffets of his friends, for he had been opposed by none but those who were his friends, both personal and political. He had expressed his opinion—it was a candid one—and he was sorry he could not withdraw it, or recall any thing he had said: nor could he consider the force of his argument lessened by what he had heard. One word to the worthy gentleman before him, [Mr. BELL,] (than whom he knew none more worthy, or for whom he felt a truer respect;) that gentleman was wrong in supposing him to have said that any money would in this case certainly have to be appropriated. It would be a delicate thing to make such a declaration beforehand; but he had declared that if, when the time arrived, an appropriation should prove necessary, he was prepared to vote for it. He again declared, that, rather than deprive the country of such a benefit, he would give the money necessary to obtain it. His very worthy friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had expressed a wish that the Post Office committee had ascertained the precise amount requisite to carry the bill into effect; that gentleman was so much and so constantly engaged in other labors of a very different kind—[Mr. B. is chairman of the Judiciary committee]—that he had overlooked the fact that the department had ascertained the amount referred to, and had reported it to the House at $82,000. This was the amount originally inserted in the bill, and which the House had yesterday resolved to strike out. This amount was not asked by the department: the department asked for no appropriation; but this was the answer given by the department to the inquiry of the Post Office committee, as to the amount required to establish all the new routes in the present bill. For himself, Mr. J. said, he would rather let the bill sleep on the table, than adopt the amendment proposed by his colleague. That amendment appended, and the bill would amount to nothing; nay, it would be worse than nothing, for it would confer a legislative discretion on the head of the Post Office Department. His worthy friend [Mr. BELL] had said that it appeared the policy of the Government, in relation to the Post Office, was about to be changed. He said not. It would not be changed at all, until an appropriation should actually have been made. On the contrary, should this bill be laid asleep, then the policy of the Government would indeed be changed. Then this House would, in effect, say to the people of the United States, "while your own President, the man of your choice, the man whom you elected at the polls, fills the chair, you are to enjoy less privileges than you ever had before; you are to be indulged with less mail accommodation, in proportion, than under any former administration." Sir, said Mr. J., I am not willing to say this to the people. I do not, indeed, connect my support of this bill with this or with that particular administration; but I cannot consent that we should now, for the first time, begin to withhold privileges from the people. I again repeat, that I consider myself unfortunate in being opposed by my friends, and by such friends. I am, I declare, almost in doubt whether I must not be wrong, seeing I differ from them; still, however, I do not so far doubt as to change my opinion: and if this amendment shall be adopted, I shall immediately move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, expressed his regret that the gentleman at the head of the Post Office committee found it necessary to avow that he felt indifferent whether this bill would or would not charge the Government beyond the income of the Post Office Department. I had thought that it was an acknowledged settled principle in reference to the management of that department, that its revenues should not be exceeded by its expenditure. The idea, either of making the Post Office a source of revenue, or of suffering it to be a burden on the treasury, he understood to be alike abandoned. He had been under the impression that the committee, when they reported this bill, believed that the revenues of the department would be sufficient to meet the expense of all these routes. In this, it appeared, he was mistaken. Mr. H. said he should not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] although he felt very sensibly the force of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] He concurred with that gentleman in the opinion that it is the House, and not the Postmaster General, who should fix upon the routes to be carried into effect; but it was perhaps too late to hope for this now. It would require a revision of the whole bill, and, to be properly done, would also demand a knowledge of the relative expense of each route. But if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] was right in his belief, that it would probably call for no appropriation to carry the bill into effect, then the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania of course fell to the ground. If all could be accomplished, then there would no difficulty occur from having to select from among them. Mr. H. said he preferred the insertion of the amendment to the danger of embarrassing the revenue by calls for appropriations hereafter. For, although the gentleman from Kentucky thinks that an appropriation will be readily voted, if called for, to make up any deficiency caused by the passage of this bill, yet the Committee of the Whole, and the House, with a knowledge of the increasing deficit of the department, had voted to strike out the appropriation from this bill. If the committee abandoned their proposition now, what reason was there to suppose that the House would willingly assent to it hereafter? Under all the circumstances, Mr. H. said he thought it would be better to pass the bill with the amendment than without it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, expressed his regret that the gentlemen from Kentucky and Tennessee [Messrs. WICKLIFFE and BELL] had not looked into the documents submitted to Congress at the opening of the session, before they had taken the ground they had now done, in offering and in supporting the amendment. Had they done this, they would have found abundant evidence to show that a bill like that now under discussion might be suffered to pass, without the least apprehension of a deficiency of funds to carry it into effect. Had the language of those documents been referred to, the whole of the present discussion might have been avoided, and the bill been at this time engrossed for its third reading. The documents would show, that when General Jackson came into office, the Post Office Department had the sum of two hundred and thirty thousand dollars at its disposal. In his first communication to Congress, he informed that body that great improvements had taken place in the administration of this as well as other branches of the Government, and that large savings had been effected in its funds, which had been formerly squandered away, owing to the irregularity of the public accounts. He told Congress, that at that time the Post Office Department was in a highly prosperous condition. Now, there had not a single new post route been authorized since 1827. In that year, it was true, the expenses of the department had been increased to a certain extent, but the expense had long since been defrayed. Under these circumstances, could the gentleman who introduced the amendment, or the gentleman who had supported it, entertain a reasonable doubt of the ability of the Post Office Department to sustain the increased expenditure proposed in this bill? Surely not. Had it not been echoed and re-echoed, as well by the President and the head of the department as by all the papers of a certain description, from one end of the Union to the other, that the Post Office was in a high state of prosperity? Yet, what did the House now see and hear? Gentlemen, professedly the friends of the administration, hesitating to pass the ordinary biennial post office bill, lest it should compel the department to make a draught upon the treasury! Such a fear must be idle indeed. Surely this House was raising a clamor against the department, which would meet with no credit out of that House. The House had been informed by the head of the department, in his public official communication, that a saving had been effected, in making contracts this year, of seventy-two thousand dollars. Yet gentlemen had branded that branch of Government by the unfounded supposition that its expenses had run beyond its income to the amount of eighty-two thousand dollars. Could this be true while a saving had been effected to nearly that whole amount? The thing was incredible. One gentleman had even supposed that not less than two hundred thousand dollars would be needed to carry into effect this bill. Yet the head of the department asked no more than eighty-six thousand dollars as sufficient to cover all these routes. The last bill of this kind burdened the department only to the amount of twenty thousand dollars. One was passed in 1826 establishing various new routes, and another bill in the following year. The latter, it is true, was passed against the opinion of the Postmaster General, who desired that the routes in the previous bill should be suffered first to go into operation before any others should be added; but the House thought otherwise, and passed the bill. But, as he had observed already, the whole expense incurred by these bills had been long since defrayed, and the department had since been officially declared to be in a flourishing condition. The gentleman from Kentucky had alluded to certain proceedings in the Senate. Such allusions, he thought, were not in order.

[The CHAIR interposed, and observed that Mr. WICKLIFFE had made no allusion that he heard to the proceedings of the Senate. Had he done so, it would undoubtedly have been out of order, and the Chair would have interposed to stop any remarks of that kind.]

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he thought the gentleman had alluded to committees of inquiry. Mr. WICKLIFFE offered to explain, but Mr. WHITTLESEY proceeded.]

He admitted that the routes ordered by the bill of 1827 did not go into effect till January, 1829. One quarter was due in April, and the present Postmaster General was not concerned in the result until July, 1829. At that time the department had, by its own showing, upwards of two hundred thousand dollars at its disposal. On the whole, Mr. W. concluded it to be utterly impossible that with this surplus then, and its very rigid and economical mode of conducting business since, the Post Office Department should not be in circumstances to meet the provisions of the present bill. Did he wish to injure the credit of that department, he could not employ language better calculated to effect that object, than that now held by the gentlemen who advocated the amendment: what was more likely to excite an alarm in the minds of the people, than that the affairs of the department had not been properly conducted? If gentlemen, after all that had been said of the flourishing state of the Post Office, would nevertheless admit that it was unable to add these routes without calling on the treasury, the conclusion was inevitable that there must exist very great improvidence in its management.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that he had come to a different conclusion from his friend from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] and thought it best, on the whole, to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Post Office Establishment.

He took it for granted that, if the bill was passed, it would be the duty of the Postmaster General to put the new routes into operation, and gentlemen had said that they amounted to a hundred and fifty or two hundred. Now, said Mr. S., I do not think it quite fair towards that department, in the present condition of its finances, to impose this new burden upon its resources. It has been said, in the course of this debate, that no new post routes have been put into operation since 1828. Yet, on looking at the report of the Postmaster General, at the present session, the debt of the department appears to be increasing. It is stated in the report, that the expenditure of 1827-8 was $1,623,893; of 1828-9, $1,782,132 57; of 1829-30, $1,932,707 06; so that the expenditure of the last year exceeds that of 1828-9 by the sum of more than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and about three hundred thousand dollars more than in 1827-8. He did not mean to find fault with it. Though there may have been no new routes to cause this increase, it may perhaps be accounted for by the increased facilities afforded on the old routes, or the calls on the department for old claims or allowances, or in many other ways. It would not be right to disapprove of it without accurate and full information as to the causes of it, as it might, perhaps, be fully and satisfactorily explained. He did not mean to give any opinion about it, and had only alluded to it to show that, even under this increased expenditure, the report further showed that the excess of expenditure over the receipts had pretty regularly increased too since 1827. This excess is stated in the same report to have been, in 1827-8, $25,015 85; 1828-9, $74,714 15; 1829-30, $92,124 86. The postages have increased from the years 1827-8, to the last year, more than two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Now, it cannot be sound policy to burden that department with the new expenditure to be created by this bill, before the old debt is paid off, or lessened; or at least put on the decrease, instead of increasing yearly. It is very true, as the Postmaster General very justly observes, that the yearly ratio of increase of this excess for the last two years does not keep pace with the yearly increase of receipts. But the amount of excess is, in fact, increasing yearly; and it is that circumstance to which he, Mr. S., wished to call the attention of the House. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will prevent this excess from increasing any more, at least through the legislation of Congress. He thought it would be time enough to think of putting more burdens upon the post office fund, when this excess of expenditure began to diminish. The old routes would undoubtedly be able to maintain themselves in two or three years more, if the future increase of postages shall equal the increase of the last two years. In the mean time, he thought it unwise to throw new obstacles in the way of the present increasing prosperity of the department. He should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, because he thought it would have a tendency to relieve the department from the very unpleasant necessity of overloading its resources. He considered it his duty, as a member of the House, to contribute his aid to this desirable result. It was not as a friend of the Postmaster General, which some gentlemen, during the course of the debate, had avowed themselves on this floor to be. He had no particular friendship for that officer, nor any enmity towards him. Indeed, he knew of no friends in legislation. It was not strictly a parliamentary word. The public interest requires that Congress should not, in the present condition of the department, do any thing to embarrass the Postmaster General in his laudable efforts to keep the expenditure of his office within its income; and Mr. S. said that it was only because the public interest did require it, that he should support the amendment. The policy of Congress had been to make that department support itself, and it was right that those who reaped its advantages should be at the expense of maintaining it. Rather than add to its expedition in its condition, he would be willing to vote a gross sum at once from the treasury, to pay off the eighty thousand dollars excess of the last year, put the department fairly afloat, and let the Postmaster General begin the next year with a new account.

Mr. MAGEE said he did not rise for the purpose of taking a part in this debate, but merely to correct the great mistakes which seemed to prevail in some parts of the House, as to an enormous increase in the expenses of the Post Office Department. The bill of 1827, for establishing additional routes, did not take effect until 1829. The routes then ordered did not go into operation until January, 1829; and the first payment did not come on until May of that year. The sum of one hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars, therefore, expended, was to be deducted from the formidable amount stated by his colleague. Mr. M. said he had mentioned these facts for the information of his colleague, who professed such entire ignorance as to the cause of the "enormous increase," as well as that of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON said that, with a view to relieve gentlemen from the great fears they professed, lest the nation should think there had been a gross expenditure in the Post Office Department, he had intended to advert to the facts just stated by the gentleman from New York. He could also inform the gentleman, that since the adoption of the federal constitution, and even before that constitution had any existence, the Postmaster General had possessed absolute power to increase, at his own discretion, the frequency of the mails, from one day in a week to six—ay, and to seven, too, if he thought it most expedient. He could also, at pleasure, increase the speed of the mails; nor were the public journals silent as to the increase which had actually taken place, both in their frequency and speed. The Postmaster could multiply their passage from three to six times every week of the year, and even to seven times, thank God, when it was necessary. Yet his friend over the way, without explaining any of the facts which he had stated from the documents, expresses his utter ignorance as to the causes which have led to the result he refers to; a gentleman, too, of his distinction, who, I thought, added Mr. J., knows almost every thing. For himself, Mr. J. said he could see no necessity whatever for involving this thing in party considerations. He never had, and with God's help he never would imply censure by his language on that floor, where he was unwilling directly to express it. His friend, too, from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESSEY,] had thought it necessary to allude to some imputation made under the present administration, to prodigality under the past. He could not for his life see the necessity of alluding to this, even had the fact been so; but it was not so. He had never seen a word from the present head of the Post Office Department reflecting, in the slightest degree, on the worthy and meritorious gentleman who had been his predecessor, and he should be glad—no, he recalled the word, he should not be glad, for the matter did not pertain to the subject before the House—if his friend from Ohio would point out the spot, and would give the House the chapter and verse where any such imputation was expressed. For himself, he esteemed and honored the late Postmaster General, as he esteemed and honored the present officer. He knew, indeed, that some such thing as that alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio, had been afloat in the public journals; he regretted that they were so abusive on both sides. He wished it were otherwise; yet, no matter how abusive it might be, the public press was the great palladium of our liberties; the present Postmaster, he was perfectly sure, had never intended to cast the least imputation on his predecessor—nor had he done so—he had indeed stated that new arrangements had been made in administering the affairs of the department. It had been divided into different bureaus, and some reforms had been introduced in its expenditures, but the statement of this implied no censure on the gentleman who had gone before him.

Mr. J. said he should not reflect upon his friend from New York, who had professed so much ignorance as to the details of the Post Office Department. He hoped the gentleman had been sincere in all that he advanced; as to himself, he was but a plebeian in rank, and a plebeian in language. He felt that he had been unfortunate on the present occasion. His language certainly had not been well understood, for a third friend [Mr. HOFFMAN] had seemed to conceive that he had uttered a sort of bravado, intimating that he cared nothing to what extent he scattered the public money. Such a sentiment was far from his mind. What he had said was, that when such a valuable accommodation was to be secured to the people, he would not stand to inquire whether it would cost eighty thousand or two hundred thousand dollars. The good obtained far overbalanced the money it might cost. He hoped, after these explanations, that it would not be necessary for him again to rise during the present debate.

Mr. DANIEL was in favor of the amendment. He should not be prevented from voting for it by the consideration, which appeared to have weight with some gentlemen, that it would impose too great responsibility on the Postmaster General. That officer, he had no doubt, was willing to take and bear all kinds of responsibility. He has the power now to discontinue any post road if it is not beneficial to the community. He has the power also of increasing mail accommodation upon every route; and there will not be more discretion reposed in him by this amendment than there is by the general laws on the subject of the Post Office Department—not a particle more. What is intended by the amendment? There are some routes among the number contained in the bill, which would defray their own expense, and ought to be put in operation: there were others, probably, which ought not. If the gentleman from Ohio had looked at all parts of the Postmaster General's report with the same vigilance as he had at one part, he would have discovered what had become of the $230,000 in hand when the present Postmaster General came into office. The new contracts under the act of 1827 had disposed of nearly the whole of it. And what more did the gentleman overlook in the report? Why, that since that officer had taken charge of the department, the postage has been increased to the amount of $140,000, and increased facilities of mail transportation to a large amount have been extended to the people: and the department was not yet insolvent, as the gentleman was very ready to insinuate; for there still remained in hand a hundred and forty odd thousand dollars, after providing for the deficit of $82,000: but it was indispensable to the proper conduct of the department, that it should at all times have a surplus of funds. The gentleman from New York, whose candor Mr. D. said he at all times admitted, and particularly on the present occasion, had gone on and said that every man should vote or speak in this House without any regard to his personal predilections, and should always labor to lay before his constituents the truth in regard to every department of the Government. Any attempt to even insinuate that any member of this House would ever attempt to deceive his constituents by a garbled statement of the contents of public documents, would be a gross disrespect to this body. So that when any member of this House tells a part of the truth, and not the whole of it, I always suppose that it is a mistake: for no member could be suspected of taking a scrap of a document here and a scrap there, and putting them together, for the purpose of deceiving his constituents. I will not believe it: if I were disposed to believe it, I would not—at least, I would not say so here. Now, sir, as the gentleman desires information on this subject, I will endeavor to inform him what has become of the $309,000 which he speaks of. I find in the report of the Postmaster General, which accompanied the President's late message, the following:

"In the several States, improvements in mail facilities have been loudly called for; and in many instances the growing population and extending settlements of the country have absolutely required them. In making such improvements, care has been taken so to extend them as to give the greatest possible accommodation at the least expense, and in such a manner as would be most likely to increase the revenue. It is in part owing to these improvements that the amount of revenue is so much augmented, though they have, at the same time, considerably increased the expenditures of the department.

Between the 1st of July, 1829, and the 1st of July, 1830, the transportation of the mail was increased in stages equal to

-	745,767 miles a year
On horseback and in sulkies.	67,104 do.

Making an annual increase of transportation, equal to - - - 812,871 miles a year beyond the amount of any former period."

From this the House would at once see the reason of the increased expenditure of that department. But, while on this subject, he would make one or two observations. In the course of last summer it was said in many places that the Post Office Department was insolvent, and that it had been made so by the present incumbent, and that he had asked an appropriation of money from the treasury to sustain the department. It was published in many of the papers, and believed by a great portion of the people that this was the fact. This statement caused great dissatisfaction; and if the fact had been as stated, there would have been a general disapproval of that department. But it was not true. The Postmaster General did not ask for an appropriation, but the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads called upon him to know how much it would take to put in operation a certain number of new routes, and he answered that it would take $86,000. No sooner was this done, than a clamor was spread abroad that the department was insolvent. Sir, if this bill passes without the proposed amendment, and is put into operation—and it will assuredly be the duty of the department to put it in operation—it will require an additional expenditure of a sum of $80,000 at the least, and perhaps much more; for, since the last session, when the probable expense of carrying it into effect had been reported, every member who wanted a new post route had gone and stuck it into the bill, which, instead of one hundred and fifty new routes, now contained three hundred. One route had been put into the bill, on which, he was told, in all probability there would not one letter pass in two weeks. No doubt, that, in reference to that route, the committee had been differently informed, or they would not have admitted it into the bill. Looking over the bill, he found also in one case two routes over one road—that is, from the same point to the same point: one of these, however, he believed, had been struck out. The establishment of these unnecessary routes may serve to give post offices to individuals who want the power to frank letters; and some man on each of these routes, who has a spare horse and a little boy to ride it, may find employment for both: but, sir, it does seem to me, that the Postmaster General would understand the routes infinitely better than the Post Office committee can possibly understand them. He is better acquainted with the existing routes, and with the bearing of new routes in relation to them, so as to prevent the routes from running into one another, &c. Members of this House may understand very well the roads within their respective districts; but whether the conversion of them into post roads would be generally beneficial, they are not so good or disinterested judges. One member's constituents comes to him, and tells him, "I want a mail route by my house." He is an old friend, and has supported the member at all times, through evil and through good report, and the member cannot refuse it to him. But, if the discretion was left to the Postmaster General, as proposed by the amendment, those routes which were likely to be of general use, would be put in operation, while others of a different description would not. Mr. D. said he trusted, therefore, the amendment would be adopted. Pass this bill, said he, and what will be the result? Why, although the appropriation has been struck out of this bill, you involve the department in an increased annual expense of a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars. The Postmaster General will be compelled to require an appropriation from the treasury to carry on his department. That is not calculated upon by the people. They will not approve it. They are willing that the income of the establishment shall be expended for its support, but they are not willing that the treasury shall be called upon to furnish the means of extending it. And, sir, we ought to pause, and stop until the funds of the department shall be in a state to allow us to go on adding to its expenditure, by establishing hundreds of new routes at a time.

[After Mr. D. closed his remarks, the House adjourned without taking the question, either on the bill or the amendment.]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 20.

The House assembled at twelve o'clock.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. HOFFMAN begged permission to trespass for a moment upon the time of the House. It would be recollected that to-day was fixed upon for proceeding in the trial of Judge Peck, in the case of that individual's impeachment before the Senate of the United States. It was, in his opinion, advisable that the House should attend, even if only in the first instance to prosecute the case before the Senate; and, with this view, he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, from time to time, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to attend in the chamber of the Senate on the trial of the impeachment against James H. Peck, a judge of the United States' district court for the district of Missouri.

Mr. HOFFMAN said, in support of his resolution, that it was not dictated by any spirit of idle curiosity to witness the proceedings in the Senate chamber on so solemn and interesting an occasion, but from an anxiety to ascertain the principles upon which such an important matter was to be conducted, in order that the presence of the House, before the highest tribunal in the Union, might give effect to a case which would be a subject of discussion throughout the country, and which would form part of our public history. The trial of an impeachment was a proceeding of a grave nature; it was never instituted but for the purpose of punishing those offences which the ordinary laws could not reach; and as such, it was, perhaps, better that it should be attended with all the solemnity possible; besides, such would be the interest manifested to witness its progress, that it was doubtful to him whether they should be able to obtain a quorum in that House during the time that the proceedings upon it were carrying on in the Senate.

Mr. DWIGHT said he concurred with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] in the propriety of the House attending during the trial; but this resolution seemed to imply the necessity of its continual attendance. He was desirous the House should meet at eleven o'clock, in order to give the House one hour for their own business.

After some remarks from Messrs. WICKLIFFE and

BUCHANAN, who stated that the Senate were waiting for the appearance of the managers, and the proposition of an amendment to the resolution by Mr. DWIGHT, which were subsequently negatived,

Mr. POLK moved to amend the resolution, by inserting "this day," instead of "from time to time;" and this was accepted by the mover as a modification, as this would give the House an opportunity of discussing the question of its continual attendance, to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIS objected to the attendance of the House in the Senate chamber, which he conceived to be entirely unnecessary. There were two or three hundred bills already on their table, which it would, he thought, be better to dispose of, with the utmost promptitude. As to not having a quorum present for the despatch of the public business, should such be the case, it would be easy to try the effect of a call of the House. Upon the question of the adoption of the resolution, he should call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DODDRIDGE moved to lay the resolution upon the table. Negatived.

The resolution of Mr. HOFFMAN was then carried; and, On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. DRAYTON in the chair, and repaired in procession, accompanied by their officers, to the Senate chamber, where, having been seated, the impeachment was proceeded in.

The Representatives, after some time, having returned to their own hall, in like order, and

Mr. DRAYTON having reported, on motion of

Mr. WHITTLESEY, it was resolved, that when the House adjourned, it should adjourn till eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 21.

SILK MANUFACTURE.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the letter of P. S. Duponceau, presenting to the House a flag of American silk and manufacture, made the following report:

"The Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the letter of Peter S. Duponceau, to the Speaker of the House, announcing his presentation to the House of a silken flag, bearing the colors of the United States, made of American silk, reeled from cocoons, and prepared and woven by John D'Homergue, silk manufacturer, the entire process in the manufacture of the same having been performed in the city of Philadelphia, report:

"That they consider this specimen of American industry, applied for the first time to the production of a fabric in such general use in the United States, in the purchase of which, in foreign countries, several millions of dollars are annually drawn from this country, as highly auspicious to the agriculture and arts of the United States; and that Mr. Duponceau, for his patriotic exertions in promoting the culture of silk, and in his efforts to excite the attention of the people of the United States to that important branch of industry, deserves the commendation of his country. The committee have received a communication from Mr. Duponceau, detailing various important facts and remarks in reference to the bill entitled 'An act for promoting the growth and manufacture of silk,' which they have appended to this report for the information of the House; and the committee report a resolution, and recommend its adoption by the House.

"Resolved, That the flag, bearing the colors of the United States, presented to this House by Peter S. Duponceau, of Philadelphia, made of American silk, and prepared and woven by John D'Homergue, silk manufacturer in the city of Philadelphia, be accepted by this House, and that it be displayed, under the direction of the Speaker, in some conspicuous part of the hall of sittings of this House."

Mr. ALEXANDER moved that the report and letter therein referred to, lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for a division of the question; and the question being put to lay the report, &c. on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 74.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the committee, and it was determined in the affirmative.

Subsequently, the report and letters were ordered to be printed.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, rose to ask, for his own information, whether it was expected that the managers, in the absence of the House, were to conduct the trial of the impeachment against Judge Peck. The hour for the trial had now arrived, and it was necessary for the House to take some order on the subject.

Mr. HOFFMAN hoped that the same course would be pursued by the House to-day, as was taken by it yesterday; and he accordingly submitted, for the consideration of the House, the same resolution that was yesterday adopted by the House.

The resolution was then read, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, the House agreed to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair; and,

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the House, as a committee, proceeded to the Senate chamber, further to attend the trial of the impeachment against Judge Peck; and, after about two hours and a half spent therein, the committee returned to the hall, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the said Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had, according to order, again attended the trial of the said impeachment in the Senate, and that the court had adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

And thereupon the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. McDUFFIE, from the select committee on so much of the President's message as relates to an amendment of the constitution respecting the election of President and Vice President of the United States, reported, in part, the following joint resolution; which was read, and laid on the table:

Resolved, &c., That the following amendment of the constitution of the United States be proposed to the several States, to be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of said constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, viz.

No person shall be hereafter eligible to the office of President of the United States, who shall have been previously elected to the said office, and who shall have accepted the same, or exercised the powers thereof.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. DWIGHT submitted a resolution, in substance, requiring the House to meet each day at eleven o'clock during the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck; and that at twelve o'clock it would resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceed to the Senate for the purpose of attending the trial.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. PETTIS opposed the resolution. He said that a resolution was offered at the last session of the House to attend on the trial, but the House only attended one day. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] offered his resolution on Monday, there was no time for discussion. Yesterday, the House pursued the same course as on Monday. He hoped the resolution would be rejected, if for no other reason than that the proceeding was wholly unnecessary. If the House had no business before them, gentlemen might indulge their curiosity in attending the trial in the Senate. For himself, he had no such curiosity. There was a great number of bills on the docket, which required the action of the House; it was a short session; and, if the House attended every day in the Senate during the trial, there would be little or nothing else done. He thought the interest of the people of the United States generally should be taken into consideration; the House had appointed able managers to conduct the impeachment; and these managers had declared that it was not necessary for the House to attend. Why should we go? asked Mr. P. Why neglect the public business to gratify our own curiosity? Mr. P. concluded by expressing the hope that the House would not be compelled to go to the Senate in a body.

Mr. DWIGHT said that the gentleman who had just taken his seat, had remarked that, in attending the trial of the impeachment, gentlemen wished to indulge their own curiosity. Let me ask, said Mr. D., if the Representatives of the nation have not a higher motive for doing so? Were not the House bound to attend in the fulfilment of their constitutional functions? Mr. D. apprehended that the public business might be attended to, and yet the House be able to attend on the trial.

After a few words from Mr. PETTIS,

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the resolution of Mr. DWIGHT, by inserting the words "until otherwise ordered;" so that the House should at any time have the power to rescind the resolution.

Mr. DWIGHT accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. DODDRIDGE preferred the resolution originally offered by Mr. HOFFMAN on Monday last, and moved its consideration as a substitute for that this day offered by Mr. DWIGHT.

After some remarks by Messrs. DODDRIDGE, HOFFMAN, and STRONG, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DRAYTON then moved an amendment; which he supported in a few words: when

Mr. HAYNES, believing that the opinion of the members was made up on the subject, called for the previous question. The call was sustained by the House—yeas 90.

The previous question was then put, in the following words, viz. Shall the main question be now put? and decided in the affirmative.

The main question being then put, viz. on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. DWIGHT, it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 87.

So the House decided to leave to the managers the conducting of the impeachment against Judge Peck.

The bill to establish certain post roads, and to discontinue others, coming up as the order of the day, it was, on motion of Mr. DANIEL, in consequence of the necessary absence of Mr. WICKLIFFE, who offered a proviso to it on Friday last, ordered to lie on the table.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MAGEE in the chair, and took up the bill for the relief of Bernard Kelly, of Georgia. The report of the committee and the evidence in the case were read. The bill was supported by Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, and Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., and opposed by Mr. WHITTLESEY and Mr. STERIGERE; the latter of whom moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

[H. OF R.]

The motion was negatived; whereupon, the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House without amendment.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays—yeas 71, nays 49.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23.

NAVY YARDS.

The following resolution, yesterday submitted by Mr. PEARCE, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House the annual sum necessary to maintain a navy yard for building and equipping of ships with despatch, under the present navy regulations, with the probable annual amount of deterioration of buildings, and interest of the money disbursed in the erection of buildings necessary for a navy yard."

Mr. HOFFMAN (chairman of the Naval Committee) said he should like to hear some reasons offered for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. PEARCE replied that he would gratify the gentleman. He assured him that he had not acted unadvisedly in submitting the motion; for he had taken the pains to consult with the Secretary of the Navy, and it was offered with his approbation. The subject had been brought before Congress at the last session; the number of navy yards was then stated to be too great; and it was manifest that if there were more navy yards than was necessary for the public interest, that the expense to the nation of supporting them was greater than it need be. He believed that the expense of maintaining the several yards amounted to $300,000 annually. The object of the resolution was to obtain such information as would enable the House to act understandingly when the matter should be brought before it.

Mr. HOFFMAN stated that, by a resolution of the House, the Committee on Naval Affairs already had the subject before them; and he hoped the gentleman from Rhode Island would consent that the resolution should lie on the table until he, Mr. H., could confer with the committee. He thought it probable he should be able to do so to-morrow.

Mr. PEARCE remarked that he had no great objection to the resolution lying on the table for a day or two; but the House would recollect that this would be a short session, and that the information was wanted for the action of the House. Certainly no disrespect was intended towards the Committee on Naval Affairs; and he trusted that the gentleman would agree to the reference at this time.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that the information now sought could be obtained through the Committee on Naval Affairs. He thought the adoption of the resolution wholly unnecessary, and would conclude by moving that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. HAYNES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, during the trial of the impeachment now pending before the Senate, this House will meet daily at the hour of eleven o'clock in the forenoon; and that, from day to day, it will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and attend said trial during the continuance thereof, and until the conclusion of the same.

In support of this motion,

Mr. HAYNES said, whatever difference of opinion there might have been on this subject before, the proceedings of yesterday must convince every gentleman of the expediency of the course now proposed. Whilst the House yesterday found itself without a quorum, he saw that among the absentees were gentlemen who had voted against the proposition for attending the court of impeachment. He meant not to charge any members with impropriety on this account, but mentioned the fact to show the expediency and propriety of passing this resolution. It appeared to him, indeed, to be a singular proceeding, on the part of this House, that when the only precedent in existence was in favor of the course proposed in the resolution now under consideration, the House should have refused to adopt it. Could it be pretended that there was any difference in the magnitude of the present case and the former case of impeachment, which justified different forms of proceeding in the two cases? He presumed not. The same personal liberty, and the same inalienable rights, guaranteed by the constitution of our country, were involved in this case as in that of the impeachment of Judge Chase. Without going unnecessarily into the merits of the case, or consuming one moment of the time of the House, Mr. H. hoped that his motion would prevail.

Mr. TUCKER opposed the resolution. He considered it to be the duty of gentlemen to continue in the House, and attend to the public business of the nation; and, if any member chose to attend the trial, let him account to his constituents for his neglect of duty. He should be very sorry if the resolution was agreed to; and he called for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

Mr. HAYNES said he would ask the gentleman from South Carolina how members of this House were to account for it to their constituents, if, in consequence of the absence of so many members from the House during the trial, some legislation should be defeated which ought to succeed, and some succeed which ought to fail. In looking at this matter, Mr. H. said he viewed it as a practical question. Every one must know what an interest would be excited and felt in this trial at almost every moment of it, and that it would be impracticable for this House to transact business whilst that court was in session.

Mr. TUCKER repeated the question put to him by Mr. HAYNES, and replied, that he should hold himself guiltless if such should be the case. If blame should attach, it would be to those who had not discharged their duties, by remaining in the House. If any important measure should be adopted, affecting the interests of the constituents of members during their absence from the sittings of the House, let those members account for it as they best could. He should attend to what he conceived to be his duty.

Mr. PETTIS, of Missouri, rose to ask the favor of the House to allow this question to be taken by yeas and nays. Whilst up, he said, he would make one remark. The gentleman from Georgia complained that a quorum could not be kept yesterday. But, said Mr. P., when it was doubted whether there was a quorum, it was found, on the Speaker's count, that there was a quorum. Experience sufficiently proved that a quorum could not be got to attend the court; for, on the last attendance of the House, the honorable Speaker and the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when they returned from the court to the House, returned almost alone, two or three members only returning with them. The root of all difficulty in this matter was, in fact, the indisposition of members to do the business of the House.

The House refused to sustain the call for the yeas and nays; and the question being taken on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. HAYNES, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 60.

So the House determined to attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. YANCEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the pay and mileage of the members of Congress to six dollars for every day's service, and six dollars for every twenty miles going to and returning from the seat of the General Government.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, demanded the question of consideration; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. CROCKETT stated, that, at the last session of Congress, the bill "to amend 'An act authorizing the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same,' passed 18th April, 1806," was rejected, and that a motion was afterwards made that the House reconsider the same; which motion was laid on the table. He rose for the purpose of moving that the House do now proceed to consider the said bill.

The motion was negatived—yeas 74, nays 86.

JUDGE PECK.

The hour of twelve having arrived, Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said, that, as the House had determined upon attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck, he would make a motion that it now go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose. He did not vote for the resolution which had been this day adopted, on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia; yet, as the House had resolved on attending the trial in the Senate, he thought that it ought to be punctual in its attendance.

The SPEAKER observed that he considered it to be the duty of the Senate to notify the House on each day, when it was ready to proceed in the trial.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate to attend the trial of Judge Peck.

Having returned, Mr. CAMBRELENG reported progress; and thereupon the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24.

Mr. JOHNS, after a few introductory remarks, moved that the resolution yesterday adopted, on the motion of Mr. HAYNES, that the House do, from day to day, attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck, be reconsidered; and on his motion he called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. POLK said, that in the first instance he had opposed a resolution of the kind, considering it unnecessary for the House to attend the trial of the impeachment. The House, on the occasion to which he alluded, rejected the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DWIGHT,] and on that day did not attend—yesterday they did. The Senate had been notified that this House would attend during the trial, and he was anxious that the House, though the resolution was adopted against his wishes, yet, being adopted, should preserve a proper degree of consistency. He considered it of no importance that the House should attend the trial; they would adjourn to Monday; and if, on that day, a majority should determine against attending, why, be it so; but let us not be blown about by every breeze. In conclusion, Mr. P. moved to postpone the question of reconsideration to Monday next.

Mr. JOHNS making no objection, his motion was postponed by general consent.

After the reception of a number of resolutions,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate chamber, for the purpose of attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck. Having returned to their hall, the committee reported progress, and the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 27.

After disposing of a number of petitions and resolutions,

The House then proceeded to consider the motion made by Mr. JOHNS, on Friday, that the resolution adopted on the previous day, on the motion of Mr. HAYNES, that the House do, from day to day, attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck, be reconsidered.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, moved to postpone the further consideration of the motion till Monday next.

Mr. JOHNS opposed the motion, and called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to it. They were ordered by the House.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to lay the motion of Mr. JOHNS on the table—and on this motion Mr. MCCREERY called for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. STERIGERE, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 79.

JUDGE PECK.

The hour of twelve having arrived, Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was again called to the chair, and the committee proceeded to the Senate chamber. Having afterwards returned to their hall, the committee reported further progress; and thereupon

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 28.

THE TARIFF DOCTRINE.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. HOWARD: Resolved, That the following reports, made by the Committees on Commerce and Manufactures, on the subject of protecting duties upon manufactures, be printed for the use of the House: Report made 10th February, 1802: Report made 18th February, 1802: Report made 8th March, 1802: Report made 16th April, 1802: Report made 21st February, 1803: Report made 25th January, 1804.

Mr. WICKLIFFE called upon the mover of the resolution to state the reasons for it.

Mr. HOWARD said that he was always unwilling to introduce any matter into the House that might give rise to debate, and he certainly would not have offered the resolution if he had not supposed the object in view to be of such a character as to justify the consumption of a small portion of the time of the House. Upon reading the old journal, recently reprinted, he had found that such reports were made; and, being curious to see their purport, he had searched for a printed volume containing them, but had experienced such difficulty, that he was obliged to resort to the manuscript records of the House, and in that form he had read the reports in question. He was desirous to give them a more attentive examination than was possible in such a cursory reading, and he thought some of them, at least, worthy of the perusal of every member of the House, as indicating the opinion of the leading politicians of the nation in the years 1802, 1803, and 1804. This was one ground upon which he had offered the resolution. But there was another reason of a more general nature, that he would state in as few words as possible. The reports mentioned in the resolution advocated the policy of protecting manufactures, and were referred to committees of the whole House, by whom they appear to have been discussed, until, in the year 1804, they were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, at the head of which was a distinguished gentleman of Virginia, now absent on a foreign mission. In one of the reports, the existence of peace in Europe (the brief peace of 1802) was assigned as a reason for the adoption of the policy of protecting domestic manufactures; and he presumed that the return of "war freights," as the committee termed them, was the reason that the subject was not afterwards pressed. This, however, was nothing more than a conjecture. But it was certain that the constitutional power of Congress to impose protecting duties was assumed as a postulate, inasmuch as the reports were based entirely upon the exercise of that power. In the present posture of public affairs, when the existence of such a power was denied, and an appeal made to the great tribunal of public opinion, Mr. H. considered it to be the duty of the House to bring out from its past records, and throw before the nation, whatever could tend in the slightest degree to shed any light upon a question of such magnitude. The years 1802, 1803, and 1804, were looked upon by many of our statesmen as the choicest periods of our civil history; and, although he was no believer in the doctrine that all wisdom was confined to our ancestors, yet, upon a question of constitutional power, the opinions of enlightened politicians who flourished at a period coeval with, or immediately succeeding, the establishment of the Government, were worthy of some consideration. Mr. H. said, he was desirous of throwing them before the public, to pass for whatever they might be worth, and no more. The existence and purport of the reports specified in the resolution, he believed, were not generally known; at least as far as his own limited inquiries had gone, he had not met with them; and he had therefore been induced to offer the resolution.

Mr. SPEIGHT objected to the resolution, as being intended to produce an effect favorable to the exercise by Congress of the power of protecting manufactures. There had been a faction from the beginning of this Government, he said, in favor of such doctrines—the same faction which wanted to establish a monarchy in this country—and had nearly succeeded, too. Did the gentleman mean to bring forward these reports to sustain these doctrines? What will be the effect of reviving these reports now, by causing them to be printed? Are they, said he, to be placed on members' tables, in order to be franked throughout the United States, to prove that Congress has the constitutional right to tax my constituents, and the people of the South generally, for the support of manufactures? Gentlemen have it already in their power to recur to these documents, if they desire to do so; and if they want the aid of them to make speeches, they can have it without having them printed. For his part, Mr. S. said, observation had convinced him that nothing like argument on this subject would have any effect upon this House. He repeated that he was opposed to printing these documents, because of its being intended to operate on public opinion, and because also of the expense of printing them.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he differed so far from his friend from North Carolina, that he would publish every thing concerning the exercise of this power by Congress. Mr. C. said he had a great reverence for antiquity; and if we are to have reports of 1802, 1803, and 1804, he hoped gentlemen would agree with him, and revive the tariff of 1803 and 1804, which was the fruit of these reports. There would then be no difference of opinion in this House upon the constitutionality of the power of taxation exercised by Congress. He hoped that, some time hereafter, the Government would revise its acts, and restore those principles which the Government has so far departed from.

Mr. SPEIGHT agreed with the gentleman from New York, that the more the subject was examined, the more obvious must be the propriety of a reduction of the tariff. His objection to the motion was, that, by this partial publication of documents, an impression was intended to be produced that, at an earlier period of this Government, there had been a perfect acquiescence in this power of protecting manufactures by excessive taxation of imports.

A motion having been made to lay the resolution on the table, it was decided in the negative, without a count.

Mr. RAMSEY then moved the following amendment, which he accompanied by a few remarks:

"Resolved, That, in addition to the usual number, the number be so increased as that the Clerk of this House furnish the Legislatures of the different States each with four copies."

Mr. HOWARD rose, and was about to address the House, when a message was received from the Senate, informing that that body was now sitting as a high court of impeachment: whereupon,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was again called to the chair, and the committee proceeded to the Senate chamber. Having afterwards returned to their hall, the committee reported further progress; and thereupon

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29.

THE TARIFF DOCTRINE.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolution yesterday moved by Mr. HOWARD, of Maryland, for printing certain reports of the Committees on Commerce and Manufactures in the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, with Mr. RAMSEY's motion to amend the resolution, so as to cause to be sent to the Legislature of each State in the Union four copies of such reports, when printed:

Mr. HOWARD opposed the amendment proposed by Mr. RAMSEY, which, he said, proposed to give more consequence to the reports than they deserved. He was not disposed to bring them either before the House or the nation as conclusive evidence of the constitutionality of the tariff laws, but as the means of assisting the formation of a correct opinion upon the subject. When printed, these reports would doubtless be reprinted in the public journals, and would thus be circulated. They will altogether make but a few pages; and he was unwilling to send such a matter as that to the Legislatures of the several States, not deeming it of sufficient importance to be submitted to their consideration. Mr. H. said he had a very high idea of the dignity of the Legislatures of the several States, and had more than once regretted to see them coming to this House with petitions. But that was a matter into which he would not enter at present. He objected, further, to the proposed amendment, that, if adopted, it would introduce other amendments, and the original proposition would be in danger of being crushed by the weight of the amendments.

The question was then taken on Mr. RAMSEY's amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he had not changed his opinion on this subject since yesterday. He would only now remark, that, in the short period he had been a member of this House, and of another legislative body, he never knew a proposition like this to be made. That the House has a right to print documents necessary to throw new light on subjects before it, no one would deny; but it had not the right to print old documents for electioneering purposes, and to show what our ancestors had considered constitutional. This controversy concerning the tariff he had never viewed as one between the North and the South, but between the aristocracy and the people; and this is to be found in the South as well as the North. If documents were to be printed to assist one side in this controversy, let both sides have the same chance before the people. He presumed that there were other documents bearing on this subject which might be interesting to the people, besides those specified by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Tariff Doctrine.

He moved to amend the original proposition by adding the following, which he hoped the gentleman would accept as a part of his motion:

"Also the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the state of the finances, made 13th March, 1828; report of the Committee on Commerce, made 8th February, 1830."

Mr. HOWARD said that he was sorry that he could not assent to the amendment, and, in stating his objection to it, it would be necessary for him to be more explicit than he was yesterday. An impression has gone abroad, said he, and has been carefully cherished by a certain description of politicians who are opposed to the system of protection of manufactures, that the party which elected and sustained Mr. Jefferson were opposed to that policy. This question, Mr. H. said, was now before the nation, and his only object was to throw such light upon the question, as would enable the people to decide it correctly. The amount of talent in the nation without these walls was many hundred fold greater than that within them, and wanted not the aid of this House to form an opinion. Thus, when the House spread before the people the materials from which to form a judgment, it had done its duty. The opinion that the party which sustained Mr. Jefferson was averse to duties for the protection of manufactures, had been sedulously instilled into the public mind. That, opinion, however, was wholly erroneous. The publication of the reports in question, taken in connexion with the tariff law of 1804, would show that, from the year 1802 to the year 1804, the party which sustained Mr. Jefferson not only sustained the constitutionality of such laws, but actually passed them. If this was made out by this publication, it would go to remove erroneous impressions, which, like all other erroneous impressions, ought to be removed. Reviewing the provisions of the act of 1804, Mr. H. said it was clear that, in passing it, Congress had acted under the power of which the constitutionality had since been called in question. All that he wished to show, by printing these reports, and a reference to the act which was founded upon them, was, that the party which is now supposed to have been hostile to the power of protecting manufactures, actually did sustain that power. What effect this fact would have upon public opinion, it was not his province to determine. It was sufficient for him to believe that the measure which he proposed would remove from the public mind an erroneous impression, and he wished, therefore, that it should not be encumbered with other matters foreign to this object.

The question was then taken on Mr. SENECA's amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the assent of the gentleman from Maryland to add to his proposition the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in March, 1792—the first report made by him when money was wanted to pay the public debt; in which he refers to that fact, and states that when the object of payment of the debt is accomplished, these taxes will be no longer necessary. The time is approaching when that question will come up, and this report would be useful. He took occasion to say, that he concurred in the policy of reducing the duties on raw materials, and he would go as far as any one to protect domestic industry, by repealing, not increasing, the taxes on imports. That was the policy of the act of 1804. It has not been the policy upon which Congress have since acted; for they have protected industry by heaping taxes on all the necessaries of life, acting with particular oppression on the agricultural interest. But, Mr. C. said, he would not go into that matter now. Mr. C. mentioned another report, which he wished included in the motion. These two reports, he said, interesting as they were, he had not been able to find in print, except in the pages of the United States Gazette. He hoped the gentleman from Maryland would consent to include these two reports in his motion.

Mr. HOWARD said he had just stated to the House the reasons which induced him to decline accepting the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. The same reasons operated upon him in now declining to accept that proposed by the gentleman from New York. His object, he said, was a limited one, and confined to a short space of time. As the idea had gone abroad that the party which came into power with Mr. Jefferson was opposed to duties for protecting manufactures, he wished to show that that opinion was unfounded. His motion affirmed nothing; it denied nothing—it sought only for truth. The papers desired by the gentleman from New York had nothing to do with the point of his inquiry, and he could not, therefore, accept his amendment.

Mr. MALLARY said he had been opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, because ten thousand copies of the latter report had been printed at the last session of Congress. He declared himself in favor of that offered by the gentleman from New York. It was feared, by some gentlemen, that the resolution would be overloaded by amendments, if the present one was adopted. He had no fears of this kind. He wished, for himself, to go back to the early periods of the Government, far and wide, so that the wisdom of the sages then in the councils of the country might be diffused amongst the people of the present day, and their opinions and principles be widely disseminated. For his part, he should like to know what had been the sentiments of Hamilton and Jefferson on the subject now agitated, and what their principles were. He had risen to express his hope that the House would bestow a liberal indulgence, and that all that was required to be printed, by the resolution and amendment, would be granted for the public information. The principles of the early legislators of the Government were not to be lightly treated. The House had heretofore ordered a reprint of the old journals; but, asked Mr. M., who reads or thinks of them? Here and there they were consulted, to be sure, when some individual wished to know how a member or members had voted on certain questions; but, as matter of history, they were of comparatively little use. The matters called for by the resolution and proposed amendment would, on the contrary, be universally read by the people of the United States. He hoped, therefore, the House would order the printing.

Mr. ARCHER said that the object of the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, it was apparent, was not to supply any defect of information in this House; for the gentleman had avowed that his purpose was political—to produce, by the weight of the authority of the House, an effect; not to inform the public mind, merely, but to produce a party effect. He submitted it to the gentleman himself, whether such an operation was any part of the proper duty of this House? He would ask whether it consisted with its dignity? Whether the purpose avowed by the mover was one which the House ought not to avoid? What right had the House to apply its contingent fund, as proposed, to mere party purposes? If our public men have been inconsistent, let them be rebuked for it. But is this House the proper organ to do it?

[Mr. A. here made an allusion to the distant absence of one of the persons implicated in such a charge, (supposed to be Mr. RANDOLPH,) but Mr. HOWARD rose, and disclaimed any such allusion or object.]

Mr. ARCHER said, on the face of the resolution, as well as by the avowal of the mover, these papers were not to be printed for the information of the House, but to subserve party purposes; which, he repeated, was no part of the proper duties of the House, which, he hoped, would not lend its authority to any such purpose.

Mr. WAYNE, of Geo., commenced some remarks in favor of the amendment; but had uttered one or two sentences only, when

A message was received from the Senate that they were sitting as a court of impeachment.

The House then forthwith resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MARTIN, of S. C. in the chair,) and proceeded to the Senate chamber again, to attend the trial of Judge Peck.

Having afterwards returned to their hall, the committee reported further progress; and thereupon

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. HOWARD, ordering the printing of certain reports; the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. CAMBRELENG being under consideration—

Mr. WAYNE observed that, when the hour expired yesterday, he was about to state the distinction between the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from New York. There was no such difference between them as would justify the House in rejecting the one and adopting the other. If the object of the gentleman from New York, in submitting his amendment, was to inform the public of Mr. Jefferson's opinions, on a certain subject, in '93, upon what principle will the House reject his amendment, and adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, when it calls for the doctrines promulgated by the same in 1803? and that, too, when the avowed object of the gentleman from Maryland is not to enlighten the public mind, but to subserve party purposes. The object of the gentleman from Maryland was to prove that Mr. Jefferson, and the party that came with him into power, were in favor of the protective system. Mr. W. had no objection to the resolution, and he would vote for it, whether the amendment of the gentleman from New York was adopted or not.

He would vote for it because there could be nothing tortured out of these reports to prove that Mr. Jefferson, or his friends, had, at any time, conceded the power in question. Mr. W. said he was not now disposed to enter into a discussion of that question: but, when he saw an attempt made to impress the belief that Mr. Jefferson was in favor of certain doctrines, he felt bound to correct, as far as he could, the erroneous impression. Such a proposition was never distinctly affirmed by Mr. Jefferson, nor by his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gallatin. He would acknowledge that duties were imposed on foreign articles during Mr. Jefferson's administration; but it was equally well known, that the express object of that tariff was, not as a bounty to domestic manufactures, but to liquidate the national debt. Sir, said Mr. W., in looking over Mr. Gallatin's reports, I have found no evidence whatever, of the slightest interference with this subject. In one of Mr. Jefferson's messages to Congress, he alluded to the encouragement of such manufactures as would render us independent. A general proposition was made in Congress to refer this part of the message to a committee, in order to see what might be necessary to supply the wants of the military establishment.

A debate arose on this subject, in which the strong ground was taken, that Congress had no power to act on the subject, and that it was strictly confined to revenue bills. From these circumstances, Mr. W. thought it a matter of inference, not to be resisted, that, so far as the character of Mr. Jefferson's administration is concerned, there is no support to be obtained for the protective system. He did not say that all Mr. Jefferson's friends were opposed to it. As he said before, Mr. W. was indifferent, himself, whether the amendment of the gentleman from New York was adopted or not. He would vote both for it and the resolution.

The gentleman from Maryland wishes to call up reports of this House in 1802, '3, and '4, to prove that Mr. Jefferson, and the party in power with him, were in favor of the protective system. Why not, said Mr. W., suffer Mr. Jefferson's own report, on the same subject, to be given to the public? Why not permit him to speak for himself? He believed the reports were only to be found in the library of Congress.

Mr. DRAYTON said he was not disposed to make any remarks on the merits of the reports called for, either by the gentleman from Maryland, or the gentleman from New York. The House, he observed, had no right to adopt either the resolution or the amendment. He had no doubt but all would recollect a joint resolution passed last session, prohibiting the expenditure of the contingent fund for any printing other than that called for by the current business of either House. All other printing must be paid for out of the treasury, by the ordinary process of an appropriation bill. He would, for the satisfaction of the House, ask the Clerk to read the joint resolution to which he alluded. And, after it had been read, Mr. D. moved that the resolution and amendment be referred to the Committee on the Library; and the question being put, it was agreed to.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. CHILTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of adopting some uniform mode for computing the distance for which members of Congress shall be allowed compensation for mileage to and from the seat of Government; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

In support of this resolution,

Mr. CHILTON said that he had not offered the resolution with a view to cast any imputation on honorable members. Neither had he offered it from electioneering motives, or with a view to home consumption. That there was a great disparity, at the present time, in the computation of the mileage of members, could not be denied. As an example, he would state that, of two gentlemen, both living in the same section of the country, one had, by a difference in the computation of mileage, received a difference in amount of one-half. In 1825, the mileage of the two Senators from Missouri, both residing in St. Louis, so varied, that one received $1,700 and a small fraction, while the other received $3,300 and a large fraction. He had made it his business to examine into the subject, and he had discovered many inequalities in the payment of the mileage of members, which, in his opinion, called loudly for the interposition of the House, so that an equality might be established amongst members. He wished the resolution to be referred to a committee; but, if the House did not consider it a matter of sufficient importance to take this course, he was satisfied. If they saw proper to take up the subject, it would consume but little time.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did not think the resolution of sufficient importance for the appointment of a select committee, and suggested to the mover to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHILTON only wanted some order taken upon the resolution by the House, and declared his readiness to agree to the proposed modification.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, the House of Representatives had passed a bill on this subject, which had not been acted upon by the Senate; and he was much astonished at hearing of some of the reasons which were assigned in that body why the bill should not pass. [The SPEAKER said it was not in order to allude to proceedings in the Senate. Mr. WICKLIFFE: Not to proceedings of the last session? The SPEAKER: No, sir. Mr. WICKLIFFE: If we have no right to refer to proceedings of either House at former sessions of Congress, I am of opinion that the parliamentary rules ought to be amended.] What he had risen to suggest, however, was, that the Committee on

Mr. CHILTON said he had no objection to such a reference of it.

Mr. JENNINGS, after a few observations, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CHILTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. ELLSWORTH called for the reading of the present law on the subject of the mileage of members, and the law was read by the Clerk.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution on the table, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 31.

After the reception of a variety of petitions and resolutions,

Mr. CROCKETT made an unsuccessful motion for the House to reconsider the Tennessee land bill. The House refused, by a vote of 69 to 97.

THE CLAIM OF JAMES MONROE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. MERCER, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, on the bill reported at the last session for the relief of James Monroe.

This bill is in the following words:

[Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be paid to James Monroe, out of any unappropriated moneys in the treasury, the sum of $67,980 96.]

Mr. MERCER, in a speech of something like an hour's length, explained the merits of this bill, and the grounds upon which the committee had gone in reporting it. He advocated the passage of the bill with his usual eloquence.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, made a strong speech against the bill.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, followed on the same side of the question.

Mr. GORDON, of Virginia, and Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, vindicated their constituents from reflections upon them in consequence of their interposition in favor of this claim.

Mr. COKE, of Virginia, expressing a desire for further examination of this subject, moved for the rising of the Committee of the Whole.

The committee rose, and the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1831.

ASYLUM FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of the New England Asylum for the Blind. He observed that the subject of this memorial was one of interest and importance: it was a very ably drawn paper, and contained much valuable information. The subject was one new to the House, and comparatively so to the public. As there was no standing committee of the House to which it appropriately belonged, he would submit a motion, (which he made with sincere reluctance, knowing the just aversion of the House to the multiplication of select committees,) that the reading of this memorial be dispensed with; that it be referred to a select committee, and be printed.

After inquiries from Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. HAYNES, as to the nature and objects of the memorial, the motion of Mr. EVERETT prevailed, and the subject was referred to a select committee of seven—69 votes to 54.

Mr. RICHARDSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business be instructed to inquire whether any measures may be devised and adopted to expedite the business before this House; and to report thereon by resolve or otherwise.

Mr. PEARCE opposed the reference of the resolution to the committee proposed; he thought that the better reference would be to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. RICHARDSON thought that committee had the superintendence of all the business before the House, and he knew of none better to entertain the subject of his resolution. There were no less than two hundred bills lying over from the last session, and he thought some course should be taken to expedite the business before the House.

Mr. MCCOY said that a great number of rules had been adopted already, to facilitate the business of the House, as it was said, and he was rather disposed to rely on them to help us along, than to make any more. If the resolution of the gentleman passed, it would change the whole method of doing business; this changing of forms had been tried too often, and the more rules we had, the worse the House seemed to get along. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion prevailed, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. JOHNS moved to take up the motion offered by him on Monday last, to reconsider the resolution adopted on the motion of Mr. HAYNES, on the 23d instant, that the House would daily resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck.

Mr. JOHNS called for the yeas and nays on his motion; they were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood—yeas 117, nays 48.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the motion of Mr. JOHNS, in other words, to reconsider that of Mr. HAYNES, and he called for the yeas and nays on this question, also. They were ordered by the House.

JAN. 3, 1831.]

James Monroe.—Bernard Kelly.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. JOHNS said he did not think it worth his while to enter upon any argument on the subject; he believed the minds of gentlemen were already made up, and he would not unnecessarily consume the time of the House.

Mr. HAYNES would not recapitulate what he had said on a former occasion. He was opposed to reconsideration, and trusted that the House would still continue to attend the trial.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, in a few brief remarks, stated the progress of the trial; that all the witnesses for the prosecution had been examined; and he presumed that two days would be sufficient to examine those for the respondent; when the defence would be opened. He was in favor of the House continuing to attend the trial.

Mr. PETTIS did not know where the gentleman from New York procured his information, that two days would be sufficient to complete the testimony in the case. It was probable quite as much time would be consumed in the examination of the witnesses for the respondent as for the prosecution. Whether the time were to be short or long, however, with him the question arose, whether the House intended, at the present session, to do any business? It was wholly unnecessary for the House to attend; and there could be no better evidence that such was the opinion of gentlemen, than the fact, that there had never been present at the trial more than fifty members—more frequently thirty, and even so few as twenty. It had before been said, we could not keep a quorum here while the trial was going on; the facts were, that a quorum could not be kept in the Senate; and why, asked Mr. P. should not the House decline going? It was wholly unnecessary, and he hoped they would determine to stay in the Hall.

Mr. SPENCER said he felt sure that the remaining part of the trial would not take up much more of the time of the House. Of the witnesses for the respondent, three of them had given depositions, and he felt certain that two days would be amply sufficient to conclude the examination of all the evidence.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that he was induced, from the last vote taken by the House, to offer a single argument. This House had, in the performance of their high powers, impeached a judge of the United States; they had attended his trial until they had heard all that had been said against the accused; and now, when the examination of witnesses for the defence was about to take place, gentlemen were ready to say, we have heard enough; we have heard all that can be said to prove the judge guilty, we wish to hear nothing in favor of his innocence. He considered that the House would be doing injustice to itself not to attend. The court had adjourned to Wednesday, and he saw no good reason for agitating the question of attendance at this time. He hoped the House would have some regard to its character for consistency, if not for justice. As he could see no necessity for acting on the resolution at this time, he would move that it lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNS called for the yeas and nays on this motion, and they were ordered by the House.

Being taken, they stood—yeas 55, nays 111.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was then put on the reconsideration of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

Here the hour expired for the consideration of resolutions.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. MERCER made an ineffectual attempt to get up the bill for the relief of James Monroe; the Chair declaring the motion to be out of order at this time.

BERNARD KELLY.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Bernard Kelly came up as the special order of the day.

[This bill provides the refunding to Bernard Kelly, of Georgia, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, one hundred and seventy-three dollars and eighty-two cents principal, two hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty cents interest, and forty-three dollars and eighty cents costs, making in the aggregate four hundred and thirty-five dollars and eighty-two cents, which was recovered by the Postmaster General against the said Kelly, in the district court of the United States for the State of Georgia, and paid by the said Kelly to the Post Office Department; the principal having been lost by the said Kelly, in his office, which was consumed by fire in the year 1805, while the said Kelly was acting Postmaster in the town of Washington, in said State.]

Mr. McDUFFIE said, if he understood the principles of the bill under discussion, it involved a violation of repeated decisions of the House. If an officer of the United States is to be discharged from all liability merely by his own statement, he would venture to state, that it would be attended with dangerous consequences. He did not pretend to be minutely informed in relation to the circumstances of this case; but if a public officer is to be not only exonerated from the payment of the money in his possession, but to be refunded the interest accruing thereon, he looked upon it as dangerous to the interests of the United States.

Mr. WAYNE said, that when a public officer, visited by a calamity which could neither be foreseen nor prevented, comes before this House for relief, two inquiries present themselves: one is, how has the loss occurred? The second is, what was the condition of the individual, and whether he had exercised proper care in the discharge of his duty? It was clearly shown in this case, that the claimant was in possession of the money; that his character as a public officer was unimpeachable; that at the hour of midnight the fire took place which consumed his house, goods, money, and papers. Under such circumstances, he knew of no stronger case that could be presented to the House. The time, the place, the circumstances, were of such a character that no better testimony than the claimant's own oath could be adduced.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, said he rose merely to apologize for the apparent inconsistency between the vote he formerly gave upon this bill, and that which he felt himself in duty bound to give now. When this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, he voted for it; but he should vote against it at present. When he voted for this claim some days ago, he knew very little about it. He sat on the outskirts of the hall, where it was very difficult to hear what was said; and he had taken many things for granted, in its favor, which he found, on examination, did not exist.

Strip this case, he said, of the allegations of the petitioner himself; divest it of his own affidavit, and there was no testimony that could support it. But there was very conclusive evidence against it; a judicial decision of his own district court, and by a jury of his own fellow-citizens, of Georgia, had been made against the petitioner in this case. The defalcation on which that judgment was founded, occurred twenty-five years ago. And now, at this late day, this bill proposes, virtually, to reverse the judgment of that court, on the allegations of the petitioner alone, and those allegations made under all the provocations and temptations of extreme poverty. He thought this would be setting a bad example, and establishing a dangerous precedent.

It had been said the petitioner was an honest man—a poor, unfortunate man, and that this was a case of peculiar hardship. This might all be very true; but such considerations as these would not justify him, or any other member of the House, in voting for a claim unauthorized by proper testimony. This House, said Mr. B., should be governed in its proceedings by certain principles; by a fixed and impartial mode of legislating on the claims of individuals; and their grand rule should be never to vote against the claims of even a political enemy, when well supported, nor to admit those of their best friends without sufficient proof.

But, Mr. B. said, he was not disposed to argue against the bill. He was willing that every gentleman should vote for it who could reconcile it to his notions of public duty to do so; and there were several reasons why he should like to vote for this claim himself, if he could do it with propriety. It came from a quarter where but few favors of any kind were asked for, and still fewer granted. The bill had been reported by a committee that he highly esteemed, and was supported both by his personal and political friends. If, therefore, he thought it only half right, he would vote for it. But, believing, as he did, that the passage of this bill would hold out encouragement to every delinquent postmaster in the United States to burn up his office and commit perjury and forgery, and that it would, in its tendency, overwhelm the treasury with a torrent of unjust demands, he was compelled by a sense of public duty to vote against it.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, in reply to the objections urged against the bill by Messrs. McDUFFIE and BLAIR, of South Carolina, said he held in his hand reports of committees of the House, which presented forty or fifty cases involving precisely the same principles as those embraced in this claim, in which relief had been extended. He cited on a former occasion, when the bill was before the House, the case of J. D. Hays, in which the only testimony on which his claim rested, was the solemnity of his own oath, and a certificate from three of his neighbors. He did not advocate the principle of allowing, in all cases, a man's own oath as sufficient testimony, when his own interest was involved; but when the House had for years acted on the principle involved in the case under consideration, without any evil results, he thought the case of the unfortunate Bernard Kelly should not be selected as an exception.

He cited several cases in which the only testimony relied on to support them was the evidence of the party claiming relief. Bernard Kelly has proved, by as creditable and honorable men as are to be found in any country, that he himself was an honorable man. He comes, supported by this testimony, before Congress, and states, on oath, that this money was lost in the manner represented. He urged the propriety of allowing the claim, with great earnestness, and showed that a long list of claims of a similar nature had been allowed, though not supported in many instances with as many strong points of evidence as the present claim. He regretted that the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Ohio, who had told the House that evidence could be adduced from the Post Office Department to show that the claim ought not to be allowed, were so tardy in producing it. He had called at the department himself, and could find no such testimony. He thought, therefore, that the circumstances of the case were so strong, the claimant's character for veracity so well supported, and the facts being stated upon oath, all tend to make his case so strong, that he thought the House ought to allow the claim.

Mr. STERIGERE opposed the bill. He stated that the course pursued by the claimant in drawing up his papers before the House, was one not of candor and openness, but of extreme caution. He observed that a very important fact was not stated, which was the time at which the house of the claimant was burned. This would be of the utmost importance in deciding the case; because it would then be seen whether at that time the money stated to be lost by fire, was actually due the Post Office Department. He said that he had derived information from the Postmaster General, stating that half a million of dollars would not liquidate the claims against that department, resting on the same principle involved in the case of Kelly, now before the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, the case of Fisk, alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. THOMPSON,] was by no means analogous to the one before the House. Fisk's case rested not on his own testimony. He was not within twenty miles of the place at which the robbery was committed. The committee had not taken into consideration either his testimony or statement in the case. Fisk's own son was the clerk from whom the money was taken; and the amount taken rested not on his oath alone, but was supported by the testimony of three other witnesses. The marks of violence were evident on the doors of the house, and the robbers were vigilantly pursued.

Mr. SPENCER said that the Postmaster stood in the light of a trustee for the Government; and the question ought to be, not one of strict legal accountability, but should be viewed as a case in equity; and he showed from the decisions in the courts of chancery that this case was one which entitled the claimant to the relief asked for in the bill. The Postmaster was in fact a trustee; he was not bound to keep the public money any more secure than his own property; and if it be satisfactorily proved that his own property was destroyed by fire, upon every principle of equity, he was exonerated from all the responsibility to the Government incurred by the loss of the money in his possession.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed the bill, and the principles laid down by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER.] No agent of Government should be allowed to relieve himself from his responsibility to Government by his own oath. If our 8,000 postmasters in the United States were allowed to do so, the prosperity of the treasury would not soon be so flourishing as we have been told it was. It is the uniform custom of the Post Office committee not to receive the testimony of any individual in support of his own claim. He thought the principles advanced by the gentleman from New York would prove dangerous, if sanctioned by the House. He thought there was an evident distinction between the relation of a public agent and that of a trustee; and that the course pursued by the one should not govern the action of the House on the case before them.

Mr. HOFFMAN also opposed the principles laid down by the gentleman from New York; and showed where a public officer who was benefited by his trust, differed widely from a trustee.

Mr. HAYNES would not stop to moot the point, whether an officer of the General Government should be viewed as a trustee, and be entitled to the same privileges. He agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, that the revenue laws should also be regularly enforced; still, when cases came before the House supported by such testimony, when an officer of the Government had been visited by a calamity which he could neither foresee nor prevent, he thought that such a claimant was fairly entitled to relief. He cited several cases of a similar character, in which relief had been extended by the House.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, without entering into an investigation of the extent of credit to be given to a man's oath in his own case, or whether it should be received at all in such a case, opposed the bill because the claimant did not state how much was lost in money. He had told the House that 123 dollars were lost, part in money and part in vouchers. From these circumstances alone, he thought the bill ought to be rejected.

Mr. CHILTON asked for the previous question.

Mr. THOMPSON asked the withdrawal of the motion for a moment, which being done, Mr. T. proceeded to show that in the case of Fisk, alluded to before, and commented upon by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] the clerk there spoken of was deputy collector. In support of this position, he read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that the clerk was appointed deputy collector in the usual manner; and further, that the collector was ordered to deposite the receipts of his office monthly in bank, except so much as would be necessary to defray the current expenses of the office. He showed that the collector applied to Congress for relief, and brought the deputy collector forward as a witness. In reply to the objections urged against the claim, that it was not supported by the production of the vouchers and drafts from the Post Office Department, which were stated to have been lost, the fact that the house of the claimant had been consumed by fire, and all swept away, was a sufficient reply.

Mr. PEARCE called for the previous question; which being sustained,

Mr. CHILTON called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 114.

Mr. PEARCE now demanded the previous question, and the House sustained the demand.

The main question was then put, "Shall the bill pass?"

And it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 38, nays 114.

And so the bill was rejected.

DENMARK AND THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith to Congress the copy of a correspondence which lately passed between Major General Von Scholten, his Danish Majesty's Governor General of his West India possessions, and special minister to the United States, and Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, concerning the regulation of the commercial intercourse between those possessions and the United States; which comprehends the propositions that General Von Scholten made to this Government, in behalf of his sovereign, upon that subject, and the answers of the Secretary of State to the same, the last showing the grounds upon which this Government declined acceding to the overtures of the Danish envoy.

This correspondence is now submitted to the two Houses of Congress, in compliance with the wish and request of General Von Scholten himself, and under the full persuasion, on my part, that it will receive all the attention and consideration to which the very friendly relations that have so long subsisted between the United States and the King of Denmark especially entitle it, in the councils of this Union.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 31, 1830.

The message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying it, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BRITISH COLONIAL TRADE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress the papers relating to the recent arrangement with Great Britain, with respect to the trade between her colonial possessions and the United States, to which reference was made in my message at the opening of the present session.

It will appear from those documents, that, owing to the omission, in the act of the 29th of May last, of a clause expressly restricting importations into the British colonies in American vessels to the productions of the United States; to the amendment engrafted upon that act in the House of Representatives, providing that, when the West India colonies should be opened, the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions should be left on a footing not less favorable than it now is; and to the act not specifying the terms upon which British vessels coming from the Northern colonies should be admitted to entry into the ports of the United States; an apprehension was entertained by the Government of Great Britain, that, under the contemplated arrangement, claims might be set up on our part, inconsistent with the propositions submitted by our minister, and with the terms to which she was willing to agree; and that this circumstance led to explanations between Mr. McLane and the Earl of Aberdeen, respecting the intention of Congress, and the true construction to be given to the act referred to.

To the interpretation given by them to that act, I did not hesitate to agree. It was quite clear that, in adopting the amendment referred to, Congress could not have intended to preclude future alterations in the existing intercourse between the United States and other parts of the British dominions; and the supposition that the omission to restrict, in terms, the importations to the productions of the country to which the vessels belong, was intentional, was precluded by the propositions previously made by this Government to that of Great Britain, and which were before Congress at the time of the passage of the act; by the principles which govern the maritime legislation of the two countries, and by the provisions of the existing commercial treaty between them.

Actuated by this view of the subject, and convinced that it was in accordance with the real intentions of Congress, I felt it my duty to give effect to the arrangement, by issuing the required proclamation, of which a copy is likewise herewith communicated.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1830.

The message was read, and, together with the accompanying documents, were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and 6,000 copies ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4.

THE FIFTH CENSUS.

Mr. STORRS, from the select committee appointed on the President's message relative to the fifth census, reported the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That it shall and may be lawful for such of the assistants to the marshals in the respective States and Territories, who have not, before the passage of this act, made their respective returns to such marshals, under the act hereby amended, to complete their enumerations and make their returns under the said act, at any time before the 1st day of June, 1831: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to release such assistants from the penalties contained in the act aforesaid, unless their returns shall be made within the time prescribed in this act."

Mr. STORRS moved that the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, observing that there were but three cases of failure to make the returns within the requisite time for which the bill was intended to provide; namely, from one county in Tennessee, one county in Indiana, and two of the wards of the city of New York.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, desired to know whether the passage of the bill was intended to interfere with the apportionment, at the present session, of the ratio of representation under the new census; because, as the Legislature of Tennessee sits but once in two years, a postponement of the apportionment would prove inconvenient to that State, and he found that the time of completing the census, and making returns, was extended to June next.

Mr. STORRS explained. The instructions from the Department of State to the marshals were limited to the 1st of December for making their returns of the enumeration. The instruction was such a one as no clerk in the department ought to have taken upon himself to issue; because, although the law itself made that limitation the instruction from the department, the deputy marshals would probably not have discontinued the enumeration, as appears to have been the case, when it was discovered that it could not be completed within the precise time fixed by the act. Having been informed by the clerk in the department having charge of the business, that no return would be received after the 1st of December, the deputy marshals had ceased the enumeration at that time; so that the Secretary of State must now have time to communicate with those marshals before they will resume the enumeration. In regard to the apportionment of representation under the new census, this bill ought not to interfere with or delay that object at all. In 1820, the returns were not entirely complete, yet the apportionment was fixed, so far as the returns were received; and afterwards, when the additional returns from Alabama came in, a supplemental law gave that State the benefit of it. Mr. S. said he should, in a very few days, move to take up the apportionment bill, which should be passed at an early day, or the delay might produce to some of the States the inconvenience of an extra session of their Legislature, to arrange their representation under the new apportionment.

Mr. WHITTLESLEY moved to strike out of the bill the following words: "unless their returns shall be made within the time prescribed by this act;" but the amendment was opposed by Mr. STORRS, and was negatived.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, the following additional proviso was added to the bill:

"And provided further, That no person be included in the returns made under the present act, unless such persons shall have been inhabitants of the districts for which such returns shall be made on the 1st day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty."

Thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

The House then proceeded to reconsider the resolution submitted by Mr. HAYNES on the 23d ultimo, relative to attending the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on the question of its adoption, and they were ordered by the House.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 118.

Mr. JOHNS submitted the following:

Resolved, That a message be sent by the Clerk of the House, informing the Senate that the House of Representatives decline further attendance during the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to add to the resolution the words, "until further notice;" which

Mr. JOHNS accepted as a modification of his motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he was opposed to the phraseology of the resolution, though he was not prepared to supply, at the present moment, what he should consider to be proper. Something like this, he thought, would be correct: That notice be sent to the Senate that the House had rescinded the resolution formerly adopted by it, by which it had agreed to attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck. To send such a resolution as that proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, would be to tie up their hands. Though all along opposed to the House attending the trial, yet he thought the resolution offered an improper one. After a few further remarks, Mr. B. said that no gentleman would hereafter offer a resolution to attend the trial, unless something of interest was likely to take place. He hoped that the resolution would be amended something in the manner he had suggested.

Mr. DRAYTON said that it appeared to him that the observations of the gentleman who had just sat down were at variance with the object he appeared to have in view. If the course suggested by that gentleman should be adopted, the Senate would be led to believe the House did not again intend to be present during the trial. If the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, as amended, should pass, then it would be in the power of the House at any time to attend, and the Senate would consider that it had not abandoned the trial. He expressed his preference for that resolution. He had been in favor of the resolution first offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] proposing that the House should attend at the opening and closing of the trial; he now hoped that the resolution on the table would prevail.

Mr. HAYNES would say nothing of the departure from precedent, nor of the manifest inconsistency of the House. He hoped it would hereafter act with more consistency, and he suggested to the gentleman from Delaware to strike out the words "until further notice."

Mr. JOHNS not consenting, Mr. H. made that motion.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, briefly addressed the Chair. He considered that the passage of the resolution would be an indirect way of abandoning the impeachment. The House, by its vote of to-day, had determined that it would not attend the trial; but he wished the Senate to be notified of the intentions of the House by a proper message. He should vote against the amendment, with a view of submitting a motion to strike out the whole of the resolution after the word "Resolved," and insert an amendment.

The question was then put on striking out the words "until further notice," and determined in the negative.

Mr. STORRS then moved to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert—

That the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment of James H. Peck be instructed to attend the trial of the said impeachment, at such times as the Senate shall appoint for that purpose; and that the attendance of the House be dispensed with until otherwise ordered by the House; and that the Clerk communicate this resolution to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNS had no objection whatever to the amendment. His sole object was to give notice to the Senate of the course which the House had taken. He accepted it as a modification.

Mr. DRAYTON asked if there was not already a separate resolution, passed by the House, instructing the managers, to the same effect as the above.

The SPEAKER answered in the negative.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution as amended, and decided in the affirmative, without a count.

RAILROAD FROM BALTIMORE TO WASHINGTON.

The bill authorizing the construction of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to the city of Washington, came up for consideration; when

Mr. SEMMES submitted the following amendment:

Sec. 1. And be it enacted, That the said road shall be located over such ground, and have such course and direction, as engineers, authorized and appointed by the Government, shall determine and advise.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That the said company shall not make any higher charges for tolls on transportation on any part of the road to be constructed between Baltimore and the District of Columbia, than are allowed by law for tolls and transportation from west to east, on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, except as authorized by the second section of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That unless the said road between Baltimore and the District of Columbia is commenced within one year from the passage of this act, and finished within three years thereafter, this act, and all the privileges which it confers on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, shall cease, and be entirely void and of no effect.

Mr. SEMMES said, it became his duty, as one of the Representatives of Maryland, which has so deep an interest in the proposed measure, to make a few brief remarks in support of the amendment he had offered. Not anticipating that this bill would be called up to-day, said he, I regret that I have not had time for reflection, which would enable me to do that justice to the subject which its great importance demands.

This is a great national work, one which is to affect the interest of the whole United States, and therefore demands our most serious consideration; and it becomes the duty of Congress, whilst it has the power, to bestow that attention which will enable us to protect and promote the interests of the whole country.

The construction of works of this character may, in common cases, be safely confided to the discretion of the corporation which has charge of the undertaking, because their private and individual interest is, generally speaking, the surest guaranty of their fidelity; but the case now under consideration forms an exception to this general rule. The work in question is of great national importance, and promises to be one of the most profitable investments of money that can be made any where in this country; whilst many rich and powerful persons, with great resources and influence, and having opposite and conflicting interests, are engaged in it, and have the control of the corporation which is to construct it: for these gentlemen, personally and individually, I have great respect, and would as soon confide in their integrity and disinterestedness, as in those of any other company in existence; but, under existing circumstances, it becomes the duty of Congress, as the guardians of the public welfare, to give such a direction to the proposed improvement as will effectually promote the public interest.

The amendment I have offered, embraces three distinct propositions. The first is, that the road shall be made in such manner and over such ground, and in such course or direction, as engineers appointed by the Government of the United States shall advise and determine. To this proposition, I presume there can be no objection: because the United States' engineers have been largely employed in locating the main track of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and may safely be trusted with the location of this lateral branch, whilst the peculiar circumstances of the case under consideration render such a provision indispensably necessary. The tribunal which is to decide on the location of this great and important national road, ought to be placed above the reach and even above the suspicion of local feeling and private interests, more especially since there are so many conflicting and opposing interests engaged in the undertaking. Take, for example, the Baltimore end of the proposed road; three different routes are spoken of, and all have powerful support from the individuals whose local and private interests are to be affected by it.

The first of these routes, the one which is supposed to be the most direct, will cross the Patapsco river at Elkridge landing, at or near Smith's bridge; the second will cross the river at the Patterson viaduct, and the third will pass by Ellicott's mills. Which of these routes ought to be preferred, I am unable to say; there is a strong party in favor of each one, and, no matter which is selected, there will be much dissatisfaction and complaint, unless the selection be made by some independent and impartial tribunal in whom all have confidence. Such, I suppose, we may consider a board of engineers appointed by the President of the United States. This appears to be almost the only security we have that the location will be made with a view to the public good, and the public good only. Again, let us look at the District end of this road, and here we find the same kind of difficulties and embarrassments. Whether the road will enter Georgetown or Washington, or at what point of either city it will enter, is a matter of doubt and uncertainty. There are several practicable routes, all of which have their advocates; and at present it is uncertain whether the road will diverge to the west, and pass through Anne Arundel and Montgomery to Georgetown, or whether the facilities for construction are such as to permit it to proceed in nearly a direct line to this city, where, in my humble opinion, it ought to come, if practicable; but of one thing we are certain, that each interest will endeavor to have that route selected, which will best promote its own particular views. Such, sir, is the nature of man, and we may talk as much as we please about patriotism and disinterestedness, but self-interest is the great moving principle which governs mankind, and most of us will obey its impulses.

I confess that I do not even pretend to rise above this feeling, but, like other men, am anxious to promote what I believe to be the best interests of those who sent me here. I believe that, on examination by competent persons, the most advantageous route will be found to pass through the very heart of my district, and will advance the local interests of my constituents; believing this, as well as for general reasons of a public nature, I am anxious that an impartial and independent tribunal, which has no local interests or local feelings to gratify, shall designate the route; and if I am disappointed, I will most cheerfully submit, and I risk nothing in making the same pledge for those I represent. The House will perceive by the bill, that this road is also intended for the transportation of the United States' mail; this increases the interest of the Government in the undertaking, and is a strong argument in favor of the amendment I have offered, because, if it be intended for a mail route, the saving of a few miles is of immense importance.

The second proposition is, that there shall be no higher charges for tolls or transportation than are allowed by law to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for tolls or transportation from west to east. This requires some explanation. By the charter of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, different rates of toll are allowed. From west to east, they are limited to one cent a ton per mile for toll, and three cents a ton per mile for transportation, while, from east to west, they have the power to charge three cents a ton per mile for toll, and the same for transportation—making an average difference of fifty per cent. This was right and proper in the original charter. The work is the most splendid and important of any thing of the kind, of which we have any account, requiring great resources and much risk, and, after all, could only be regarded at the time as an experiment of doubtful character. Under these discouraging circumstances, it was necessary to grant a strong and liberal charter, holding forth great inducements to men of capital and science to embark in the enterprise; whilst the great difficulties to be encountered in making the road from Baltimore to the Ohio, and the large expenditure necessary to procure the engines, vehicles, and other fixtures, to transport heavy articles up a continued ascent over the mountains, induced the Legislature of Maryland to grant this additional fifty per cent. as a fair remuneration for the additional trouble and expense. But similar reasons do not now exist. The proposed road will pass through comparatively a level country. The expenses of construction will be moderate, and the necessary vehicles and propelling power can be easily and cheaply obtained; therefore, the lowest rate of tolls and transportation allowed to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company will be an ample remuneration for the money and labor expended, and will render this the most valuable investment now to be made in the United States.

Assay of Gold.—Question of Order.—Illinois Canal.

The travelling on this route is already immense; and when the Chesapeake and Ohio canal is completed, and this District filled with a population probably greater than that of the city of New York, the travel and transportation will so greatly increase, that I know of no improvement of the kind, that is likely to prove so valuable to the proprietors.

The third proposition which I have submitted, directs the time when the road shall commence and be completed; and provides, that all the rights and privileges conferred by this bill shall be forfeited by non-compliance. It may appear rather invidious to place the company under this restriction, and I would not do so, if I did not believe that such a course is strictly correct, and not only correct, but due to the best interests of the country.

This contemplated road is a great public highway, of importance to the whole country, and ought to be constructed as soon as possible for the public convenience; at the same time, it holds forth great advantages to the proprietors. It is right and proper that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company should have the power to construct it if they please. They are the pioneers in this valuable species of internal improvement, which is likely to produce an entire change in our internal commerce, and even to change the face of the interior of the whole country. Their public spirit and enterprise have seldom if ever been equalled, and never surpassed; and they have embarked their private fortunes to a very large amount, in what at the time was considered but at best a doubtful experiment; and they have zealously and ably pushed forward this great work, till success is no longer doubtful: but although it will prove a blessing to the country at large, such have been the almost insurmountable difficulties they have had to contend with, and so great the expenditure of money, which is usually the case with a first undertaking, that it is doubtful whether it will prove profitable to the stockholders. For these reasons, sir, when we are now about to construct an addition to this great work, we ought, as liberal and generous representatives of the nation, to confer the power on the same company, who have acted as pioneers in the great undertaking, in order that the certain profits which will arise from the one work, may remunerate any losses which they may suffer by the other, which, whether it prove profitable or unprofitable to the stockholders, will certainly, when completed, and I consider that now certain, prove a national blessing. But still this amendment is necessary. Some unforeseen occurrence may prevent the construction of this road by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; if such should unfortunately prove to be the case, we ought to reserve the power, and, after a reasonable time, confer the same privileges on some other company, that will speedily construct the work; and there is no danger, even if it becomes necessary for the Legislature to create a new corporation for the purpose, but that the whole subscription can, at any time, be obtained in the city of Baltimore, in twenty-four hours. Money is cheap and plenty—it is difficult to find profitable investments, and this scheme, as I have before stated, promises to be very profitable, and will be eagerly sought after.

ASSAY OF GOLD.

Mr. CARSON offered a resolution providing that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an assay office in the gold regions of North Carolina.

Mr. FOSTER suggested that Georgia also should be added to the resolution.

Mr. CARSON said perhaps it would be better to say "the gold regions in the South."

Mr. HAYNES thought that rather too extensive a range.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina. We can find a little gold in our State. Suppose we add South Carolina, too.

The resolution was finally adopted, with the terms, "gold regions of the South;" and the number of the committee directed to be five.

The special order of the day having been announced, Mr. VERPLANCK moved that they be postponed, with a view of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up certain appropriation bills, which it was of importance to pass.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, and took up the bill "making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties."

No amendment being offered to the bill, it was laid aside, and the committee then took up the bill for closing certain accounts, and "making appropriations for arrearages in the Indian Department."

Mr. VERPLANCK stated the object of the bill; and no amendment being offered, the committee was about to rise; when

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to take up the bill to authorize the construction of three schooners for the service of the United States.

The Chairman decided that the motion was not in order. Mr. HOFFMAN said that when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, any bill might be called up which had been referred to it, and he thought his motion in order.

The SPEAKER rose, and sustained the Chair in its decision. The special orders of the day had been postponed for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole, to take up certain bills. They had been acted on, and the committee should now rise.

Mr. VERPLANCK stated distinctly the motion he had submitted; and the Clerk read the entry he had made on his book.

Mr. HAYNES appealed from the decision of the Chair, and addressed the committee at some length in support of his appeal, and what he considered the proper course.

Mr. HOFFMAN withdrew his motion; but

Mr. HAYNES insisted on his appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER said that, as the motion had been withdrawn which gave rise to the appeal, the appeal fell of course.

The committee then rose, and reported the two bills, and they were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

ILLINOIS CANAL.

The bill "authorizing a change in the disposal of land granted for the Illinois and Michigan canal" was next taken up.

The report of the Committee on the Public Lands in the case having been read,

Mr. MCCOY said, that when the land on each side of the proposed canal was granted, some years ago, it was stated to be very valuable; now, it was discovered not to be so good as was expected. The land certainly was not worth one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and yet it was proposed by the bill to take it back, and give scrip for it, which would purchase good land. He was unwilling that the House should pass the bill, and thus sanction a measure which he [Mr. McC.] could not approve.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, (in the absence of the chairman of the committee,) stated the object of the bill. He said, that, about the year 1822, a survey was made by order of the State of Illinois, of the country lying between Chicago, on the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, and the head of steamboat navigation on the Illinois river, and that the country between those places was found to be well adapted for canalling—the distance from ninety to one hundred miles; and the cost of construction about seven hundred thousand dollars. In the year 1822, and previous to the survey made by Illinois, Congress, impressed with the importance of the work, passed an act giving authority to that State to construct the canal through the public lands, and reserved from sale ninety feet of land on each side of the canal for the use of the State. In the year 1827, another act was passed by Congress, giving to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of aiding the State in opening the canal, a quantity of land, equal to one-half of five sections in width on each side of the canal.

The Committee on the Public Lands, at the last session of Congress, considering the immense advantages that must result to the United States by the completion of the proposed improvement, reported the bill now under consideration. It proposed the issuing of scrip, upon a surrender of the land which had previously been granted to the State of Illinois; but to guard against the improper use of that scrip, but fifty thousand dollars could be issued at any one time; and it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, before he issued a further quantity of scrip, to satisfy himself that the previous grant had been exclusively expended in the construction of the canal. The bill, in fact, proposed an exchange of scrip for land, and, if the work was successfully prosecuted, it would increase the value of the lands in its vicinity, and the United States might be greatly the gainers in the end, even if it were considered a mere matter of speculation.

The subject was to be viewed in another light: the canal once completed, it would lead emigrants to take that direction, to settle the vast tracts of uncultivated land in that section of the country. There were, perhaps, not less than thirty to thirty-five millions of acres in Missouri; not more than a million and a half of which probably had been sold. In the State of Illinois, an immense proportion of the public domain was yet undisposed of; and in that part of the Michigan Territory, commonly called the Huron country, the Government held lands to an unknown extent. Without this improvement, the settlement of this vast tract of country would be retarded; but let the canal be once completed, and the spirit of enterprise would be seen extending itself in that direction, and numberless emigrants would pour into the country. If we add these advantages to the increased value of the land in the vicinity of the proposed work—if the gentleman from Virginia went upon the calculation of pence and farthings, here was to be realized a great gain. From Sackett's Harbor to the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, there was a continuous intercourse of about eleven degrees of longitude through the Northern and Northwestern lakes; on the southern shores of which, the lands were of good quality, the settlement of which was rapidly increasing; and the day was not distant, when trade would be carried on in that section of the United States to a great extent. It was but a few years since there were but two or three vessels engaged in the trade of Lake Erie, and, from information received from an honorable member from Pennsylvania, some seven or eight steamboats, and probably not less than one hundred and fifty brigs and schooners, were now engaged in the trade of that lake. If the waters of Michigan were united with those of the Mississippi, it would be matter of incalculable importance in both a military and commercial point of view. Under these considerations, he was surprised to find the venerable member from Virginia opposed to the passage of the bill. The object of the bill was a national one, and he hoped the House would give it its sanction as such. Let not the object be considered in the light of a bargain, but let the bill be supported with more noble views.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, said it was not the first time the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCox] had placed the House under obligations by calling their attention to bills of this character, and he for one would tender him his acknowledgments for the present service. Very few words of explanation, he said, would place the House in possession of all the facts necessary to a proper understanding of this subject, and very little else than such an understanding, he flattered himself, was necessary to defeat this bill.

Some years ago, he said, Congress, on the application of Illinois, showing the great importance of a canal uniting the Illinois river with the waters of Michigan, granted to that State three hundred thousand acres of land in alternate sections, lying on either side of the proposed canal, to enable the State to construct it. What progress has been made, if any, in the execution of the work, we are not informed, nor is it very material to this investigation. But after the lapse of several years, and after a sale of part of the land, he would not say the best of it, for he was unacquainted with the quality of any of the land granted, (on that point all would draw their own inferences,) we are told the balance of the land is unsaleable, the grant, in fact, valueless, and the canal cannot be constructed for the want of funds. The object of the bill, therefore, is, that the Government shall take back the land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid, to be sure, in scrip, issued by the Government, which is to be receivable at the land offices for debts due on purchases of public lands instead of cash. These are the facts, and such are the objects of the bill.

He would not animadvert on the novelty of the proposed scheme—one which, he believed, was without precedent in this country, under similar circumstances. It is enough that there are other objections to it. The argument most relied on, is, that when the canal shall have been completed, and some say as soon as it is commenced, the lands of the United States, on its borders, will be increased several hundred per cent. in value; that it will, therefore, be a positive and specific benefit to the Government. Sir, the very same argument was urged when the grant of the land was sought; and it has been used in this House in every instance where a similar application has been made. The alternate sections reserved by the United States, we were told, would be so much increased in value by the canal, that the United States were to be gainers and not losers by the donation. These arguments have been found to be fallacious. With all the advantages anticipated, and all the ideal value attached to these lands, by the intended canal, Illinois has not been able to dispose of them at the lowest Government price. If they will become so valuable, it is important to the State to retain them: this bill will do the State great injustice, by a recession of them. It may sometimes happen, but instances are rare, that both parties to a contract realize profits. The United States have now more lands than they can sell. You have no use for the money arising from the sales of the public domain, in the opinion of some gentlemen; and you have now a bill on your table to appropriate the proceeds to the purposes of education among the several States. And yet this bill is to make the Government a buyer instead of a seller of lands: a buyer, too, of lands, not at their value, but at a certain fixed price, when no one knows whether they be worth a fourth of the sum. Gentlemen must anticipate—they cannot but foresee, to what the passage of this bill will lead. From every quarter where grants of this description have been made, and the grantees have not realized the amount they had hoped for, applications of the same kind will be made. Some, for the whole amount in money, [not in scrip, as in the present instance,] and others, that you will give them money for all lands which, by reason of its sterility, or its local situation, they have been unable to sell. There is no claim on our justice in this application—there is less on the liberality of the House.

Mr. MARTIN said he had purposely avoided saying any thing on the policy or impolicy of the original grant. His opinions were known on such subjects. Nor would he call in question those rights which most, if not all, would admit were vested in the grantees. He assented to their enjoyment, such as they were; but he, for one, would not fix an additional charge on the country, and strike out a new policy, for the purpose of extending to them additional favor.

Mr. DUNCAN said, in reply to Mr. MARTIN, that it was true the bill proposed an exchange of the lands for scrip, which was equal, or nearly equal to cash. He thought, too, as strange as the reasoning appeared to that gentleman, that it was susceptible of proof, that both parties will be benefited by the passage of this bill; taking it for granted that the United States has a deep interest in the construction of this great work, or Congress would not have made the grant of land in question. It only remains to be shown, that the donation, or appropriation, cannot be used without great loss, and that the State has not resources to progress in the work without this assistance. To satisfy gentlemen of the propriety of the bill before the House, Mr. D. said, before he proceeded, he would say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McCox,] that he had the best authority for saying that the whole of the land proposed to be surrendered was of good quality, and not such as he imagined it to be. Mr. D. said that an unsuccessful attempt had been made to sell the land, but the failure to sell was not on account of the quality of the soil, or the situation of the land, but it was owing to the fact of there being no encouragement held out to settlers to go on and improve it, or the United States' land in the vicinity. He said, this land was not as favorably situated in that respect as the other public lands, for it was reserved from sale by law, and of course no one would venture to settle on or improve land, without a hope of ever owning it. Mr. D. said, gentlemen in this House appeared to think that all lands of equal quality and situation ought to sell for the same price, but in this they were greatly mistaken. He said that improvements and good society gave value to land; if that was not the case, he asked, why were not all the wild lands already sold? Mr. D. said he had heard much said against the squatters, as they are called, on the public land, but he did not hesitate in affirming that they had been the means of selling nine-tenths of all the land that had been sold by the Government. He said that it was the hardy, enterprising, poor man that first ventured into the wilderness, and suffered all the privations and dangers incident to such an enterprise, who, acting as pioneers, were followed by the more fortunate or wealthy, and too often deprived by them of their homes, and driven further and further into the woods. Mr. D. believed that the lands would increase greatly in value, whenever the work was done; but he knew the State had no means of effecting it, without a sale of them, unless this bill should pass; and if they were sold at a low price, (and he believed they could not be sold for any other at present,) he was fearful the canal would not be made for many years. Mr. D. asked if it would be consistent with sound policy, or any principle of political economy, for Congress to permit such a result, when it would be so easy to prevent it without loss, to say the least of it; but, for his part, he believed that the General Government had all to gain, and nothing to lose, by the provisions of this bill; by its passage, the funds or lands appropriated by the Government will be rendered available, and the State will be able to accomplish the work in a very few years.

Mr. D. went into a lengthy argument to show the advantages of this canal in increasing the value and sales of the public lands; all of which, he said, for near fifty miles south, and for an immeasured distance north, was still the property of the United States, and had not even been brought into market. He said the report which he submitted with the bill gave a description of the canal, and showed not only the practicability of making it, but the vast importance of it in a national point of view. He said that there never was a work of internal improvement in any country, which promised so great a benefit at so small an expense. He said that it would at once open a free commercial intercourse from New Orleans to New York and Quebec, a distance of more than two thousand five hundred miles, passing through the most fertile country in the world, and through every climate which is found between the poles, from north to south.

Mr. VINTON was desirous to vote for the bill, and stated that the difficulty under which he labored was not such as had been stated by the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina. The amount of scrip on lands proposed to be given was nothing in his way—he would willingly give double. His great objection was, that it would be a sacrifice of the fund; for he was confident that the lands would all go into the hands of speculators. The bill proposed virtually to buy three hundred thousand acres of land of the State of Illinois, and give her scrip for it, with which she could go into the market, and purchase the best of lands. The country was a wilderness: the poor or middling men, as they would not receive cash for their labor, but scrip, would never be able to enter into contracts for constructing the work, and of consequence the contracts would all be taken by wealthy speculators, who could afford to carry on the work, and lay out of their money for a time. Hence it would result that the whole competition would lay between these wealthy speculators; and as the job would not, as he had said, be a cash one, it would cost eight or ten thousand dollars to complete one section, (while for cash it might be done for one-fourth that amount,) and eventually all the lands would come into the possession of the men to whom he had alluded. After some further remarks elucidatory of his views, Mr. V. said, that, if the bill could be thrown into a shape to obviate his objections, he would cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. MERCER then took the floor, and in a speech of some length replied to the objections raised by the opponents of the bill. He concluded by moving to amend a proviso of the bill; (the exact motion our Reporter could not obtain;) when,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, who wished to give further time for the examination of the subject,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5.

Mr. TUCKER submitted the following resolutions, which he intended to offer as an amendment to the joint resolution reported by Mr. McDUFFIE, to amend the constitution of the United States, when that resolution shall come up for consideration:

Resolved, That no person who shall hereafter be elected President of the United States, and who shall accept the same, or exercise the powers thereof, shall be again eligible to said office.

Resolved, That any person who shall be elected President of the United States after the 4th day of March, 1833, shall hold his office for the term of five years.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHILTON, of Ky. submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Expenditures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting some regulation by which members of each branch of the National Legislature shall receive the allowance of eight dollars per day only for the number of days of each session on which they shall have been in actual attendance upon the service of the House to which they may belong—unless absent by reason of sickness, or by leave of the House, or when the same shall not be in session.

Mr. CHILTON said that, in offering this resolution, he felt himself placed in circumstances of peculiar delicacy as to particular facts which might appear to him to have called for such an inquiry as it proposes. But the foundation of principle on which he bottomed it, was one which he could submit to the House without the least reserve or delicacy. Mr. C. then quoted from the rules of the House the fiftieth rule, which is in the following words: "No member shall absent himself from the service of the House unless he have leave, or be sick and unable to attend." Under this rule of the House, it was obviously as much the duty of one member as of another, and equally the duty of all, to be in attendance, unless when absent by reason of sickness or by leave of the House. Mr. C. said, he designed not, so far as it operated on the legislation of the House, to give to the proceedings under this resolution a retrospective operation. If it has been the practice of any member of this House, or of the other House, to absent himself from the House without leave of the House, and without being detained therefrom by sickness; and if, while attending to private business of his own, he has been receiving the same pay as those who were constant in their attendance on the House, then, said Mr. C., I should consider such practice not only a violation of this rule, but a direct violation of duty. Mr. C. adverted to the difference of situation of members of this House from different parts of the country. Gentlemen from the West were far distant from the endearments of home, and, if they were professional men, from the courts which they were accustomed to attend. They cannot take horse, or any other convenience for travelling, and go from this House to attend their courts. No, sir, whilst others may do this, they are left here to attend upon the business of the nation, until the termination of the session enables them to return home, and they are entitled for so doing to the compensation which the law allows. But, if the case should ever occur of members absenting themselves from the House, attending to private business, it is wrong that they should receive compensation as though they had been in regular attendance. Mr. C. said he was not apprehensive that, in what he proposed, he should wound the feelings of any gentleman, for he asked no more of any member than what the rules of the House already peremptorily require of him, it being his bounden duty to attend the House regularly from the moment that he accepts a seat in it. If he absents himself from the House, he surely cannot expect compensation for services which he has not rendered. I presume, said Mr. C., that no gentleman on this floor will hazard his reputation by saying that it is right in any member, contrary to the rule, to absent himself, and yet receive compensation for the time during which he has been attending to his own private business. If one member may absent himself without leave, so may another; for all have equal rights. If this course were indulged in by all, I ask if it would not put a stop to legislation. My duty to my country, sitting here and legislating under the solemn sanction of an oath, is to see that every member performs his duty, whilst I endeavor to perform my own. I should do an act of violence to my own conscience were I to remain silent whilst abuses of this kind are tolerated.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to lay the resolution upon the table. And upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. CHILTON, which being ordered by the House, Mr. STERIGERE withdrew his motion; and the consideration of the resolve proceeded.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, inquired whether the rule proposed to be adopted by the resolve was not the same as that which is already in operation?

The SPEAKER said, that when a member of the House is absent on leave, his attendance ceases to be charged. When members are absent without leave, no account is taken of such absence, every member being presumed to be present unless absent from sickness or on leave. By the seventy-third rule it is made the duty of the Committee of Accounts, and not of the Speaker, to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government, and their attendance in the House.

Mr. CARSON, of N. C., inquired of the Chair what would be the precise effect of the resolution, if passed?

The SPEAKER said, it proposed, in its present shape, an inquiry only.

Mr. BARRINGER suggested the propriety of amending the resolution so as to conform to the present practice of withholding pay from such members as are absent on leave.

Mr. WHITTLESLEY suggested a different modification, by inserting after the words "by leave of the House," the words "on business of the House."

Mr. CHILTON agreed to this modification, accepting it as a part of his motion.

Mr. CARSON wished to know what would be the difference between the effect of this resolution and the existing rule?

The SPEAKER said that each gentleman must decide that for himself, by comparing them.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, did not know but there might be good ground for the complaint presented by the gentleman from Kentucky. He was himself of opinion, with the honorable mover, that members ought to be punctilious in their attendance. To carry this principle fully out, Mr. T. suggested to the gentleman to amend his proposition so as to require all members who have absented themselves to refund whatever compensation they might have received for time during which they were not in attendance. If the principle was correct, it should operate throughout.

Mr. CHILTON said that, for himself, he felt no scruple in regard to the amendment suggested; for he could confidently say that he had not been absent from the House for a single day, except when detained from it by sickness. But the subject was, he repeated, a delicate one; he thought his resolution went far enough. But, if the gentleman from Georgia inclined to go further, he would suggest to his honorable friend, in return for his suggestion, that he should move to amend the resolution accordingly.

Mr. THOMPSON declined to move any amendment to the resolution.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Arnold, Bailey, Noyes Barber, Barnwell, Barringer, Bartley, Baylor, Bell, James Blair, John Blair, Bockee, Boon, Brodhead, Brown, Butman, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Campbell, Chandler, Chilton, Claiborne, Clay, Clark, Coke, Conner, Cooper, Cowles, Crane, Crawford, Crockett, Creighton, Crocheron, Crowninshield, Daniel, Davenport, John Davis, Warren R. NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Alston, Archer, John S. Barbour, Beekman, Bouldin, Carson, Coulter, Dudley, E. Everett, Gorham, Hinds, Hodges, Howard, W. W. Irvin, Lea, Norton, Pierson, Vinton, E. D. White, Wilde.—21.
So the resolve was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act of Congress, passed at the last session, entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and navy of the continental army, during the revolutionary war," so as to change or alter the first section, as not to require evidence as to the line on which the resolution warrant of Virginia issued: also, to amend the third section, so as to embrace cases where warrants have been located and surveys or patents prohibited by law, by which the land is lost to the locator: also, to cases of surveys or patents, where, by the highest judicial tribunal of the State, or United States, the land has been taken by a prior or better claim: also, to provide for the renewal of lost or destroyed certificates or scrip: also, to change the maximum quantity of land allowed to be appropriated by the said act to supply the claims embraced by said act: lastly, to make such alterations as the said committee may consider just and equitable.

Mr. HAYNES said that the resolution appeared to be of an important nature. He certainly was in favor of a part of it, and perhaps, on examination, he should be of the whole. To give time for a proper examination of the subject, he requested the gentleman from Kentucky to consent that the resolution be laid on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON making no objection, the resolution took that course.

ILLINOIS CANAL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill "authorizing a change in the disposal of land granted for the Illinois and Michigan canal;" the question being on the adoption of an amendment yesterday submitted by Mr. MERCER.

Mr. M. withdrew his motion to amend; and Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, submitted the following amendment, which he accompanied by a few remarks:

"And provided, also, that said State shall, in every instance of the application of scrip, apply an equal sum of money from its own funds, or from funds raised by its own authority, to the construction of said canal, of which fact the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall be satisfied, before a new issue of scrip, under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was read, and agreed to.

The question then recurring on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. MCCOY, of Virginia, said he had offered a few suggestions to the House yesterday, and he would submit a few more to-day. He looked upon this bill as a kind of pioneer, calculated to open the way for similar provisions in favor of other States. The State of Illinois was very ingenious. She wished the United States to take back the refuse land which had been granted her, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, while, at the same moment, she was petitioning the House to reduce the price of the public lands to seventy-five cents per acre. It was well known that grants had been made to Alabama, Indiana, and Ohio, as well as to Illinois, for the purpose of constructing roads and canals. If this bill should pass into a law, he presumed we could not refuse to pursue the same course towards those States, should they require it at our hands. He felt no disposition to disturb the State of Illinois in her possession of the lands which had been granted to her, but he could not help declaring that he thought it too bad for that State to ask the Government to take back the refuse part of them. Mr. McC. said he had hoped that the present session of Congress would have been allowed to pass away, without the introduction of bills for constructing roads and canals. He had hoped that the House would have passed upon the numerous claims against the Government, and been suffered quietly to attend to matters of general interest to the nation. But he had been deceived: it seemed the House was never to be left at peace—the rage for internal improvement seemed to be as great as ever, and, while this was the case, there would be no peaceable legislation. He had not, however, risen to make a speech; he would take his seat, but he hoped the bill would not pass.

Mr. DUNCAN next rose. He commenced by refuting the idea that the lands which the State wished to recede were refuse lands. He thought the best argument he could offer against the gentleman's assertion, that the lands were of an inferior quality, would be, to read a letter from Doctor William Howard, the engineer who surveyed the route of the proposed canal. [The letter was read by the Clerk: it gave a description of the soil, the quality of the timber, &c. &c.] Mr. D. then made some remarks relative to the importance of the work, and requested the reading of a letter from General Gratiot, the Chief of the Engineer Department, in favor of the proposed work. [This letter was read also.] Mr. D. said he did not wish to trouble the House with any further remarks upon the question now before it. Those which he had delivered on the previous day were fresh in the recollection of gentlemen, and they were sufficient for his purpose. He was only sorry that any observations from the gentleman from Virginia had made it his duty to trouble the House further upon the subject.

Mr. BELL addressed the House at some length in support of the bill. He was desirous to give some explanation of the reasons which induced him to vote for the bill: for he should do so, and one reason was, because its passage would violate no constitutional principle. Nor did he believe it would ever be brought into precedent, as had been suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, by similar applications from Alabama, Indiana, and Ohio, the States named by that gentleman as those to whom public lands had been granted for the purposes of internal improvement. From all he could gather on the subject, the present bill was intended to prevent a sacrifice of the fund so often referred to, and to preserve it to the public. The lands proposed to be receded were undoubtedly good; but the country was a wilderness. There were no settlements near them, and they were liable to be sacrificed to the cupidity of speculators: for none other than wealthy men, who were in the habit of speculating in the public lands, would, under these circumstances, become the purchasers of them. But, said Mr. B., let the contemplated work be but commenced, and the Government would receive back the money they now gave. He could conceive of no greater object of internal improvement than to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Mississippi; and he recommended to those gentlemen who were the advocates of internal improvement, to vote for this bill: for no case would ever arise for their consideration of a more national or more important nature. Alluding to what had been said by the gentleman from Virginia, he would remark that it had been rumored that all was not right with regard to the lands that had been granted to Alabama; yet he would say, that even admitting that that State should make an application similar to that which had been made by Illinois, he would vote in such a case as he now intended to do in the present—and why? To save the land from being sacrificed. With regard to Indiana and Ohio, there was no danger of their ever applying to Congress for a retrocession of the lands granted to them; they had made such judicious selections of land, that he had no fears of their ever troubling Congress on the subject. He was willing, on the present occasion, as he would be on all others, to give a part to save the whole.

Mr. BARRINGER said, if he were to be influenced by the very sincere regard he had for the honorable member from Illinois, and a desire he ever felt to oblige that gentleman in any matter in which he appeared to take so deep an interest as he evidently did in the subject now under discussion, he should pursue a very different course on the present occasion, from that which he felt prescribed to him by the most obvious sense of duty. But he could not surrender his principles to his private sentiments.

Mr. B. said he had the honor of a seat in this House at the time of the grant of land in question to the State of Illinois, and that he had no motive to conceal his having voted against the grant. But he took occasion now to say, that, if he had originally supported the measure, there were circumstances connected with our relations with that State, in regard to the public lands, not to be overlooked; nay, such as required from this House an expression not to be misapprehended. Not that the work was not one of great national importance; that was a point he was ready to concede, and he would readily admit that few objects of internal improvement could rank higher in the scale of nationality than the connexion of the waters of the Mississippi with Lake Michigan by a canal from that lake to the Illinois river. But, said Mr. B., though I am prepared to make these concessions, and the further one, that the measure may not injuriously affect our pecuniary interests, yet there is a respect due to ourselves, and to the national interests, which should utterly avoid any movement of this House, at this time, upon this subject. The State of Illinois has, on former occasions, as well as very recently, through the medium of her Executive, advanced her claim to the entire and undivided possession of the public lands within her limits, by virtue of State sovereignty. Yes, sir, her State sovereignty! And, whatever other gentlemen might be disposed to do, he would not grant favors where they were not asked as such, but claimed as matter of right; nor would he, in any instance, grant one foot of the public domain to any State, for any purpose, whilst these high pretensions were advanced, nor until they were promptly disavowed. Mr. B. said he, too, was for State rights! not those rights, however, which wrested from the nation its property—acquired by the common blood and common treasure of a united people—to be appropriated to the individual use of the State in which it may chance to be located. Mr. B. said he feared there was a disposition abroad to define and fritter down all general into separate and individual rights; and the mode of its accomplishment was so plainly indicated by so many circumstances, in daily development, that he who runs might read. And let not gentlemen flatter themselves that, whatever may be the alternate fate of the powers rightfully claimed by the General Government, its property at least is safe! Hug not the delusion! Its seizure is determined, and the mode is in preparation. Destroy but the supervisory powers of the Federal Supreme Court, and the object is effected with a certainty, equalled only by the simplicity of the operation. The State seizes upon and grants your public domain; the issue is between your grantee and the grantee of the State. The State judges, deeply imbued in the learning of State rights and State sovereignty, decide that it is inconsistent with the rights of sovereignty that the General Government should hold lands within the limits of the respective States; or, reversing the proposition, that the State should not be the sovereign of the unappropriated lands within her borders, and the work is accomplished! Your grantee is stripped of the benefit of his writ of error, and you of your property.

Mr. B. said he had risen to say a few words only in opposition to the engrossment of the bill. He had occupied more time than he had intended. He would only repeat that, according to the pretensions set up by Illinois, we had no security (so far as her principles are to afford a barrier) that, when we shall have paid her for this land, by scrip, to be redeemed in the sale of other lands, she will not attempt to seize upon the very land we are now taking by purchase, and appropriate it to herself. He would not, therefore, move one inch, until she disavowed the extravagant pretensions of her late and present Executive.

So far, said Mr. B., as this bill may affect us, in a pecuniary point of view, he so generally accorded with the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCoy] in the remarks he had made, that he would not reiterate them.

Mr. RENCHER said he should vote for the bill. The work proposed was one of great importance, not only to the State of Illinois, but also to the whole valley of the Mississippi, and to the National Government. All such works of internal improvement were calculated to enhance the value of the public domain. It should not be overlooked, that the General Government owned four-fifths of all the lands in the State of Illinois; and, consequently, if the canal was constructed, the nation would be the gainer, in the increased value of the public lands, of a proportion of four-fifths. Would it, then, he asked, be just, to throw upon that State the burden of construction, when not more than one-fifth of the benefit of the contemplated improvement would accrue to her? He had no intention of entering into a discussion of the propriety of the passage of the bill which originally granted the lands in question to the State of Illinois; nor would he say whether he should have voted for the measure, if he had been here: the question now was, whether the House will give value to the appropriation of lands then made, by passing the bill on the table. He begged leave to say, that much of the lands in the vicinity of the proposed canal was of little value, and would so remain for a number of years, unless that canal should be completed. If that were accomplished, the lands would rise in value, and the benefit to the Treasury of the United States would increase in proportion. The State of Illinois was not able, at present, to perform the work—the General Government was; and the nation would receive a tenfold indemnity from the success of the measure now proposed. Pass this bill, sir, said Mr. R., and that part of the country that is now a wilderness—a desert—will become the most flourishing part of the State.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had not intended to participate in the discussion of this bill, nor should he now have risen, but to take notice of some remarks which had fallen from two gentlemen who had preceded him, having reference to the State which he, in part, had the honor to represent.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCoy] had remarked, that, if this bill passed, we should have applications from Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, &c., (to all of whom similar grants had been made,) to change the terms of their grants—to take back the lands granted, &c. To relieve the gentleman's apprehensions, so far as Alabama was concerned, Mr. C. said the State had already sold and disposed of the lands, or, at least, much the greater part, which had been granted for a like improvement, and they were now in the hands of individual proprietors. Hence there was no probability that any similar measure would be proposed by the Legislature, or the people of that State. The State of Ohio had no doubt also disposed of her grant; and no apprehensions were to be entertained of any similar proposition from that quarter.

But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Bell] had alluded to certain rumors which had been afloat, that Alabama had mismanaged the grant of 400,000 acres, which had been made to that State for the improvement of the Tennessee and other rivers. Mr. C. said he was not displeased at the opportunity which had thus been afforded, of giving some explanation of the manner in which that land had been disposed of. The Legislature had passed a law for the valuation of those lands, by commissioners appointed and sworn for that purpose, having due regard to the quality of soil, locality, &c. Those commissioners were citizens of the country in which the lands were, and fully competent to assess a fair and adequate value. They had assessed the value of each particular tract, and for the prices so ascertained and fixed, the land had been sold, and had doubtless produced an average price above that for which the United States had sold like quantities of land before and since. Mr. C. was aware, he said, that rumors, as the gentleman from Tennessee remarked, had been in circulation, unfavorable to the conduct of the commissioners; and, in consequence of impressions produced by these rumors, more than twelve months ago, the then Chief Magistrate of Alabama had noticed them in his communication to the Legislature. Upon that communication (as Mr. C. understood it) a committee had been appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, and an inquiry into the grounds of these rumors instituted. The committee was composed of high-minded, honorable, and intelligent gentlemen. Many witnesses had been examined, and a laborious investigation had taken place, which resulted in a report wholly exculpating and acquitting the commissioners from the censure which rumor had bestowed upon them. Copies of this report had been forwarded, during the last session, to several gentlemen of this House, and could, no doubt, now be had for examination, if desired. Mr. C. added that it was true, having the honor of a seat in the Legislature of Alabama at the time the disposal of these 400,000 acres of land was under consideration, he had preferred another mode, and felt it his duty to oppose the one adopted in the law which passed. But he nevertheless thought, when the facts he had mentioned were taken into view, and considered, the imputations against the Legislature of that State, which had been alluded to, would be considered unfounded and unjust. The important work contemplated by this grant is now in progress, and will, no doubt, be accomplished in the manner, and within the time, designated by the act of Congress.

While up, Mr. C. said, as he intended to vote for the bill under consideration, he would make a few remarks upon that subject. The bill contemplates, as its title purports, to change the mode of disposing of the lands heretofore granted to Illinois, to enable her to construct the canal in question. No question of constitutionality, or perhaps of policy, which might be involved, if the original measure were now presented, could arise on this occasion. Indeed, he did not understand that the question of constitutionality had been raised by the opponents of the bill. And Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to remark that he concurred, most cordially, in the sentiment, that all further appropriations of money for purposes of internal improvement should cease, at least until the public debt was paid—however willing he might have been, while the system prevailed, that his State should receive a liberal dividend.

But, Mr. C. repeated, no question of that nature arose in this case. The land which had been granted to Illinois was situated along the proposed line of the canal—in a tract of country altogether unsettled, and remote from those parts which were settled; consequently, it would not now sell for a fair price, when other lands of the same State, and in others, afforded facilities so much greater. No man would go into the midst of a wilderness to make a settlement, so inconvenient to the means of subsistence, when he could get land of nearly equal quality in the neighborhood of abundant supplies. What does the Legislature of Illinois propose, and what does this bill contemplate? Merely that she may be permitted to relinquish a portion of this land, so situated, and receive scrip therefor, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be received in payment for other lands of the United States, in Illinois alone. It amounts, at most, to a mere exchange of lands heretofore granted for other lands. Not one dollar of the public treasury is proposed to be appropriated, nor one acre of the public land to be granted.

It had been intimated, in debate, that the land proposed to be relinquished was probably inferior, and, on that account, could not be sold. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNCAN] had placed that matter beyond doubt, (as Mr. C. conceived,) by the evidence of one of the engineers, whose statement had been read, showing, satisfactorily, that the land was of as good quality, generally, as perhaps any other like quantity of land in the State. The completion of the canal would, unquestionably, enhance the value of the land proposed to be relinquished, as well as the public domain in that State, generally, and thus ensure to the Government a most ample indemnity. The only inconvenience that could arise to the United States, would be the possible delay of receiving the money for which the land for which the scrip would be paid, might sell, for a few months, or perhaps longer. The scrip was not, in any event, to be redeemed with money, but land, and only acre for acre. Not more than fifty thousand dollars of scrip could, under the provisions of the bill, be issued at once; and the investiture of that sum, in conformity with the conditions of the grant, must be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, before any more could issue. Indeed, every interest of the General Government, contemplated in making the grant, is carefully guarded and preserved. The work intended is admitted, Mr. C. believed, on all hands, to be one of national importance, as it proposed a connexion between Lake Michigan and the navigable waters of the Mississippi. The benefits likely to result from it, if completed, would be almost incalculable, not only to Illinois, but to the whole Western country. Shall we not then aid, when we do not sacrifice a single dollar of money, or a foot of the public domain?

The question of engrossment being stated from the Chair, Mr. ANGEL called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. STRONG made some remarks in favor of the bill, considering that, particularly in a military point of view, its passage would be of great importance—it would also tend to promote the rapid settlement of that section of the country; and the proposed work was, in his view, altogether of a national character. He then submitted the following amendment, to come in at the end of the fifth section, and said a few words in its favor.

“Provided, and it is further enacted, That no land, as aforesaid, shall be received in exchange for the scrip aforesaid, at a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre.”

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being finally put on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

Mr. YINTON rose, and said he had yesterday voted with the majority in the rejection of the bill "authorizing a change in the disposal of land granted for the Illinois and Michigan canal." Understanding that, if the vote was reconsidered, the gentleman from Illinois would move such a modification of the bill as would make it more acceptable to the House, he had risen for the purpose of making that motion.

Mr. CLAY moved to postpone the consideration of the motion till the 20th instant.

Mr. HAYNES moved to postpone it indefinitely.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not in order—a motion to postpone to a day certain had the preference.

Mr. HAYNES then moved to postpone the motion of Mr. VINTON to the 3d day of March.

The SPEAKER said that this motion was not in order; it was not a privileged question.

Mr. DRAYTON moved that the motion lie on the table.

The question being put on this motion, it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 84.

Mr. POTTER renewed the motion for indefinite postponement.

The SPEAKER again decided that the motion was not in order.

Mr. HAYNES again moved to postpone the motion to the 3d of March; it was his opinion that the question should be first put on the longest time proposed.

The SPEAKER said—It is not mine.

Mr. MCCOY hoped the motion would not be postponed; but that the House would immediately decide upon the question of reconsideration.

Mr. MARTIN said, if any good reason could be assigned for reconsideration, he did not know that he should oppose it; for instance, if the vote of yesterday, on rejecting the bill, which was nearly two to one, had been taken prematurely. No good reasons had been offered, that he had heard, for the course that had been proposed; and the House might in this way be constantly discussing what they would and what they would not do, and in the end do nothing.

Mr. CLAY said he had made the motion with a view to avoid discussion at the present time. The bill had been so recently debated, that the remarks made upon it must be fresh in the minds of gentlemen, and the object of postponement was the better to mature the bill, and give time for reflection.

Mr. DUNCAN hoped the postponement to a day certain would take place. He would give the gentleman from South Carolina a reason for wishing it postponed, as he was at a loss for one. Mr. D. said he had no doubt, and it was a general opinion, that the speech of the member from North Carolina, [Mr. BARRINGER,] against the bill, yesterday, was the cause of its rejection. He said that the objection urged in the speech of Mr. B. was chiefly on account of the claim made in the messages of the late and present Governor of Illinois to all the public lands. He said, it would be remembered that that gentleman had warned the House against giving money for land which the State was claiming, and would hereafter claim, as her own. Mr. D. remarked that the Legislature of the State was now in session, and, by the day fixed, we shall see whether it sanctions or adopts the recommendations of the Governors. He did not think, however, that the question of the right of the State, or the claim set up by the Governors, ought to be introduced into the debate on this bill, or in this House; as it was strictly a legal question, that must, if seriously entertained, be settled by another tribunal. Mr. D. had other reasons for wishing time; many of the friends to the measure were opposed to the details of the bill, which he hoped might be obviated by a little consultation.

Mr. STERIGERE said that, in his opinion, the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Alabama for postponement were the very ones which should induce the House at this time to decide the question of reconsideration. If the remarks of gentlemen were fresh in the recollection of the House, they certainly now had it in their power to act understandingly on the subject; whereas, if the question was postponed, they would be very likely to forget them.

Mr. CLAY said, in reply, that he had not made the motion to postpone, with a view that gentlemen might forget the facts which had been stated to the House, but simply to give time for reflection, so that the House might come to a proper conclusion.

The question was then put on the motion to postpone the consideration of the motion of Mr. VINTON to the 20th instant, and decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 86.

Mr. HAYNES then moved to postpone the bill till the 4th of March next.

Mr. CLAY moved to postpone the motion for reconsideration to the 13th instant, which took preference of the motion of Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. DRAPER called for the previous question; but the House did not sustain the call.

Mr. VANCE said he saw no reason for thus destroying the bill. It was one of great importance to the Western country, and one which it was desirable to pass; but, if gentlemen would force a vote upon it at this time, without giving time for consultation, and an opportunity of so modifying it as to suit the views of members, he should call for the yeas and nays on the postponement, so that the people of that section of the country, interested in its passage, might be enabled to learn how their representatives had voted. He demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

The question was then put on the postponement of the reconsideration of the bill till the 13th instant, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 87.

Mr. CROCKETT made another ineffectual attempt to get up the Tennessee land bill. He called for the yeas and nays on his motion, and they were ordered by the House; and, being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 92.

LATERAL RAILROAD.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said he had a motion to make, which was necessary to facilitate the action of the House on a bill now pending before it. He meant the bill to authorize the Baltimore Railroad Company to extend a branch from their road to and within this District. The

[JAN. 6, 1831.]

House had already, on his motion, as the chairman of the District committee, referred to that committee the memorial of one of the corporations of the District, having reference to that bill, on the supposition that, if it passed in its present shape, it might jeopardize their rights.

Mr. BROWN asked to have some reason assigned for the reference proposed.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said, that this morning he had been waited on by an agent, to state that the Council of the city of Washington wished to be heard on the same subject; and, as the people of this District can nowhere be heard on subjects affecting them so vitally, except before the Committee for the District of Columbia, he moved that the bill in question, together with the amendments proposed to it, be referred to the appropriate committee.

This bill, Mr. D. said, had got on to the present stage with much speed and good fortune, without ever having been seen by the committee to which its consideration of right belonged. To put this in a plain point of view, it was necessary to observe, that nothing was asked of Congress in their character of a National Legislature, but only as the Legislature of the District. The company had been incorporated by a charter of the State of Maryland, with certain immunities and privileges, one of which was a power to extend from the main road as many lateral railways as they please. By virtue of their Maryland charter, they may extend the contemplated branch to this District, but without our consent they cannot enter it. This consent they wish to obtain by the bill, and nothing more—they ask no funds nor aid whatever. It is evident, therefore, that the consideration of this subject exclusively, in the first instance, belonged to that committee whose duty it was to guard, not only the rights and interests of this people, who have no representative here, but also to take care of the property of the nation in the city of Washington. He hoped, therefore, no objection would be made to the reference he asked.

Mr. HOWARD said he had no objection that the Committee for the District of Columbia should throw as strong a guard around the people of the District as it was in their power to do. It was certainly the right and the duty of Congress, as the Legislature for the District, to do so. But, while he admitted this, he must be pardoned for suggesting another course, which was more agreeable to his views of expediency. If the bill were to be taken from the tables of the House, it was impossible to say when it would find its way back again. It was an unusual course, to say the least of it, to recommit a bill when it had arrived at the stage of the one now referred to. He saw no difficulty in the way of modifying the bill, if it was desirable. One amendment had already been offered by his colleague, and others could be by gentlemen, if it was desirable, without a recommitment. He asked if the purpose of the chairman of the District committee would not be as well answered, if the bill were made the order for some particular day; and in the mean time he could prepare such amendments as he considered desirable, which could be offered when the bill came up for consideration. Mr. H. said he was for the road, and nothing else. He consulted the interest of no particular company or corporation, nor did he care by whom it was constructed. He earnestly desired to see the work completed. The reason why he was opposed to taking the bill from the table was, because of its great importance, and the necessity there was for its being acted upon at an early day. A great deal was to be done before operations could be commenced upon the road, and it was highly expedient that it should be commenced by the latter end of the winter, or early part of the spring. If the operation was delayed till the summer season, there was reason to fear that the work would be retarded for a whole year. The suggestion he had made, if the House should concur in the propriety of a motion to that effect, he thought, would enable the chairman of the District committee to give the subject all possible attention and examination, and he hoped he would not press his motion for recommitment.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said that he could not yield to the wish of the gentleman from Maryland; nor could he understand by what reason gentlemen assumed to say that a reference would defeat the bill. Such was not his desire, nor could it be that of the Committee for the District, or its inhabitants. So far from this, he intended to propose to ask leave of the House to sit during its sitting on Monday next, and to devote that day to an examination of the subject, and to a hearing of the parties.

He thought he could comprehend another suggestion made by a gentleman from Maryland, without much difficulty. He has said that, unless the bill shall pass soon, and nearly in its present shape, the road cannot be made. In reply to this remark, he would say, that, in its present shape, he did not see how any man who properly respected the interests of this city, or who would pay a proper regard for the public property in it, could vote for it.

Mr. BROWN said he was opposed to both motions. He viewed the matter in this light: there was a struggle between two sections of the county of Washington, to see which could reap the greatest benefit from the construction of the proposed road. The fact was, if the road was not speedily constructed, it would not be made at all, and thus the citizens of the District would lose the benefit of it. The corporation chartered by Maryland was willing to make the road; they had the means to do it, and would do it without any expense, or any injury to the property of the inhabitants of the District. If it was desirable to the people of the metropolis to have the road constructed, now was the time for the action of Congress, as their legislators. Pass the present bill, and do it speedily, and the citizens would soon reap the benefits of the proposed measure.

Mr. SEMMES opposed the motion for commitment. There was great necessity, he said, for acting on the bill as speedily as possible, not only on account of the importance of the proposed work, but there was danger that, if the bill was taken from the tables of the House, it would be a long time before it would regain its present situation. There were a number of subjects likely to come before the House—the proposed amendment to the constitution; the bill to apportion the representation under the fifth census; perhaps the tariff question, and no doubt others, the discussion of which would be likely to retard the action of the House on this bill, if it was recommitment. For his part, he should prefer to make it the special order for some day certain, and, in the mean time, by consultation, and examination of the various interests concerned, gentlemen would be prepared to offer such amendments as were necessary, when the bill came up for the action of the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY regretted very much the opposition which had been made to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, by the gentleman from Maryland. He thought that the course proposed by the chairman of the District committee was the best. The course pursued by the gentleman from Maryland who had spoken on the subject, was, in his opinion, incorrect. He thought this was a fair subject for the investigation of the District committee. The bill was now in the possession of the House, and such disposition could be made of it as gentlemen chose. If the House was determined to give it the go-by, it could be done now; but, if it was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, when reported by them, it could be made the order for a day certain, and receive the early action of the House. The present was a case in which the friends of internal improvement should unite to ensure the success of the proposed measure; and if there ever was a subject calling for their united exertion, this was one. If the gentlemen from Maryland wished for the success of the proposed measure, he was firmly of the belief that they should concur in the proposed reference to the District committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN expressed himself in favor of the motion. He should be glad to have the whole matter referred to the District committee. This he considered by far the better course; they would become acquainted with the sentiments of the people of the District, and obtain all the necessary information to enable the House to act understandingly on the subject. The House would thus have it in its power to get along with the more ease, and the subject would undoubtedly be the sooner disposed of.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was of opinion that, if the motion prevailed, the bill would be lost. He should oppose every motion that tended to give an opportunity for the interference of the people of the District in the legislation of the House relative to the proposed road. If they were allowed to interfere as it suited their particular interests, we should consume years in acting on this or any other subject. The question was a simple one—the company asked for no aid, but simply to be allowed the privilege of making the road. It was not proper to put it in the power of any individual or corporation to say where the road should be located. There was no engineer wanted to examine and mark out the route of the road. The Baltimore company offered to make it free of expense, and they should be allowed to locate and carry it where their interest would be most promoted.

Mr. IHRIE said, there were various and conflicting interests among the citizens of the District, and it was proper that, before receiving the action of the House, the bill should go where it had never yet been, viz. to the Committee for the District of Columbia. Congress was the sole Legislature for the District, and it was its bounden duty to watch over its interests, and protect the people in all their rights. Therefore, it was expedient that the bill should take the course proposed. He was in favor of the construction of the road, but he wished it located where it would best subserve the interests, and tend to the prosperity of the District. He had, however, risen principally to draw the attention of the House to one of its rules, and he called for the reading of it. It was read by the Clerk, as follows: "It shall be the duty of the Committee for the District of Columbia to take into consideration all such petitions, matters, or things, touching the said District, as shall be presented, or shall come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto, as to them shall seem expedient."

Mr. DRAYTON inquired whether the memorial, asking for liberty to construct the road within the District, had been presented by citizens of the District, or by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

He was answered, by the latter.

Mr. INGERSOLL expressed himself very strongly in favor of the motion before the House. It was an absurd idea that the citizens of the District should not be allowed to remonstrate against any measure that was not for their interest; or that any portion of them should not be permitted to memorialize Congress, either to obtain a benefit from any proposed act of legislation, or to prevent an injury likely to arise therefrom. The people of this District were almost disfranchised; and he thought it would be a hard case to debar them from enjoying the little liberty that was left them. He saw nothing wrong in consulting with the people before passing laws by which they were to be governed. He considered the doctrine of the gentleman from New York as a very singular one, and should be sorry if it prevailed to any great extent. He thought the request of the chairman of the committee a very reasonable one, and hoped it would be granted.

Mr. HOWARD said, that, when the memorial was sent to him to be presented to the House, he had searched the records to know to what committee he should propose its reference. He had found two cases of a similar nature, (which he stated,) one of which had been referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and the other to the Committee for the District of Columbia. He was consequently at a loss to know what direction to give it. The gentleman who had just addressed the House had said that it was not right to pass laws having relation to the District, without consulting with the people thereof. He concurred with him in this opinion. When the petition was presented, it was noticed in the public papers, and was published at large in one of them the next day. If the people here had any objections to the proposed measure, why did they not appear before the Standing Committee for the District, and state them. That committee had been in session on many days since, and thus gave the citizens an opportunity to be heard, if they had any remonstrance to offer; but no one had appeared before it. It was inconsistent to say, therefore, that an opportunity had not been given them to be heard. The committee was at all times accessible, and no complaint could be made to the contrary.

Mr. H. would remark, that no injury could possibly arise to the citizens, or the corporations of the District, by the passage of the bill on the table. It was carefully worded—the road was not to interfere with or obstruct the travel or transportation on any street; and all private property necessarily condemned was to be paid for; so that the interests of the corporations had not been overlooked by the committee which had reported the bill. He trusted, in conclusion, that the bill would not be thrown from the table, and thus lose a station which it would not, perhaps, ever regain.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said, that, if he could rightly understand the bill, (and he read it attentively with that view,) there was nothing to prevent this road from passing through the northwest corner of Georgetown, so as to meet the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, at or above the Little Falls, which would prostrate the value of property in this city either held under or by the United States. The other argument, that this bill had already been under the consideration of a committee who had attended to the interests of the District, and before which the inhabitants might have appeared and defended their interests, he thought, admitted of this reply: that the same thing might be urged, and with the same propriety, if the former reference had been to any other standing committee—that on Commerce and Manufactures, for instance.

The question was then put on referring the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 57.

COPYRIGHTS.

The House took up the bill "to amend the several acts respecting copyrights."

[The last section of the bill was substantially as follows:

SEC. 16. That any author or authors, &c. of any book, &c. who have heretofore obtained the copyright thereof, according to law, should be entitled to the benefit of the act, for such period of time as would, together with the time which should have elapsed from the first entry of such copyright, make up the term of twenty-eight years, with the same privilege to himself, or themselves, his or their widow, child, or children, of renewing the copyright at the expiration thereof, as is provided in relation to copyrights originally secured under the act, and with the benefit the several provisions thereof, &c.

This last section Mr. ELLSWORTH, by instruction of the Judiciary committee, proposed to strike out, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That, whenever a copyright has been heretofore obtained by any author, or authors, inventor, designer, or engraver, of any book, map, chart, print, cut, or engraving, or by a proprietor of the same, if such author, or authors, or either of them, such inventor, designer, or engraver, be living at the passage of this act, then such author, or authors, or the survivor of them, such inventor, designer, or engraver, shall continue to have the same exclusive right to his book, chart, map, print, cut, or engraving, with the benefit of each and all the provisions of this act, for the security thereof, for such additional period of time as will, together with the time which shall have elapsed from the first entry of such copyright, make up the term of twenty-eight years, with the same right to his widow, child, or children, to renew the copyright at the expiration thereof, as is above provided in relation to copyrights originally secured under this act. And if such author, or authors, inventor, designer, or engraver, shall not be living at the passage of this act, then his or their heirs, executors, and administrators, shall be entitled to the like exclusive enjoyment of said copyright, with the benefit of each and all the provisions of this act, for the security thereof, for the period of twenty-eight years from the first entry of said copyright, with the like privileges of renewal to the widow, child, or children of such author, or authors, designer, inventor, or engraver, as is provided in relation to copyrights originally secured under this act: Provided, That this act shall not extend to any copyright heretofore secured, the term of which has already expired.”]

Mr. HOFFMAN opposed the bill, which appeared to him to be at variance with every principle of sound policy. It went to establish a monopoly of which authors alone would reap the advantage, to the public detriment. The people had rights to be secured as well as authors and publishers: and he would submit to the House whether it would not be better, in a case of such importance, to send the bill into a Committee of the Whole House, where every part of it could be fully discussed. He instanced the case of any person discovering or inventing any useful improvement in the arts, taking out a patent, and being obliged to lodge a full specification and an entire model of his work in the proper office, and that, too, so accurately and minutely, that a similar one could be made from the model and description; and yet, even then, the applicant received his patent right for fourteen years only, and, at the expiration of that period, his invention became the property of the public.

So it should be, said Mr. H., with the author or publisher. There was an implied contract between them and the public. They, in virtue of their copyright, sold their books to the latter at an exorbitant rate; and the latter, therefore, had the right to avail themselves of the work, when the copyright expired. Besides, it would be a breach of contract with those booksellers who had purchased copyrights of authors heretofore, and whose rights would be infringed upon, should the privileges of the authors of works be extended as proposed by the bill. He trusted that, if they would legislate upon the subject, they would legislate so as to leave the rights of all interested in this matter precisely in their present state.

Mr. ELLSWORTH vindicated the bill, which, he contended, would, in its results, enhance the literary character of the country, by holding forth to men of learning and genius additional inducements to devote their time and talents to literature and the fine arts. He moved an amendment, extending the security afforded by the act to living authors, and, in the event of their death, and their leaving families, to the family, for a further period of twelve years.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied; and was followed by Mr. HUNTINGTON, who strenuously supported the measure, as one that would do honor to the country, and promote, in the most eminent degree, the advancement of all that ennobles and dignifies intellectual man. He was in favor of the amendment, in particular, as no more than an act of pure justice; for why, he asked, should the author who had sold his copyright a week ago, be placed in a worse situation than the author who should sell his work the day after the passing of that act? He would cite a single case by way of illustration. Webster's Dictionary, for instance, that unrivalled work, that monument of the learning, industry, and genius of its author. What, he inquired, should that great work, the labor of a whole life, be secured to its author, under the existing law, only for the term allowed in the event of the passing of a bill extending the period of copyrights? No: all cases came within the spirit of the measure; and justice, policy, and equity alike forbade that any distinction should be made between them.

Mr. VERPLANCK adverted to the argument of his friend and colleague, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] as to an implied contract existing between an author and the public, by which the former relinquishes his right to his works, at the end of fourteen years, to the public. The whole argument was founded on a mistake, apparent to the eye of common sense, and repugnant to the law of the land. There was no contract; the work of an author was the result of his own labor. It was a right of property existing before the law of copyrights had been made. That statute did not give the right, it only secured it; it provided a legal remedy for the infringement of the right, and that was the sum of it. It was, he repeated, merely a legal provision for the protection of a natural right. That right was acknowledged by all, and hence the disgrace attendant on plagiarism and literary piracy. It was so held in England; and in the great case of literary property, tried before the court of King's Bench, the judges were unanimously of opinion that an author had an inherent right in the property of his works. The bill before the House went merely to extend the remedy to twenty-eight years. It was not the granting of a property. Such is the view, said Mr. V., taken of it in the constitution of the United States, and such is my opinion of it. I conceive the bill and the amendment ought to pass into a law, as I consider the measure not only politic and proper, but a necessary act of common justice.

Mr. HOFFMAN rejoined. His colleague who had just sat down, had spoken of the right of authors, and had described the copyright act as simply a remedy for the abuse of that right. That seemed to him [Mr. H.] as amounting almost to a contradiction in terms: for he knew of no right but a remedial right; and he was perfectly willing to leave authors every right possible, provided they were not granted the extended remedy of the present bill.

Mr. VERPLANCK and Mr. HOFFMAN mutually explained.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, supported the bill and amendment.

The amendment of Mr. ELLSWORTH was then read, and agreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved, as an amendment, to strike out twenty-eight years, and insert fourteen; but the proposition was negatived.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow—yeas 81, nays 31; and

The House adjourned.

REDUCTION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. McDUFFIE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to reduce the bounty on pickled fish exported.

It was read a first and second time.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the bill was one of great importance; and it was desirable that it should pass speedily.

dily, as fish that might be exported before the first of the month, were entitled, by the present law, to the full amount of the bounty which it was the object of the present bill to reduce. He moved, therefore, that it be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ANDERSON rose to request that the bill might lay on the table for a short time, to give an opportunity to examine it. The first notice the House have of the bill is, by having it read by the Clerk; and it is proposed to Congress to pass it without a moment's time for reflection or examination of its provisions. It may be all right, and such as we ought to pass; but, as it relates to an important portion of citizens, who are indispensable to our navigating interest and to our navy, Mr. A. wished, at least, for an opportunity to read the bill before he gave his vote upon it. He felt a deep interest in whatever related to our commerce and our navy, the prosperity of which depended on our fisheries; and whatever depresses the latter, would most assuredly be felt by the former. Every maritime Power has seen the importance of encouraging and increasing her fisheries, as the only sure foundation of her commercial and naval prosperity; and he hoped we should not lightly, and without the usual consideration, pass any bill that might, in its consequences, injure this nursery of our seamen, and render our navy dependent on foreigners for men. Look, for a moment, to Great Britain, the greatest Power on the ocean, and let us be mindful to profit by experience. See the encouragement she has given, and still gives, to maintain and increase her fisheries. Her fisheries pay no duty on salt, and yet she gives a greater bounty than we ever have given ours; the effects of which are seen both in her merchant ships and men of war, all manned with her own subjects. Not so with ours. At this very hour, one-third of all the sailors in our tonnage afloat are foreigners; and it is not in our power to send a single frigate to sea with a full complement of native sailors. The bad effects of this practice of manning our ships will be severely felt when a war shall call us on the ocean. Mr. A. did not know that this bill would have any injurious effect on the fisheries, yet still he wished a short time to examine it, and requested that it might lay on the table until Monday.

Mr. REED said, the subject had come upon them in so unexpected a manner, that it was scarcely possible to meet it and discuss its merits at once. He was opposed to its being thus rapidly disposed of, before an opportunity was afforded to those who might be interested in it, to give it a due and proper consideration. Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, had entered into a full investigation of the matter, and presented a report upon it, which was, perhaps, unknown to many, but which ought to be in the hands of all whose duty it was to legislate respecting it. In that report, he took a review of the practice in England and France, those two great commercial nations, with regard to the system of bounties generally, but, in particular, as respected the fisheries. In order that the opinions of that great statesman on this subject might be known, he was anxious for the republishing of that report. It was as applicable to the present day, as to the period for which it was written. The question was one of infinite importance. The fisheries, although of direct interest to one class of the community only, were yet of advantage to all: for our trade, our commerce, and our navigation were all, more or less, affected by it. He would go further; he would state that the fishing business was so poor, that no nation could engage in it without the encouragement afforded by national bounties. He could state this from his own personal observation; at least, as far as our own fisheries were concerned. And let gentlemen also look to the fact, that those fisheries contributed to the best defence of the country. He did not speak of future wars—he did not anticipate such evils—but should we not be exempt from such scourges, where would our battles be fought? Not upon the soil of our country, but upon the waves of the ocean. The triumphs of the last war were not, and never could be, forgotten. The fisheries had been the nurseries of our seamen, and long might they continue to be so. He concluded by stating that he considered the bill to have a tendency to destroy that valuable branch of our commerce, and to root up the school of our most hardy, enterprising, and skilful seamen. There had been no change in the policy of other nations in respect to the fishery bounties: Holland, England, and France had continued their systems, and prospered under them. He hoped the bill would be postponed for a few days; and if no other member of the House should make a motion to that effect, he himself should feel it his duty to do so.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that he did not see the policy of the postponement. The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] was founded on a mistaken basis. Every one knew that a large bounty was given on the tonnage of vessels employed for four months in the year in the fishing trade; and the law he proposed did not effect this. It went merely to effect a corresponding reduction in the bounty to the reduction of the duty on salt. The duty on salt was formerly twenty cents per bushel—and a bushel of salt, he believed, was sufficient to pickle a barrel of fish. That duty was now only ten cents per bushel; and would any gentleman then say, that the same bounty should be allowed in the one case as in the other? If a delay is wished in this case, why, let it be granted; but, said Mr. McD., I give notice that, on the further discussion of this subject, I may, perhaps, be induced to go into the question of the bounty on tonnage. I did hope that no opposition would have been offered to this measure. I am willing that it be postponed until Monday.

Mr. MARTIN said that it was his intention to investigate the whole of the bounty system. Salt and the fisheries were not the only articles of the commerce of the country. He wished gentlemen to understand that he should enter particularly into the question of drawbacks.

After some further discussion, the bill was postponed until Monday.

CLAIM OF JAMES MONROE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. MERCER, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. FINDLAY in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "for the relief of James Monroe." The question before the House being on a motion made by Mr. WHITTLESLEY, when the bill was last under consideration, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. WILLIAMS said, this was a delicate question, and he was sorry to be impelled by what he believed to be a sense of duty to resist the passage of the bill. He had, as far as opportunity would enable him to do so, examined the subject, and was clearly convinced the claim was wholly destitute of foundation. If it be tested by the laws and usages of the country, it will be found that Congress has not only dealt justly, but generously, with the individual whose demand we are now called upon to consider.

Let me not, said Mr. W., be suspected of a design to make an appeal to popular topics, or to use declamatory language, when I say that in this country all men are equal; that separate or exclusive privileges and immunities are not to be allowed to any one. This is the vital principle of the republic, the genius of our Government, and no measure in contravention of it should ever be proposed—or, if proposed, it should certainly not be adopted. If a law be passed for the benefit of any one individual, that principle of equality which is essential to, and inseparable from, the very nature of our political institutions, requires—nay, sir, demands, that all our citizens should be similarly benefited. In this view of the subject, setting aside the sum to be paid, the claim of Mr. Monroe is very important. The sum proposed to be given to him is sixty-seven thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars and ninety-six cents; which is a large amount, considering it merely as a private claim. But great as the sum is, it is not at all comparable in magnitude to the principle involved in it, because the same kind of grant must and should be made to every other citizen similarly situated. For, if not, that equal condition of rights and privileges, in which all are taught to repose in confidence and safety, will not be maintained.

We were told the other day that there were some subjects into which members of this House would not inquire. If any gentleman chooses to decide questions before him without examination, be it so; it is nothing to me; it is an affair between him and his constituents. But I think my duty best performed when I have given to every subject the fullest examination of which I am capable, and have decided it according to the weight of evidence before me. It affords me no pleasure to oppose any claim, whether it comes from a distinguished citizen, from one who has filled all the high offices in the country, or from one whose life has always been private and obscure, and who never has filled any office. But distinguished citizens, if they persevere in making demands of the Government, must expect to have their claims examined; they must and shall be dealt with by me in the same manner as if they were people the most humble and obscure: and if the claims of the latter are to be rejected, so must those of the former. No difference should be made, but equal and exact justice should characterize all our proceedings.

From what we have heard in this House, and from what has been going on out of it, one might be induced to believe that Mr. Monroe had served his country for nothing; that throughout a long life, embracing a period of many years, this distinguished patriot had devoted himself to the public without any compensation whatever. But is this the fact? No, sir, it is not. So far from it, that it may be affirmed as a truth well established and beyond all doubt or contradiction, that he has received more of the public money than any other citizen in the whole country. In a publication made by the late Governor of Virginia, (Mr. Giles,) it was stated that Mr. Monroe had then received as much as four hundred thousand dollars of the public money. This statement has never been denied or contradicted by any one; and I believe it can be verified by recorded evidence on file in the various departments of the Government. If this be true—and I presume no one will attempt to deny it—what conclusion must follow? Not that Mr. Monroe has served for nothing; not that he has labored through a long life without any compensation; but that in serving the public he has also served himself; that he has been paid four hundred thousand dollars, which is a greater sum than any other man has received. If any one has ever had so much, the fact has entirely escaped my observation. Very certain I am that General Washington did not; neither did Mr. Adams, Mr. Jefferson, or Mr. Madison, who were his predecessors in the Presidential office. Has any other officer of the Government had an equal amount? I believe not. Confident I am that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the War, or Navy Department, or Attorney General, nor any member of either House of Congress, has received a sum by any means comparable to that which has already been paid to Mr. Monroe. Why, then, should it be said that this distinguished individual—for distinguished I admit him to be—has not been duly compensated for his services? Why should the Government be reproached, as it has been in many places, with turning a deaf year to his well-founded complaints? Sir, I deny the correctness of these allegations. I contend that full, ample, and complete justice has been already done to him; that the Government has treated him, not only with justice, but with generosity, reference being had to the law and usage which regulate and control the settlement of accounts in all analogous cases.

It is prima facie evidence against the justice of this claim, that Mr. Jefferson refused to allow it. In his administration, the greater part of the service was performed. He best knew the value of those services, and consequently could best measure the amount of compensation to which the individual who rendered them was entitled. After the lapse of twenty or thirty years, when only a few, if any, of us can have personal knowledge of the transactions referred to, it is not in the nature of things—it is, indeed, impossible—we should be as well qualified to appreciate the merits of the individual, or the value of the services he rendered, as those who were contemporary with him; who were eye-witnesses of his labor; who had the kindest feelings towards him; and who had ample power to remunerate him for every sacrifice. This fact of itself raises in my mind a strong presumption against the justice of the claim, and, unless it be countervailed by evidence of greater weight, I should think the House would be indisposed to make the allowance. But the facts and circumstances of the case, as far as I have been able to comprehend them, go to fortify, not to weaken, the presumption. This, sir, I shall now attempt to show you.

Mr. Monroe went as minister to France in 1794, and returned in April, 1797. This, in the documents before us, is called the first mission; and, in consequence of it, he exhibited an account against the Government, through his agent, Mr. Dawson, amounting in the aggregate to thirty-eight thousand six hundred dollars and sixty-seven cents. This account, I apprehend, was paid at the time of its presentation, as no proof of a contrary import is to be found among the papers submitted to us for examination. Mr. Monroe, however, complains, that, in settling the account, injustice was done to him in several particulars, which I will endeavor to state in the order in which they are presented.

He alleges that his pay as minister was made to end on the 6th of December, 1796, when he received his letter of recall, whereas it should have been extended to the 1st of January, 1797, the time when he obtained his audience of leave, making a difference of about twenty-five days. It is not necessary, nor shall I attempt, to deny the correctness of the position here assumed. It might have been more proper to continue his pay till the audience of leave, than to stop it precisely on the day of his recall. But the error, if it was one, was caused by Mr. Monroe himself. In the account presented by his friend, Mr. Dawson, Government is charged with his pay only to the 6th of December, 1796. At the time the account was settled, it seems Mr. Monroe himself did not believe he was entitled to pay up to the 1st of January, 1797: for, if he did, why was it not so stated?

In the letter of Mr. Anderson, Comptroller of the Treasury, it further appears Mr. Monroe was the cause of this error. Referring to this item, in a letter to Mr. Monroe, the comptroller says: "The mistake or error in the settlement of your account, as before stated, appears to have resulted from the date of your letter to the Secretary of State, advising him of the time at which you had received his letter of recall, and which must have been taken as the time at which you had your audience of leave. This appears to me as the only rational mode of accounting for the departure, in the settlement of your account, from the general rule which had been observed in the settlement of the accounts of our other foreign ministers."

No blame can, therefore, attach to the Government for the existence of this error. Mr. Monroe was the only person who had knowledge of the fact, and who was competent to correct it. If he chose to be silent, he ought in justice to take all the consequences, for no one could compel him to speak. But we have his own authority for saying the accounting officers of the treasury did remedy the mistake as soon as it was known to them. On page eleven of the documents communicated to Congress in 1825, Mr. Monroe says, in a note: "It is proper to add, here, that that error was then corrected, that is, in 1817, and the allowance was then made to me for the interval between the 6th of December, 1796, and the 1st of January, 1797."

Claim of James Monroe.

I have looked through the documents, hastily, it is true, but with some attention, and I have not seen that the accounting officers received any information from Mr. Monroe, which would enable them to correct the error, prior to 1817. If any injury has resulted to him, it was the direct and necessary consequence of his own act. He alone was the cause of it, and he alone must bear it. He cannot and should not claim the right to devolve any responsibility upon the Government, which was ready and willing at all times to do him justice.

The second difficulty growing out of the first mission to France, and of which Mr. Monroe greatly complained, was this: It appears, as above stated, that he received his letter of recall on the 6th of December, 1796, but he did not obtain his audience of leave till the 1st of January, 1797. Instead of returning home immediately, he thought proper to remain in France till the 20th of April, 1797, and for this delay he raised an account, and demanded from Government pay for nearly four months of additional service. But had he a right to do this, or was Government bound to acknowledge any such obligation? Certainly not. By order of the President of the United States, his diplomatic functions ceased on the 1st of January. He was bound to obey that order, and could not prolong the term of service beyond the period fixed by his Government. As a minister, no intercourse with France was entertained by him subsequently to this time, and the United States derived not a single advantage from his delay in returning home. It must then be considered as a measure adopted by Mr. Monroe, from a regard to his own private convenience or personal accommodation, with which the public had nothing to do.

In support of this item, it has been said he could not return home at this inclement season of the year. But we know vessels now sail at all times, and that recently, within the last month, there have been numerous arrivals from Europe. As to the difficulties growing out of the war, or the blockade of the French coast, I am inclined to think they existed more in imagination than in fact. From no part of the evidence adduced, can I discover that he ever made one effort to obtain a passage between the 1st of January and 20th of April, 1797; on the contrary, in the documents submitted to the committee in 1825, page 4, he says: "I believe the fact to be, that, had I been willing to have encountered a winter's passage with my family, I could not have procured a vessel to bring us home." This I take to be a virtual admission of the fact that no effort was made to obtain a passage. Then all the reasons assigned for the delay, such as the war in Europe, the disturbed state of our commerce, the blockade of the French coast, &c. &c. amount to nothing; for, let those difficulties be what they might, no attempt to surmount or overcome them appears to have been made; and the detention must be regarded as his own voluntary act.

Under these circumstances, when the charge of detention from the 1st of January to the 20th of April was presented, what was the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department? Could they allow it, or were they bound to reject it? I answer, they were bound to reject it. There was no law or usage to justify such an allowance. In the cases of the other ministers, which have been relied on as precedents to support this charge, it will be found that they were engaged in public business; that they were employed during their detention in correspondence with the Governments to which they were accredited. Not so with Mr. Monroe, who, while he was detained, led the life of a private gentleman; that is, as far as his public functions were concerned: he entertained no correspondence with the Government of France; he was absolutely forbidden to do so. Yet, notwithstanding the inadmissibility of this claim, according to any previous law or usage, Congress, in 1826, influenced by a spirit of generosity towards Mr. Monroe, passed an act granting it to him to the amount of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, with interest on the same from 1810 up to the time of payment.

Another subject of complaint is, that the contingent expenses of the first mission to France were not paid. But here again it may be asked, who was to blame for that? In the account presented by Mr. Dawson, the whole charge for contingencies was then paid. If any other or greater account existed at that time, it was known only to Mr. Monroe, and, as he failed to produce it, the fault was his own. The Government could not be required, by any principle, to settle an account of which it had no knowledge. It seems to be supposed, however, that a greater charge was made, but payment was refused, because regular vouchers were not produced. This, I contend, was perfectly right and proper. Every officer is presumed to know the laws and usages of the country which employs him; and there is an implied consent on his part that he will strictly conform to those laws and usages, whatever they may be. The rules and regulations which govern the settlement of accounts at the departments, require that proper vouchers should be produced in all cases where it is practicable; that, if this cannot be done, there should at least be a detailed statement, showing the items of expenses, and the nature of the service they were intended to promote. No right to reimbursement for contingent expense can attach to any officer who does not comply with those regulations. Not to comply is a forfeiture on his part of all claim to remuneration, and puts it in the power of Government either to pay or not, at its own discretion. Before Mr. Monroe could rightfully demand payment for his contingent expenses, he should have produced the vouchers, or made out a detailed statement, for in no other way can the Government maintain any sort of control over the disbursements of its officers. Such vigilance in settling accounts must always be exercised as a matter of right, and of useful necessary policy, not to be dispensed with. But here again the lenity and generous indulgence extended to Mr. Monroe are rendered conspicuous. In 1826, Congress allowed him, under the head of contingent expenses, in the first mission to France, one thousand four hundred and ninety-five dollars and eighty-five cents over and above the first payment of one hundred and ten dollars, to which alone he was justly entitled by any previous law or usages applicable to his case. This allowance also drew interest from 1810 till the time of payment.

We come next, said Mr. W., to the second mission to Europe, commencing on the 12th of January, 1803, and ending on the 15th of November, 1807. At the time the appointment was made, Mr. Jefferson informed Mr. Monroe that he should go out as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain; that he would also receive a commission as special minister to France and Spain; that the salary and outfit would be paid him only on account of the general mission to England; and that, while performing the duties of a special mission, his expenses only should be allowed. This, then, was the contract: it was the understanding of the parties at the time, and must be taken as the law of the case.

In order to bring the subject more distinctly to view, let us for a moment examine the items of the account, as settled at the State Department, by Robert Smith, Secretary, on the 5th of May, 1810.

Here we see, sir, notwithstanding Mr. Monroe was told he should be paid only his expenses on the special mission to France, that an outfit was allowed him of nine thousand dollars, and an additional charge for contingencies of five hundred and forty-six dollars and sixty-six cents. For the special mission to Spain, he appears to have been satisfied with his expenses; and well he might: because that charge, with another, on account of the extraordinary expenses, formed an aggregate of eleven thousand seven hundred and forty-four dollars and eighty-three cents, which was a good deal better than a simple outfit of nine thousand dollars. Why a different rule was adopted in these two cases, I am unable to perceive, unless we suppose that in the mission to France it was better for Mr. Monroe to receive an outfit, and in the mission to Spain to charge for his expenses. If such was the fact, it is another proof of the great liberality with which the Government has always been disposed to treat him. He complains that the ninth item, being for extraordinary expenses incurred by detention in England, was not paid him at the settlement in 1810. But he himself had not then fixed the amount; the charge is not run out with any amount—it is a blank.

He alone knew what these extraordinary expenses were, and it was his duty to ascertain and state them. No officer of Government could be required to guess at the amount, and to pay him according to that uncertain, whimsical mode of doing business. But, sir, if the charge had been rendered in due form, the treasury officers ought not to have paid it, because it would have been doing an act wholly illegal and unauthorized. Let it be remembered, that there were distinct and separate items in the account for every other expense which it had been usual for the Government to allow. This charge for extraordinary expense was equivalent to a direct and positive increase of salary, which no Executive officer, I hope, will ever deem himself competent to grant. Congress alone could do it; and Mr. Monroe ought not to think himself injured because the accounting officers refused to exercise a power which did not belong to them. The committee, in 1826, fixed this allowance at ten thousand dollars, which made the salary about thirteen thousand dollars per annum, instead of nine thousand, as prescribed by law. Now, I ask whether any power in this nation, except the legislative, could or should be competent so to enlarge the salaries of our public ministers? Unquestionably not. A discretionary power to that extent would be formidable indeed, and ought not to be confided to any set of accounting officers. And yet, because they did not assume a power which Congress alone can exercise; because they did not ascertain the amount to be paid, when Mr. Monroe ought himself to have defined the charge; some profligate to think he was greatly injured, and must be allowed to claim damages. Sir, I cannot subscribe to such an opinion.

The amount paid to J. Hicks for demurrage, forms another subject of complaint in the second mission. In the documents, page 4, Mr. Monroe informs us that "this item was casually omitted in the settlement." Here, then, it appears, as in the instances before mentioned, that the error was committed by himself. Congress, however, in 1826 allowed this item, and interest upon it from 1810 to the time it was paid.

A further and more conclusive evidence of the liberality of Government towards Mr. Monroe, is the payment to him of interest on all claims which either Congress or the accounting officers thought admissible, according to any rule which had ever been practised. The general rule is, that Government does not pay interest, and yet, in his case, there was a relaxation of the rule, which shows he has been an object of great and peculiar favor. Where the items were allowable, he has failed to produce them, and thus put it out of the power of Government to settle them; where they were not allowable, but required the intervention of a law to direct their payment, we see that he kept them back, and declined, or positively refused, to present them. Yet, in all these instances, Congress, with a spirit of indulgent generosity, has paid both the principal and interest, in the manner I have detailed.

I have said Government does not pay interest on claims. Why should it be so? Because Government is a moral person, always ready and willing to pay its debts. If any citizen is delayed in the payment of his claim, it is because he does not produce it, or does not offer the requisite evidence to sustain it. The fault, then, is his own, and he should not be permitted to take advantage of it, and mulct the Government in damages. If such were the case, individuals who have claims would never bring them forward, because they would constitute a valuable kind of stock, if permitted to draw interest while they had been reserved, or kept back in the hands of claimants. The principles which require the payment of interest between man and man, in private life, do not apply at all to the relation which exists between the Government and its citizens. Government delights in doing good: it has no spirit of selfishness; it has no use for money but to pay its debts; it enters not into traffic or speculation of any kind. But between man and man this is not the case; there is a spirit of selfishness, traffic, and speculation carried on; the payment of debts is withheld, in order to use the money in some other way, and hence it is right to charge interest. If, therefore, the claims of Mr. Monroe had been just and proper—had he brought them forward in due season, and sustained them by the requisite proof, they would have been promptly paid. At that time, I mean in Mr. Jefferson's administration, from 1803 to 1807, there was a redundancy of money in the treasury, and we were as much puzzled to find out ways and means to get clear of the surplus as we are at the present day. But he tells us, in the documents, that he reserved or held back these claims till a more suitable time to present them; in other words, as I understand it, till he should be out of office. Mr. Pleasanton, the Fifth Auditor, also gives the same reason. Now if these claims were not paid because Mr. Monroe was in office, is it right he should be allowed interest on that account? The United States did him a favor by keeping him in office, and now, forsooth, we are called upon, as a wrongdoer, to pay interest. The continuance in office, if, in fact, it prevented the settlement of his claims, must be regarded as his own act; otherwise you place the Government in the awkward predicament of being obliged to pay interest on damages, because they had previously done him a favor by keeping him in office. In no event, therefore, as I can perceive, ought interest to have been allowed. The whole amount paid him in 1810, and by the act of 1826, in principal and interest, on account of this second mission, embracing a period of four years ten months and four days, is about one hundred and five thousand dollars. Gentlemen will not, they cannot now say that Government has dealt with a sparing, niggardly hand. But the bill before us proposes to do a great deal more, and to allow him sixty-seven thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars and ninety-six cents, in addition to what he has already received.

The first item I shall notice in this new account, is the charge for the purchase of a house in Paris, during the first mission to France, stated at ten thousand dollars. He was not authorized to make the purchase, and the United States have derived no benefit from it; and this, to my mind, is a sufficient objection to the claim. If, as is alleged, the house was purchased by him for the Government, did he also sell it for the same purpose? No; he sold it for himself, and put the money in his own pocket—consequently, he purchased for himself. Had he purchased for the United States, he would have been prohibited from selling without permission; and whatever obligation was imposed on the Government by the purchase, was released by the sale. The whole affair, then, from beginning to end, was a private transaction, and Mr. Monroe, according to every principle, must bear the loss. From the testimony of one of the witnesses, whose name I do not now recollect, it appears that an extravagant price was given for the house. He states that the same property had been offered to him, but he would not buy it, because he could purchase other property of the same kind on better terms. Had Mr. Monroe designed to benefit the Government in this way, he should have known that he was making a good bargain; that he was purchasing on the cheapest possible terms. Not having done so, would be a great objection to the course pursued, and consequently the claim he makes, in the absence of every other reason. The purchase by the United States of a house at the Hague affords no excuse or precedent for Mr. Monroe in this instance. As well as I recollect, the house at the Hague was bought during the revolution, and by the authority of the United States. They then believed it would be politic to have something like a permanent foothold in Holland, which was disposed to be friendly to us in that day of trouble, and from whence we expected to draw our greatest supplies of money to carry on the war for independence. But the same circumstances, the same urgent necessity, did not exist when Mr. Monroe was minister in France. Besides the want of authority, the purchase would have been impolitic. Our Government would not confine their ministers in St. Petersburg, Paris, or London, to a residence at one particular spot, any more than they would compel the officers at home to live in one particular street or house in the city of Washington. What would suit one might not suit another, and hence it must be left to the discretion of each individual to select for himself. If Mr. Rives were now to buy a house in Paris, or Mr. McLane in London, and were to lose money in the speculation, should either of these be permitted to throw the loss on his Government? No one, I presume, will contend that he ought, and yet he has exactly the same right to do it as Mr. Monroe had in 1794.

Another item of the new account, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the House, is number ten of the report of the committee, made at the last session. It will be observed that number nine is an allowance of interest "on outfit of second mission to France, from January, 1803, to May, 1810, three thousand nine hundred and fifteen dollars." The tenth item is for interest on the foregoing sum from May, 1810, to March, 1829, four thousand four hundred and twenty-three dollars and ninety-five cents. Now, sir, I have never before known any case, even between individuals, where compound interest was required to be paid, and least of all should it be required of the Government.

[Mr. MERCER explained: He said the tenth item had been struck out by the committee, and he had so stated in the remarks submitted to the House.]

Mr. W. replied, that the difficulty of hearing in the House was great, and, although he had endeavored to catch every word spoken by the gentleman, that part of his remarks had not been heard. Not doubting the fact to be as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, he [Mr. W.] would forbear to say any thing further in relation to the tenth item in the new account. For, if the committee who had reported the bill, had themselves become convinced that it was wrong to make the allowance, any thing I might be disposed to say in regard to it would certainly be superfluous.

As the other items in the new account fall generally within the range of the objections already stated, I will proceed, said Mr. W., to notice the charge made for commissions on the money borrowed during the late war. This amounted to thirty-seven thousand twenty-eight dollars and ninety-three cents ($37,028 93); and he was wholly at a loss to perceive how the Government was so benefited by the transaction as to throw upon it an obligation to pay that sum to Mr. Monroe, who, at the time, was an executive officer of the United States, and, as such, bound to exert all his influence to accomplish the objects the nation had in view. If he interposed his personal responsibility, and thereby conferred a benefit upon the country, I agree fully that Government ought to save him from any ultimate loss. But I do not understand this to have been the case: on the contrary, he has not lost a cent by the liability he assumed to obtain money, either from the banks or individuals. In that respect, he is perfectly safe and sound—free from all detriment or injury whatsoever; and I repeat that he was bound to exert all his official influence to further the objects the country had in view. With that influence the Government had clothed him, to be exerted for that particular purpose; and, if he had not done so, he would have failed to perform his duty—he would have betrayed the public confidence. But who ever thought that because he acted the part of a vigilant, faithful public functionary, he would be entitled to more compensation than the salary allowed him by law? In fact and in truth, the salary ought to have been withheld from him, if he had not exerted all his faculties, both political and physical, to advance the cause of his country—of that country which had confided in him, and promoted him to office, in order to be benefited by his entire devotion to the public interest.

The allowance made to Daniel D. Tompkins is pleaded as a precedent, but I do not think the cases are analogous, and certain I am Congress never intended by that example to sanction any such claim as the present one. To bring this subject more distinctly before the House, I must refer to the law passed in February, 1823, for the relief of Daniel D. Tompkins, and some other documents connected therewith. It will be found in the seventh volume of the Laws of the United States, page 331, and, being very short, I will read it, as follows: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to adjust and settle the claims of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York, on principles of equity and justice, subject to the revision and final decision of the President of the United States."

Now, sir, what are we to understand as the true import and meaning of a law which directs the settlement of an account upon principles of equity and justice? Such a law relates only to the proof, to the degree of evidence which shall be received at the department, and not to the claims or the items composing the account. If the party can adduce no evidence of higher dignity, he is at liberty to resort to his own oath, but he is not permitted to make any unusual, extraordinary, or unlawful demand upon the Government. Finding this to be the case, it seems resort was had by the accounting officers, or by the President, who supervised and controlled them, to the report of the committee to ascertain the true extent and meaning of the law. Whether this was right or wrong, it is not necessary now to inquire. The committee, after stating the facts, and assigning a variety of reasons, come to four distinct and separate resolutions, to the second of which I beg leave to call the attention of the House, in the following words, viz. "That it would be just and equitable to allow a reasonable commission on all moneys disbursed by him (Governor Tompkins) during the late war." The meaning of the committee in this resolution cannot be mistaken. They evidently intend, and so express it, that Governor Tompkins shall be allowed a reasonable commission on all moneys disbursed or paid out by him, and not on the moneys received or loans negotiated by him. The disbursements is one thing, and the receipts another; and it never entered into the mind of the committee to believe for one moment that Governor Tompkins had better credit, or could obtain money on more reasonable terms, than the whole nation. But it was known that he acted as a sort of paymaster general to all the troops in the State of New York; and for this kind of service, which he was capable of performing, and which he did perform, the committee intended to remunerate him by allowing a reasonable commission. The whole reasoning of the committee, and the resolutions they reported, show that this, and this only, was the idea intended to be conveyed. But what says Mr. Monroe in his message on the 28th of April, 1824, informing Congress that the accounts of Governor Tompkins had been settled? In the Journal of the House of Representatives, page 464, he says: "On the second head, that of a reasonable commission for his disbursements during the late war, I have allowed him five per cent. on the whole sum disbursed by him, amounting to ninety-two thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars and thirteen cents. I have made him this extra allowance, in consideration of the aid which he afforded to the Government at that important epoch in obtaining the loan of a considerable part of the sum thus disbursed." Here the idea of allowing a commission on money borrowed or loans obtained is introduced for the first time. It is not to be seen in the law itself, the report of the committee, or any other document I have had an opportunity to examine, except in the message of the President. It is, then, a fair inference to assert that, in making the allowance upon that principle, he entirely mistook the laws, and the extent of the authority with which he had been invested. As great as is the difference between receipts and expenditures, so widely did the President misjudge his powers, and misinterpret the designs of Congress. When, therefore, you tell me Mr. Monroe must be paid according to the rule adopted in the case of Governor Tompkins, and be allowed a commission on the loans obtained, I answer, no. The cases are not analogous. If Governor Tompkins was allowed a commission on receipts, it was because the law was misunderstood, and consequently misapplied.

But if Congress had intended to allow a reasonable commission to Governor Tompkins on the sum obtained, still it would not follow that Mr. Monroe should have the same allowance. The latter was in the cabinet: he was a high officer in the civil department of the Government, and bound to act as he did: whereas the former was not so engaged. This difference in the situation of the two persons would manifestly sanction an allowance to the one, and a rejection of the claims of the other.

I have, sir, thus concluded an examination of the several items constituting the demand against the United States; and, in no instance, have I discovered that it is well founded. On the contrary, it appears to me wholly unsupported by the laws and usages of the Government, in all analogous cases; and that to pass the bill would, in effect, be a gift or gratuity bestowed upon Mr. Monroe. Are we prepared to make a similar grant to every other individual who may be disposed to ask for it? If we are not, then I contend we should not make it to him; because that principle of equality, to which I have alluded as the essence of our whole political system, utterly forbids it. No man, or set of men, should be entitled to separate or exclusive privileges or emoluments. What is granted to one as a matter of right or of favor, should be granted to all; otherwise the course of legislation will be at war with the nature and spirit of our republican institutions. The precedent proposed to be established in this case is dangerous, and the more so, because the individual favored by it has been eminently distinguished among his fellow-citizens. It is always in behalf of such characters that pernicious examples are set. An obscure, private individual could not command influence enough to carry through this House measures which are inexpedient, impolitic, or forbidden by the genius of our system of Government. A bad or ill advised measure, in the case of distinguished persons, will always be more known, and, of course, the evil consequences resulting from it will be more widely diffused. In this respect, also, the precedent is more dangerous.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] says the eyes of the world are upon us; that we should make the appropriation to avoid the reproach which will be cast upon us if the claim be rejected. But, sir, shall we be required to abandon our principles because the eyes of the world are upon us? No; certainly not. But, on the contrary, we should, for that very reason, be the more determined to support them. Foreigners reproach us for many things: for our republican Government; for the economy with which it is administered; for the plainness and general frugality of our people. But shall we, on that account, change our Government, and establish monarchy? Shall we introduce extravagance into the administration of public affairs, or wasteful profusion of expenditure into the pursuits of private life? No doubt, foreigners would gladly see us imitating them in these respects; for then they would think we had become converts to their systems, and the example we have been professing to hold out to the world no longer dangerous to them. Whence those portentous signs—those threatening indications witnessed at this moment, throughout the European world? Is it not that the people are about to commence a struggle for their rights; that they are willing to encounter all the perils of revolution, in order to redress the wrongs and correct the evils of legislation as it has existed among them? With them, legislation has been for the benefit of the few, to the prejudice of the many; and at the moment when, by a mighty effort, they are endeavoring to arrest that evil tendency in their affairs, we are called upon to pursue the very course which has been so disastrous to them. Is it wise that we, at this critical juncture in the affairs of the world, should hold out such a lesson—such a practical exemplification of our doctrines—to the view of mankind? Will not the advocates of free Government be disheartened by it, rather than strengthened in their faith, and stimulated to further efforts in the great cause of human liberty which they have undertaken to support? Pass this bill, and, my word for it, our beautiful theories, of which we have boasted so much, will be regarded as a vain delusion; the precepts we have inculcated, as so much idle profession, intended to deceive and mislead others, while we ourselves are unwilling to practise them. The world will see through this disguise, and we must expect to meet the odium it will occasion. No, sir, let us pursue a different course—let us act up to the letter and spirit of our professions—let our example go forth to the world in all purity and perfection—unimpaired by any act of insincerity on our part. Then we may expect it to be regarded by others, and to have that influence upon them which may be necessary to support the great cause of free and equal Government.

It has been said, Mr. Monroe is now in reduced or embarrassed circumstances. If this be so, it is much to be regretted: but whose fault is it? Are we not equally bound to provide for any other one whose circumstances are similarly embarrassed? On this principle, there would be demands enough against the treasury, at every session, to exhaust the whole revenue of the country? Instead of transacting the business of the people whom we represent; instead of looking to the great interests of the nation, as they may happen to be affected by questions growing out of our foreign intercourse or views of domestic policy, we should be exclusively devoted to the consideration of private demands, made not upon the justice, but the charitable feelings of Congress. The extent and pressure of these demands would be so great in a little time, that they could not be met by the ordinary revenue of the Government; and new taxes or burdens upon the people must necessarily be imposed. It is obvious that continuance in such a course would be impracticable—nay, sir, impossible. What, therefore, cannot be pursued or followed out to the end, should never be commenced.

But I am unwilling to admit, for one moment, that any citizen, situated as Mr. Monroe has always been, should be at liberty to demand from the Government any further compensation. Every one who takes an office is presumed to know the salary attached to it. The Government promises him the salary, and nothing more; and when he enters upon the discharge of his duty, it must be supposed he is satisfied with the assurance thus given. Let him, then, be content with this salary, and regulate his expenditures accordingly. It is our policy to allow moderate but sufficient salaries, in order to preserve those habits of frugality which should characterize every republican people. The pomp, and splendor, and folly of European courts should not be attempted by any officer in this nation; and, if his disposition will not restrain him, the limited amount of his salary should do it. But, pass this bill, and what will be the consequence? In effect you proclaim to the world that every officer is at liberty to expend just as much as he pleases; that his habits of waste and extravagance, if he has any, need not be corrected; that if, by improvidence in his past life, he should become indigent or embarrassed in his old age, Government will sustain and support him. Such must be the calculation of every one who takes an office, and has a disposition to expend more money than the salary allowed by law. The country has granted to Mr. Monroe all the honors and emoluments which could be bestowed upon him. He has sought every thing, and has in fact obtained every thing. I, then, cannot admit, that, after he has been thus gratified with every thing he desired; after he has been advanced to every station of trust and profit which could be conferred upon him, he should be allowed to turn upon us again, and say, you have not yet done enough for me: you have not paid me as much as I ought to have had. He knew the salary attached to every office he has filled; and at this late day he should not be permitted to plead that it was not enough; that he is entitled to additional compensation—in other words, to institute an action of damages against the Government on account of the favors which the Government has bestowed upon him. Although he may be embarrassed, still I think it may be asserted that he is better provided for than ninety-nine out of a hundred of the constituents of every member on this floor; and there is not the least danger he will ever want any of the necessities or luxuries of life.

Mr. W. concluded, by saying, if any thing had fallen from him calculated to wound the feelings of the friends of Mr. Monroe, he begged them to be assured he did not design his remarks to have that effect. It was altogether foreign from his purpose to excite the feelings of any gentleman, in discussing this delicate question. He had spoken with no more freedom than the case required; and so much as the case required, he should always feel bound to use.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, followed. He said, Mr. Monroe, in his communication addressed to us, this session, in his last appeal to Congress, says, "I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, in regard to my claims, I ask no indulgence or favor; that I ask nothing which is not strictly due to me, on sound principles, and which my country shall, on full consideration and unquestionable evidence, think that it owes it to itself to allow me." He closes that communication, and takes his leave of us, in similar language—"In the decision on my claims, (says he,) I repeat that I ask no favor or indulgence; that I ask nothing but what shall appear to be strictly due to me, on sound principles, on full consideration, and unquestionable evidence, the withholding of which for so long a time has subjected me to pains and troubles which may readily be conceived." Does, then, Mr. Monroe come before this House different from other claimants? And shall not his claims receive the same respectful consideration, candid examination, we are in the daily practice of giving to every other man's? That he asks no more, we have his written declaration; whether this is to be denied him, is the question to be settled.

I did hope, Mr. Chairman, and I did expect, before I witnessed the course of this debate, that, as Mr. Monroe asked no more than was accorded to every one who knocked at our door, what was asked would be given; that as he expected no favors from a long and faithful discharge of public services, and the important stations filled, that because he had rendered those services, and filled those stations, in considering a claim that he had preferred against the Government of his country, they would not be referred to for the purpose of prejudicing that claim. Our fears to do wrong should not so operate as to cause us not to do what we may know to be right. But, sir, it is with regret I say, the tendency of the acts of gentlemen who have participated in this debate, (I impugn the motives and intentions of no one,) has been such as to deny to Mr. Monroe that hearing to which no one in his place here would dare to say there was a man in this nation not entitled. The amount of money he has received from the public treasury has been mentioned, and we have been told that he has been for a long time in the employ of the Government of the United States, longer than any other man. For the argument, be it so. If he was at the head of one of the departments for six years, did he receive as a compensation for his services more than was allowed by law? If he was President eight years, was he paid more than his predecessors, Madison, Jefferson, or Washington? If he was twice Governor of Virginia, was he not paid as the other Governors of that State had been? If, in our revolutionary struggle, young as he then was, he fought our battles, and moistened the soil of New Jersey with his blood, did he then receive, or has he since claimed, more than what was allowed to others of the same grade? Sir, what do these arguments lead us to? If the Government of the United States contract with one of its most distinguished citizens for the performance of certain acts, the compensation for which is by law regulated, and the contract in all its parts has been complied with, and the money paid, and there is afterwards between the same parties another contract for other services, a compliance with the terms of the first, according to the declaration of gentlemen, (I will not say argument,) is a full discharge of the second. This is the effect of their reasoning; it has nothing to do with the question now before this committee. No man, Mr. Chairman, has heretofore thought that, because by his meritorious services, great experience, and superior qualifications, he had, in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, some claim for important trusts, that claim, in regard to his other rights, should operate against him; but this is the measure of justice to Mr. Monroe. If gentlemen be disposed to do what they have professed a willingness to do, why have they resorted to such remarks? The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has just resumed his seat, has reminded the committee of what a late Governor of Virginia (Mr. Giles) has said of Mr. Monroe, in regard to the amount of money he has received from the public, and, in telling us one thing that gentleman said, has, no doubt, whether he so intended or not, reminded every member of this committee of another thing that Governor Giles said of Mr. Monroe, that he had always been a public pauper, and that the United States must, as they always had, continue to support him. What is the effect of this but to enlist the prejudices of every devoted friend of the late Governor of Virginia against the claim of James Monroe? This does not agree with the professions of the gentleman from North Carolina, made when he commenced his remarks, and is hardly excused by his apology, made when he concluded them. His greatest apprehension at first appeared to be that Mr. Monroe's claim would be more favorably considered than other men's, from the great services he had rendered, and high offices he had filled: when relieved of that, I submit it to that gentleman whether it was fair, or just, or comports with his ideas of what is correct, by any allusion of his, to awaken prejudices that will deprive Mr. Monroe's claim of that consideration we are bound to give every man's in the nation.

We are not now called on to pass upon the bickerings of two men, one now in the grave, and the other upon the brink of it; in other ages and other times, justice will be done, as I hope, to both, when the passions of the moment shall have subsided, and when we, too, who may now have our prejudices and personal predilections, shall be gathered to our fathers. Then, perhaps, some men's reputation and fame will not depend upon what they might have said against the purity of James Monroe's character, but upon their being born in the same State, and living in the same age with him.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other objections to this claim, which ought to be considered by some one, before the merits of it are examined, as well from their peculiar character, as the quarter from which they come. I must confess I was surprised to hear such objections from such a source; from men who, to do them justice, I ought to say, for the last ten or twelve years have watched the treasury with Argus eyes, but men, from my knowledge of them, I did suppose were not willing to arraign, without good cause, the motives or conduct of others. Sir, I heard with regret the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLESLEY] say, that because we had received from the citizens of Albemarle county, Virginia, the county in which Mr. Monroe was born, and from the citizens of the city of New York, where Mr. Monroe now is, petitions urging upon us the necessity of considering and examining his claim, and nothing more, that those citizens were Mr. Monroe's creditors, and were consequently actuated by sinister motives. Sir, this must have been said without much reflection: it was well enough for the gentleman, because he opposed this claim in 1826, to oppose it now; but he ought at least, more especially as he had no proof to the contrary, to have had charity enough to have believed that the citizens of Albemarle and of New York might have been actuated by motives different from those which he has thought proper to ascribe to them. He might have supposed that it was known to them, Mr. Monroe had, as he thought, a claim, an honest and legal claim, upon the United States, and all he wanted was a fair, dispassionate, and legal investigation of this claim; and, when he had satisfied himself of this, he might, without any great tax upon his own mind, suppose that the citizens of Albemarle, who know Mr. Monroe best, because they have known him the longest, and have been more closely connected with him than any other portion of this country, the citizens of New York, who know what Mr. Monroe now is in regard to his pecuniary concerns, from seeing him with them, and by this are also reminded of what he once was, might, without being influenced by such motives as the gentleman has ascribed to them, have sent to us the petitions which are now on the files of the House in his behalf.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio is warranted in his supposition from what he would call testimony, upon what ground do we stand, who may differ from that gentleman on the merits of this claim? Under what imputation does a majority of both Houses lie, who, in 1826, voted for what was then allowed Mr. Monroe? The same insinuations which have been made against the citizens of Albemarle and New York, (and there are the same grounds for them,) can be made against us.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio, from further reflection, will conclude that what he has said was gratuitous, uncalled for, and, by evidence before us, unwarranted. We are required to meet another objection made by the gentleman from Ohio, presented as a legal one. By the act of 1826-'7, Mr. Monroe is to be paid the sum of money by that act granted, in full of all his claims against the United States; and because in the passing of that act, in reference to the phraseology of which Mr. Monroe said nothing, and could not say, any thing, because he knew nothing, Congress thought proper to use the language now in use, in reference to all our enactments in regard to claims, "in full satisfaction and discharge of all the claims of James Monroe against the United States," whether it were so or not, he is thereby precluded the right to present the claim now before us. Sir, to every bargain, contract, or agreement; to every lease, relinquishment, or release, I have always been taught to believe there must be at least two parties—one to give or execute, and the other to take or receive, in pursuance of terms previously arranged and agreed on. When did Mr. Monroe, or any one acting in his behalf, any friend of his, say for him, that appropriation for his benefit at the time mentioned should be a full and complete liquidation of his claim? At no time, never—so far from this being the case, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERRICK,] under whose paternal charge the claim of Mr. Monroe then was, as it now is, declared to the House, that so far from the sum then appropriated being in full discharge of Mr. Monroe's claim, so great, as he supposed, would be his dissatisfaction, that he did not believe he would take what was allowed him: he did take it, but not at any time with an acknowledgment that it was in full satisfaction of his claim—all his acts, all the acts of his friends, from that time to this, showed that the amount appropriated was not to his and their minds a satisfaction of his claim. At the next session, his friends from Albemarle petitioned us in his behalf, for the balance; and this petition, if not gotten up at his instance, (I do not believe it was,) it is fair to presume was not presented against his will. Sir, from that time to this, there has been a petition before us in favor of James Monroe. Does this look like a relinquishment of what he considered was fairly due him, and what he was legally entitled to? No, it cannot be so pretended—I was an eyewitness of the mode in which we legislated upon the claim in 1826-7: the report of the select committee was made at a very late period of the session, and the bill did not come before us until our night sessions had commenced, favorable to any thing but sober deliberation.

At the close of the session, and in the hurry of the moment, the friends of the bill were willing to take any sum rather than continue the whole question to the next session; and I take upon myself to say that, in relation to the amount to be appropriated, there was not a full, or even a deliberate discussion. This claim is not, then, Mr. Chairman, as one gentleman [Mr. CURTIS] has charitably asserted, an afterthought on the part of Mr. Monroe, or any of his friends; nor has the money received been a waiver of what he conceived heretofore, and now alleges to be due him. I therefore submit to the committee, whether there is any good ground for the objection founded upon the appropriation made to Mr. Monroe, as constituting a barrier to the present application; and whether this is an application to indemnify Mr. Monroe for moneys expended in feasting his friends. I will fully consider that, when I come more directly to the merits of this claim. There is one objection more, however, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, which I might as well consider now as at any other time—an objection that applies just as well to any other claim as this; if good in this case, equally so in any other. Why should we, says the gentleman, pay Mr. Monroe, when there are others who have claims upon us we do not pay; the war-worn veteran, the soldier of the revolution? If, sir, this argument is to obtain, we never can pay any one, because we cannot or may not be disposed to pay all at the same time. When the case of the soldier of the revolution is called, we cannot act upon that, because Mr. Monroe has a claim that is not satisfied: we cannot pay Mr. Monroe, because the soldier and others have not been paid.

I believe the gentleman will do me the justice to say that I have gone as far as any one, certainly as far as he has gone, in satisfying what I deemed to be the rightful claims of all the officers and soldiers of the revolution, whose cases have been before us. The gentleman's argument has been one, too, common with all those that have objections to paying any one. Another objection has been made, which claims a moment's consideration; and this, from the lapse of time since the items accrued, this would be tenable, if unexplained, not repelled by facts and circumstances which gentlemen might have acquainted themselves with, if they had read the communication of Mr. Monroe, or attended to the report of the committee. To my mind, sir, satisfactory reasons are given why attempts have not been made to enforce it before. Called from his first mission, under peculiar circumstances, he had, in the first place, to vindicate his character and reputation as a public man, more dear to him than money; and while he was doing that, he was willing the Government should pay his agent what at that time might be in their own opinion due, rather than cavil with them about it: he, however, gave no discharge, nor authorized any one to be given in his name. He was soon called to the office of Chief Magistrate of Virginia, and had hardly served his constitutional term, before he was called to his second mission. So soon as that was ended, he was again called by the citizens of his native State to the same office from which he was transferred to the departments here, which he left for the office of President of the United States, in which he remained eight years.

He was in public life, with a very small interruption, from the time he was called to his first mission to the end of his Presidential term. After his successor was chosen, then he made out and afterwards presented this claim now under consideration, anterior to which there was no period in which he could with propriety have done it.

Sir, the relative situation of Mr. Monroe furnishes a reply to the objection, and removes the presumption of payment from length of time.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, replied to most of the objections brought against this claim by gentlemen who are opposed to any allowance whatsoever; others will be considered in the examination more directly of the merits of the claim itself. I am sensible I have already trespassed somewhat upon the patience of the committee, but they will bear in mind that I was the first who obtained the floor after these objections were made; and, as a friend of the bill, it was as much my duty to meet them, as it would be any gentleman's on the same side of the question who might succeed me.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] who presented this claim with so much clearness, and urged its adoption with so much zeal and eloquence, certainly did not anticipate these objections; and, if he had, it would not have been his province to reply to them. One word as to the effect of the pending motion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CURTIS] no doubt thinks there is nothing due James Monroe; but ought he not to have supposed there might be some gentlemen on this floor who might think there was some part of the claim which ought to be paid, though not the whole of it? If his motion prevails, those gentlemen will be debarred the right of moving for the lesser sum, when in their consciences they believe there is something due. Is this the motion, then, which, at this stage of the inquiry and investigation, ought to be made? I think not.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to a consideration of those items which constitute Mr. Monroe's claim, and will state them as I understand them, before I read them from the committee's report. First, a claim for contingent expenses during his first mission to France, with interest; a claim for allowances after his recall, during his detention in Europe, before he could embark for this country; interest upon the money which he was compelled to hire, in consequence of his outfit not being paid before he sailed from this country; an additional allowance for contingent expenses while in England; losses sustained in the purchase of a house in Paris; money disbursed to, and expenses incurred to effect the liberation of Thomas Paine; and commissions on loans of money to the Government of the United States, obtained by extraordinary exertions and by his personal credit during the late war. These are the principal items of his claim.

As Mr. Monroe's first mission was attended with peculiar circumstances, and at a critical period in the history of France, we must for a moment advert to the situation of that country, to show that his services were extraordinary, his expenses necessarily great, and that no allowance to any minister before, or any similar claim since that period, could form a just criterion by which we can judge of the sum which ought to be paid to him. The French revolution was just over; the nations of Europe were combined to crush the French nation, and they had to fight their battles against a world in arms. The operation of their edicts and decrees had brought within their grasp millions of property belonging to the United States, and incarcerated thousands of our citizens. As many who were not imprisoned, were anxiously waiting the fate of their property, then under seizure, there was not in France at that time any consular power established, to release from their confinement our citizens; to claim and effect a release of their property: to assert, and by argument enforce the rights of the United States, required no ordinary talents, no common share of zeal and perseverance, and was consequently the cause of extra expense. Three secretaries were employed by him for a great length of time, houses were rented for their accommodation, and heavy expenses were incurred on their account. Was this necessary? There is not a man who hears me, who will say it was not. For whose benefit? For the people of the United States—for American citizens. Can it be expected that Mr. Monroe, or any other man, situated as he was, could exhibit vouchers for all the expenses which he was compelled to incur on our account, under such an extraordinary state of things?

Sir, I am not surprised that he has a claim for an additional allowance for contingent expenses, but am surprised that it should be no larger than the one presented. The gentleman from North Carolina asks for vouchers. The very nature of the service forbids the production of them. In many of the common and ordinary transactions of life, they are not expected. Are they produced in settling the concerns between ships-husband or owner, and the master, as to many expenses and disbursements between the principal, his factor or agent? No: the gentleman knows they are neither produced nor expected.

[Here Mr. WILLIAMS rose, and said, what he meant by vouchers, was a detailed statement.]

In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I could say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that it would be just as difficult to produce, and just as unreasonable to expect, this detailed statement, as the vouchers which have been called for. Sir, these contingent expenses are paid to no minister, under any ordinary state of affairs, in consequence of the production of vouchers.

Mr. Chairman, there are some things probable in themselves, and do not require a very great share of proof direct, to command our belief; and there are others in themselves so improbable, we cannot well believe them, when fortified by proofs the most positive. That Mr. Monroe's expenses should have been, during his first mission to France, while at Paris, greater, by the amount stated, than ministers on ordinary occasions, is not only highly probable, but is proved positively by the statements of Mr. Skipworth, Mr. Gelson, and all the other testimony in the case. I could, if it were necessary, take another ground: If Mr. Monroe did not know that the allowance claimed was not only equitable, but legal, would he, is there a man living who has any knowledge of the character of James Monroe, who can for one minute believe that he would, in his old age, in private life, having filled so many offices, having discharged the duties of them with so much honor to himself and credit to the country, thus persevere in a claim that was not absolutely just? He has the feelings of a man, and knows full well the ordeal every one has to pass through, who applies to Congress for the settlement of an account; and, when he came before us, no doubt knew that he would necessarily be subjected to the scoffs and sneers of many whose province it would be to pass upon his claim; perhaps anticipated what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky, that he was calling on Congress to pay him for feasting his friends in Paris.

With this knowledge of consequences, would this claim have been the second time before us, if it were not in all respects just and equitable? I am satisfied it would not. Well, sir, if money be due, and it has been withheld, is not interest due as well as principal? But the gentleman from North Carolina informs us that the United States are to be viewed as a moral person, always presumed to be ready to pay what he owes whenever called on—a presumption not warranted by facts—and that consequently no interest is to be allowed on claims against the United States. As this moral person is sometimes guilty of immoral acts, I cannot subscribe to the gentleman's doctrine: he will not say that interest has never been allowed on claims against the United States—look into our statutes, and you can find more than fifty cases in which it has been allowed. If there ever has been any rule on the subject, it has been to suffer each case to depend upon its peculiar circumstances and merits. But why waste time on this question? Interest was allowed on so much of the claim of Mr. Monroe as was sanctioned by Congress in 1826; and our legislation at that time relieves me of some labor in the further investigation of this claim. In 1826, Congress allowed interest on so much of Mr. Monroe's claim as was at that time favorably considered, from 1810 to 1826; their decision is to be at this time respected, or not—if not, then the whole question is now before us; but if, on the other hand, what we have done should influence and direct us in what we are to do, having allowed interest from 1810 to 1826, it appears to me we cannot resist the allowance of interest from the time the claim accrued to 1810. If for one period it be correct, it is equally so for the other. I dismiss, then, this part of the claim. That Mr. Monroe was entitled to an outfit on his mission to France, and that it was not paid until some years after it was due, all will acknowledge: that if, in consequence of its not being paid, he was compelled to hire money in amount equal to that for which he paid interest, to me it is evident that he should be allowed this interest; and it would be no more than indemnity to pay him interest on the sum he paid for interest.

His contingent expenses during his mission to England constituting another item of claim, he takes Mr. King's allowance as a standard for his own; and when it is considered, as the committee have observed, that Mr. Monroe was in England when Europe was at war, when the decrees and edicts of the belligerents were the causes of the seizures and sequestration of our property to vast amounts, and Mr. King's mission was during a period of peace, the standard assumed cannot afford more than a fair allowance. It is not necessary to repeat what has been said of interest, so far as it may be connected with this part of the claim. Nor will I detain the committee but a moment in considering that part of the claim which under the first mission to France accrued after audience of leave, and during his detention in Europe—to leave Europe after he had received notice of his recall, was impossible. The French coast being blockaded, he had no opportunity of doing it—to have continued in France, might have increased in his own country the prejudices against him; and to have left Europe, and embarked for the United States, if an opportunity had offered, as his successor was not accredited, and no communications, but through him, could at that time be received, might have been injudicious. This expense accruing under circumstances which he could not control, the Government in good faith were bound to pay, and interest on so much as has not been paid, according to principles assumed in the allowance of interest on the other items already noticed. Reserving to myself the right of making a few remarks on that part of Mr. Monroe's claim connected with the purchase and sale of the house in Paris, the liberation of Thomas Paine, and money expended on his account, the loans negotiated, I submit the residue of the claim as reported by the select committee as proper to be by us accepted, allowed, and paid, and what will be short of an indemnity for the services rendered, and moneys in good faith expended on account of the United States.

Before we come to a conclusion on the question of indemnity for the loss sustained in the purchase and sale of the house in Paris, let us ask, for whose good did Mr. Monroe act in this transaction? for himself, or for his country? Did he act in good faith? and had he a reasonable expectation the house would be taken by his Government for the residence of future ministers of the United States? Sir, in relation to this transaction, he did not act unadvisedly; he availed himself of the opinions of the most distinguished and enlightened Americans then at Paris; among others, the two gentlemen whose statements are in the documents of the case. From all the lights he could derive, he found the purchase necessary, not only to increase his influence with those in power, but to establish upon a firm basis the favors and esteem conciliated, by means of which he could act, and did act, more efficiently for the American interest than any one could or did anticipate; so much so, as to excite not only the envy, but, in fact, the jealousy of the citizens of his native country. For whose benefit was this influence exercised? For his country. Shall, then, Mr. Monroe bear this loss? Mr. Chairman, he was not without a precedent. The purchase of the house at the Hague was a case in point. What his Government had done for another minister abroad, acting in good faith, he had a right to suppose would be done in regard to this transaction. But he was suddenly and unexpectedly recalled; he had no time to offer the purchase to his own Government, or sell the estate on favorable terms to any one in Paris. The whole of this loss has fallen on Mr. Monroe, and was partly occasioned by the acts of our Government, the result of an unwarrantable jealousy, founded upon nothing in fact but his great influence at the time with the French nation, never exercised but for his country's good. I do not believe the people of this country are ready to say that he shall bear this loss. The next consideration for the committee is the claim for moneys disbursed for the liberation and aid of Thomas Paine. Mr. Monroe was in France, the representative of the sovereignty of this country: Paine was in prison, had been repeatedly threatened with the guillotine; had once escaped it, according to his own statement, by a providential act; his health destroyed, and his privations and sufferings so severe, that his life was in imminent danger. What was his language and appeal to Mr. Monroe? I am an American—I am a citizen of the United States; I conjure you by the love you bear to that country, whose citizen I am, and to establish whose liberties we both for years have labored—help, extend to me your aid, or I die! Sir, if Thomas Paine had been before unknown to Mr. Monroe, this thrilling and spirit-stirring language could be neither resisted nor disregarded. The magic words, “I am a Roman citizen,” in the worst days of Rome, preserved the rights of the individual inviolable, and arrested the arm of him who was prepared to inflict the stripes. Mr. Monroe has been allowed what he paid in effecting the liberation of Madame Lafayette, why should he not be paid his expenses incurred in the liberation of Thomas Paine! Let not the consideration of this question be mingled with the feelings of the day. Whether Mr. Paine was, during our revolutionary struggle, the hireling writer, as has been alleged, or whether his writings on religious subjects have not been the cause of much harm to the world, is not now the question for us to consider; was not, at the time, this appeal a subject of consideration for Mr. Monroe? Ought Mr. Monroe, as our minister abroad, to have done less? and shall he not be countenanced by this Government, and paid for what by him was done? Sir, it would have been an everlasting stain upon this country, if Thomas Paine, an American, had been suffered to die in prison, in that city where the representative of this nation was, without an effort to relieve him. Such was the estimation in which Thomas Paine was held by Mr. Jefferson, if the rumors of the day are to be credited, that long after his liberation he received his aid and support.

The last subject reserved for consideration is, the claim of Mr. Monroe, on account of loans negotiated during the late war, obtained by extraordinary exertions on his part, and by his personal responsibility. In reference to them, nothing is claimed by him but what, by the uniform practice of the Government, has been given to others; and, if obtained by extraordinary exertions, and this is conceded, why should he not be paid? Is he not as much entitled to compensation as your disbursing officers, who obtained nothing upon their mere responsibility, and nothing by any extra exertion? Compare the claim with the commissions received by Commodore Chauncey, the commander on your lakes, when the war raged among the ship carpenters at Sackett's Harbor and Kingston, for the supremacy of Lake Ontario, when little was achieved by either party on the water. Millions were disbursed, and passed through the hands of that officer, on all of which he had his commissions.

Take another case, when, if commissions were not allowed, they ought to have been. Such was the state of our finances, after the Constitution returned from the capture and destruction of the Guerriere, to the harbor of Boston, the navy agent, with all the available funds the Government could place in his hands, was unable to send her on another cruise. To do this, he pledged the whole of his private property, and became personally responsible for the necessary sum. What was the result? Another naval victory, and fresh laurels to the American arms. Part of these loans, effected by Mr. Monroe, were absolutely necessary to sustain your army, and embody the military forces at New Orleans, without which, victory would not have perched upon our standard; and he who is now at the head of the nation, would have been upon his farm in Tennessee.

Sir, the gentleman from North Carolina is mistaken in saying no individual could sustain the credit of this nation. It was done in the two cases referred to, at a time when Government paper was passing at a discount of thirty-three per cent. I speak from what I saw, and well recollect, at a time when some of our public agents, who had been fattening on the spoils of the Government, had so little confidence in its solvency, that when treasury notes passed through their hands, and it was necessary to endorse them, you would find upon them a special endorsement in these words: "Pay to A B, or order, without recourse, in any event, to me as endorser."

The services of Mr. Monroe, during a period of the late war, were greater and more arduous than any man's in this or any country. The world is unacquainted with them. He was the head and soul of the nation; oppressed and worn down by the weight of these services, he came near sinking into his grave—superintending and discharging the duties of three departments—State, Treasury, and War. To effect these outdoor loans, so they may be called, was not, could not, be required of him. Listen to the testimony of a living witness known to us all, Mr. Ringgold, and who, from his situation, could best speak of the services of James Monroe:

"On the 5th of September, 1814, Mr. Monroe appointed George Graham, Esq., Major Robert H. Macpherson, and myself, his confidential clerks, and made his own house our office. At this period, Baltimore, Richmond, Philadelphia, and New York, were menaced by the enemy with attacks; and large bodies of the militia and regular army were stationed at each of these cities. Lines of videttes, who brought us information every two hours, were stationed on the Baltimore and Richmond roads. A company of these videttes, under the command of Captain Taylor, of Virginia, were stationed in the western market-house, in front of Mr. Monroe's dwelling. He slept for three weeks on an uncomfortable couch, and made it my duty to receive the despatches which were received from the cities which were threatened with attacks. It was also made my duty to wake up Mr. Monroe whenever a vidette arrived at night with despatches; and I was often obliged to do so six times during the night. The despatches were regularly answered, and videttes sent off before he retired to bed.

From the day Mr. Monroe accepted the office of Secretary of War, to the end of the war, we had no office hours: we worked day and night, Sundays not excepted. Our usual time of shutting up the office, and leaving Mr. Monroe, was from 12 to 1 o'clock at night. In January, 1815, on an occasion of this sort, and after a day of incessant labor, Mr. Monroe, at 12 o'clock A. M., observed to us, that it was time to take some rest: in turning round to pull off his boots, he tumbled on the floor, exhausted with fatigue, and apparently lifeless: Mr. Graham being near, luckily caught him in his arms. He remained for two weeks dangerously ill, and unable either to know or to attend to business. The department was conducted during this time by Major Macpherson, Mr. Graham, and myself, under the directions of the President, who was also confined by severe indisposition. The moment Mr. Monroe was restored to his senses, and had strength to dictate his instructions, we were summoned to his sick room, and were engaged daily in transcribing the communications which he had to make to all sections of the United States. For many days he was propped up in his bed by pillows, to write his despatches.

"TENCH RINGGOLD.

"WASHINGTON, February 2, 1829.

"Sworn to, before me, on this 2d day of February, A. D. 1820.

"JOSEPH STORY,

"One of the Justices of the Sup. Court U. S."

We are told, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Monroe has sought all the offices he ever filled, and that he ought to be bound by his contract. Unfortunately for the gentleman from North Carolina, in this also he is mistaken, and contradicted by Mr. Monroe's communication to this House, and Mr. Jefferson's letter of 13th January, 1803, informing him of his appointment to his second mission to France. I will read but a few lines of that letter.

"I am sensible, after the measures you have taken for getting into a different line of business, that it will be a great sacrifice on your part, and presents, from the season, and other circumstances, serious difficulties. But some men are born for the public. Nature, by fitting them for the service of the human race, on a broad scale, has stamped them with the evidences of her destination, and their duty."

But Mr. Monroe has sounded all the depths and shoals of honor, (not the gentleman's language, but the idea conveyed by him,) and he must consequently be satisfied with the compensation received. A new mode to satisfy a claim for money. This argument I have, in the commencement of my remarks, replied to.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] has referred us to the declaration of one Governor of Virginia, permit me to refer him to the declaration of another Governor of that State, [Mr. FLEMING] made in this House when the Vice President threw himself upon us, and requested an investigation of his conduct—"The respect we entertain for our public men, constitutes the reputation of our country; and, without respect from us, none can be claimed for them abroad at this time, said he, such is the situation of Europe, and the world, as to make it necessary for us to respect our national character, made up and formed by our distinguished men."

Sir, this is not the time for us to underrate the services of our distinguished men, or ascribe to them unworthy motives; and the gentleman from North Carolina may rest assured, that if we only pay them, I say nothing of rewarding them for their services, we shall not expect the consequences of certain acts in France of which he has given us such a vivid picture; I should sooner expect them from a different course of policy. The people of this country are too well acquainted with the services of James Monroe to suffer him to beg his daily bread from door to door—the consequences of our withholding the payment of a just and equitable claim.

What has rendered the last fifty years more illustrious than any period of the world, since the commencement of time? It is the age of Chatham, Burke, Fox, Wellington, and Napoleon.

It is the age of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Adams, and other distinguished men in our country. What may not be said in favor of Virginia, with such sons as she has produced? You cannot fill by praise the measure of her glory. What would be said of her without these sons? She would not be conspicuous for any one thing; not for her commerce, her navigation, manufactures, agriculture, roads, or canals. Sir, death itself does not terminate the usefulness of such men as James Monroe; "from their tomb they will hold a torch to cheer and enlighten the world; their example will animate posterity; and should faction tear, or invasion approach our country, their spirits will descend from divinity, and inspire tranquillity and courage."

Let us beware how we tamper with their reputations, or sport with their rights.

"What constitutes a State?

"Not bays, and broad armed ports,

"Not stars, and spangled courts,

"These constitute a State."

One of these is James Monroe, a citizen of Virginia.

The committee then rose, and reported progress.

Mr. MERCER gave notice that he should, on Monday, ask the House to resume the consideration of the subject. And then the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, to which had been referred a resolution, offered by Mr. CHILTON, some days since, relative to the pay of members of Congress, reported the following joint resolution; which was read, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, &c. That the rules of each House shall be so amended as to make it the imperative duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, to ascertain at the end of every session of Congress, from each Senator, Member, or Delegate from a Territory, the number of days which he may have been absent from, and not in attendance on the business of the House; and, in settling the accounts of Senators, Members, and Delegates, there shall be deducted from the account or amount of pay for each session at the rate of eight dollars per day for every day any member of the House or delegate shall have been absent, except by order of the House to which he belongs, in consequence of sickness.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. TREZVANT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to reduce the existing duties on imported goods, to take effect after the payment of the public debt, so as to raise a revenue adequate to the support of the Government under an economical administration of its affairs.

Mr. CONDUCT demanded the question of consideration; and

Mr. TREZVANT called for the yeas and nays on the question.

They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows:

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

ARMORY ON THE WESTERN WATERS.

On motion of Mr. DRAYTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, and took up the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to select the site for a National Armory upon the Western waters, and, for that purpose, to cause such surveys to be made as he may deem necessary.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, after such a selection shall have been made, the sum of dollars be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of the said survey, and for commencing the erection of the necessary buildings."

Mr. DRAYTON (chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs) said that the bill did not propose the immediate erection of an armory in the western section of the country, but authorized the President of the United States to select a site for such a work. Objections might be made to the proposed selection; yet, when gentlemen reflected that the armories now existing were all on the eastern side of the Alleghany mountains, he was of opinion their objections would cease. In all that vast tract of country west of the mountains, there was no manufactory for the public arms of the United States; and when the circumstances attending the last war were taken into consideration, gentlemen must see the necessity for passing the present bill. In case of another war, it would be found absolutely necessary to have an establishment of the kind proposed in that quarter of the Union, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he felt much obliged to the chairman of the Military Committee, and to the committee itself, for reporting the bill now under consideration. The first proposition for the establishment of an armory on the Western waters, was made several years ago. The Executive Government of the country had never been opposed to the measure, and its utility was agreed on all hands. But the works had never been commenced, because the members of the House could not agree upon a suitable site. Each gentleman had a preference for his own district; and a want of unanimity as to the best site had alone prevented the action of the House on the subject. He had been constant in his attempts to have the measure carried into execution, and he was free to confess his belief that his district was the most central, and in that district was to be found the best position for the contemplated work. He saw no prospect, however, of Congress ever determining upon a suitable site, and, therefore, he was willing to trust to the Executive the selection of a site—not doubting that, after a careful survey, the distinguished individual at the head of the Government would fix upon a suitable one. He was of opinion the House would never make the selection—the work was absolutely necessary—and he was willing to take the best course he could to ensure the erection of an armory in the Western country.

Mr. MCCOY thought that whatever propriety there was in the measure proposed, there was no necessity to make an appropriation for a survey. Some years since, an appropriation had been made for surveys to enable the Executive to fix upon a site. After much time spent in making surveys of the most prominent points of the Western country, Pittsburg had been fixed on as the most desirable site, and the operations at the proposed armory were to be effected by steam. After all the information that had been acquired by the commissioners who made the surveys referred to, (and they had examined every practicable site,) he was of opinion that another survey was not necessary, and hence there was no need of another appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. CHILTON said, that such was the regard which he cherished for the opinions and wishes of his honorable friend and colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that it was always to him a source of unfeigned regret to feel himself bound to stand in opposition to either. But as he and that gentleman represented distinct districts, each of which had hitherto been urging their humble claims to a participation in the bounty of the Government—and that, too, in immediate reference to the object contemplated by the bill under consideration, he hoped he should be pardoned by the House for submitting a few remarks. That it is expedient, said Mr. C., to locate an armory west of the Alleghany mountains, will not, I presume, be denied by any member upon this floor; nor can any one more sincerely or ardently desire it than myself. I have always advocated the proposition, when brought before this House, as I conceived, in a proper shape. I should do the same now, if that were the case. But the abstract question of expediency is not the only question presented by this bill; it embraces other provisions, for which I cannot vote, until I lose sight of the interests of my immediate constituents; inasmuch as, in my judgment, they are pregnant with mischief and danger. Before I pass on, however, to speak more particularly of the defects of the bill, and the dangers to be apprehended from it in the event of its passage, I will make a single remark, to show the importance of establishing an armory on the Western waters. If, said Mr. C., the Western frontier were invaded, so remotely is our population situated from either the armory at Harper's ferry, or that at Springfield, that before our forces could be supplied with arms for its defence, the desolating hand of war would, in all human probability, cause our brightest prospects to wither in its grasp; while, on the other hand, speedily supplied with the implements of war from a manufactory within our own borders, we should be able to meet and repel the invader at his onset.

But I have said, and I repeat it, though I trust with respectful deference for the opinions of gentlemen who may differ with me in opinion, that the bill is defective—that the principles which it contains are dangerous—and that, unless it be amended, it should be rejected. It is impolitic, inasmuch as it appropriates the sum of $75,000 from the treasury, for the purpose of enabling the Executive to make new surveys, or rather to have it done by a set of engineers who are to be pensioned gallopers over the country; touching at every point, though minutely examining none—and, in the end, returning with less accurate knowledge than that with which they set out: for seldom, indeed, is either the President or Congress the wiser for all their geographical flummery. I think, sir, that enough has already been appropriated and expended in making surveys, to satisfy us that surveying is becoming a trade, better calculated to advance the individual interests of those engaged in it than the prosperity of the nation. The impolicy of multiplied appropriations for improvements in the West must obviously appear from another circumstance. It is, that we have it from the highest authority that the payment of the public debt will be greatly endangered, should money be disbursed for such improvements as lose their national character from the mere circumstance that they begin and end in a State.

But, said Mr. C., I will now advert to the dangers to be apprehended from the passage of this bill. What does it propose, but to increase the power and patronage of the Executive, in a degree, and to an extent, which must surely be alarming to all, when duly considered? That power is too great, and that patronage too extensive already. At the nod of the Executive, is it not true that the exile from office and station takes up the line of march? Not, truly, with his musket on his shoulder, to fight the battles of his country; but with his load of poverty, and perhaps unmerited disgrace, he returns to his family, already worn down with indigence and sorrow.

Is it not true that, at his bidding, the sail unfurls to the ocean's breeze, and agents from abroad, like humble menials, are ordered home; while others, from better fortune, and as greater favorites, are richly provided for, and sent abroad? Yes, sir, and what now? The President must have the sum of $75,000 placed in his hands, with authority to survey the vast valley of the Mississippi—where he pleases, when he pleases, and as he pleases; with engineers enough spread over the country, even to gallop a man into the Presidency, if such aid were necessary: and, after all, to cap the climax, he is to select the site upon his own responsibility, and all alone. This, too, with the questions of low funds on the one hand, and nationality on the other, staring him in the face. Surely the reflecting mind must perceive, at a glance, as well the delicate situation in which the President would be placed, as the mischiefs which might follow so rapid an increase of his authority. We should beware of power, in the hands of the present Executive, as well as in the hands of all other Executives. They, like ourselves, are but men, and the wavering balance is as apt to shake in their hands as in ours. I am willing, sir, that each section of the Western country present to Congress its own peculiar claims to this location, and then to trust the decision to the wisdom of this body; for I am by no means prepared to admit that the Executive, notwithstanding the exalted station which he occupies, can outweigh the whole legislative councils of the country, either in intelligence, integrity, or disinterestedness; though I do not deny to him the possession of each. In conclusion, however, permit me, sir, to say, that I have another private reason, which will operate upon me with considerable power, when I come to give my vote upon this bill. Let it be remembered that Kentucky, the State from which I come, and which I have the honor in part to represent, feels a deep interest in this question. She has strong claims, and such as I hope soon to see adjusted; but whenever I am told that the present Executive is to sit as sole arbiter in the adjustment, I am involuntarily reminded that she is now groaning under the weight of a never to be forgotten veto.

At the request of Mr. DRAYTON, certain documents having relation to the subject, were here read.

Mr. D. then moved to fill the blank in the bill with seventy-five thousand dollars; which was agreed to.

DEC. 23, 1830.]

Armory on the Western Waters.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARSON said he felt a disposition to oblige his friends; and of all the committees of the House, there was none on whose report he would sooner rely without examination, if he could do so for any committee, than that of which the gentleman from South Carolina was chairman. But he could see no necessity for the erection of the armory proposed; arms could be purchased much cheaper by contract than they could be made at the armories, and enough could be manufactured at Pittsburg to supply the whole Western world. At six dollars each, the sum of $500,000 would purchase 80,000 stand of arms; and as steamboats were always running from that point to the various sections of that country, and arms could be at all times conveyed where wanted by these vessels, he should be willing to sell the armories now in existence, and give the citizens an opportunity to manufacture arms for the nation; and he had no fears that an ample supply could not be had. The expenses of these armories were very great, consisting of the pay of artificers, the purchase of materials, &c., while articles of as good manufacture, and at a much cheaper rate, could be had of individuals. He might be incorrect in his views; but, so forcibly did the subject strike him at this time, that he should be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. DRAYTON spoke at some length in reply to Mr. CARSON. He thought that no public work erected was of more importance than the national armories. The theory of the gentleman who last spoke, was plausible; but, if the House should adopt his views of the matter, the practice would be found to be injurious. The Government had two armories, which manufactured a certain number of arms every year. If individuals should establish themselves, and manufacture as good articles, and sell them at a lower price, he doubted not they would find for them a ready sale. But it was necessary that the United States should possess armories, that the nation might be supplied with arms of a good quality and uniformity of construction. Mr. D. referred to the events and the disasters of the late war. The militia could not procure arms in sufficient quantity; some were armed—some were not—some had muskets, but no bayonets—and others were, more or less, in want of complete arms. He spoke from his own observation, when he said that in many cases their arms were defective, and unfit for service—on several occasions they had burst in the hands of the soldiers while they were in the act of discharging them. Those arms turned out of the national armories were known to be good, uniform, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, also replied to Mr. CARSON. He spoke of the great necessity there was for a manufactory of arms in the Western country, and said it was useless to dwell upon the importance of having at all times ready a plentiful supply of arms. He stated a number of accidents that had occurred during the late war, from the use of arms of an inferior quality, and remarked on the great advantages that resulted from the establishment of armories of a national character. He spoke of the plan at present pursued at those institutions. The arms were all of a uniform make; so much so, that they might all be taken to pieces, and the parts thrown promiscuously together to the filling of a large room, and yet there would not be the least difficulty in putting them together. There were now two armories—suppose a third should go into operation—three would not be too many for a state of peace; but, in case of war, how great the necessity for the erection of that now contemplated—it would be found that the three would not supply arms fast enough for the wants of the country.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, commented upon what had fallen from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON,] and said he had not anticipated opposition to the proposed measure from that quarter. He had declared his unwillingness to entrust the President with the proposed selection. From what had heretofore taken place, it was evident this House would never come to an understanding on the subject. The work was admitted to be necessary, and he saw no prospect of its ever being commenced unless the power proposed by the present bill was given to the President. He had every confidence in the officer referred to, and did not doubt that he would select such a site as would be for the public good. As to what had fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON,] relative to the greater cheapness of arms furnished by contract, he pretended to no knowledge on that point. But he would remark, that there were now two armories belonging to the nation; and he presumed that, if arms could have been had to greater advantage by private contract, they would have been abolished long since. The public and private manufactories, he was convinced, could not, altogether, furnish enough to supply the wants of the country in time of war; and he was confident, if the gentleman had been in his section of country during the last war, he would have seen the necessity there was for both soldiers and arms.

Mr. CHILTON again rose, and observed, that but for the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. IRVIN,] he should have contented himself to have voted without adding a word to what he had said before. But, said Mr. C., my honorable friend is greatly in error, in supposing the remarks which he has attributed to me, to have fallen from me. If that gentleman misunderstands me, the House, I hope, does not; and my constituents and the country, I am determined shall not. Did I say, sir, that I was opposed to the location of an armory in the West? No, sir; I said the very reverse—I said I was decidedly friendly to the object, but had no confidence in the means by which it was proposed to be obtained; and that the gentleman should so widely have mistaken me, is a matter of surprise. The only difference between us consists in this, that he is willing to appropriate, while I am not—he is willing to submit the whole destinies of the West, so far as relates to this matter at least, to the final arbitrament of the President, while I am not. He seems to think the Executive the safest repository of this power, while I freely admit I do not—I cannot. The gentleman has almost exhausted our language in seeking for epithets sufficiently strong to express his confidence in the Executive, for which I certainly would not censure him; but he will not be surprised when I assure him that I had hitherto supposed his confidence to be just about as strong as my own. Whether, however, his confidence be great or small, of one thing I am sure: it is, that the friends of the bill should expect but little aid from a vetoed State; for as well might her hopes, in relation to this matter, wither and fall victims to the veto policy, as in a late and very memorable instance, to which I have alluded. I have only to ask of the House, that when the question be taken, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered by the House; but, before the question was put, a motion for adjournment was made; and

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11.

On motion of Mr. DRAYTON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House whether the existing laws do not provide for a greater number of cadets at the United States' Military Academy, than is consistent with the objects for which it was established; and, if so, that he do report a plan and organization for that academy, corresponding with the alterations and reductions which may be deemed expedient.

Duty on Sugar.

[JAN. 11, 1831.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill "to authorize the President of the United States to change the location of the land offices in the United States." The bill was read twice, and Mr. W. explained the object of the committee in reporting it; he hoped it would be ordered to be engrossed to-day for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. SEVIER objected to thus pressing the bill through the House. If the gentleman persevered in the course he had proposed, he [Mr. S.] should be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he had no disposition to press the subject on the House at this time, and he would move its postponement to this day week.

The motion prevailed.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, submitted the following resolution; and remarked, on offering it, that, as the subject of it was interesting to every part of the community, he hoped it would not be denied the courtesy of a consideration.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on brown sugar imported into the United States from foreign countries.

Mr. RAMSEY inquired if a similar resolution had not already been offered at the present session.

The SPEAKER replied, that there had been so many resolutions offered, he could not take it upon himself to answer the question.

Mr. CONDUCT demanded the question of consideration.

Mr. HAYNES asked if he could have an opportunity to modify the resolution, before the question of consideration was put.

The SPEAKER answered in the affirmative.

Mr. HAYNES then modified his motion, to read as follows:

Whereas, without a considerable diminution of revenue, the public debt will, in a very few years, be redeemed and discharged: And whereas the end of republican government is the prosperity and happiness of the people: And whereas this end cannot be more certainly promoted than by a system of taxation which shall leave the largest portion of the products of labor in the pockets of the people: And whereas the necessities of life should, as far as practicable, be exempted from taxation: And whereas brown sugar has become an article of great and necessary consumption among all classes: And whereas the present duty on that article, imported from foreign countries, bears an unjust and extravagant proportion to the original cost in foreign markets: And whereas there is good reason to believe that the tax collected by the Government, upon its importation, amounting to one million four hundred and thirty-four thousand nine hundred and sixty-one dollars and eleven cents, is less than half the sum taken from the pockets of the people under the operation of the existing duty, the quantity manufactured in the United States within the year 1830 having been estimated at one hundred thousand hogsheads, equal to one hundred millions of pounds, at three cents per pound, protecting duty equal to three millions of dollars—

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on brown sugar imported into the United States from foreign countries.

On this resolution Mr. CONDUCT demanded the question of consideration.

Mr. MARTIN said, if the gentleman from New Jersey, and others who sustained the tariff policy, were determined to prevent the consideration of this subject, he would suggest that their object could be effected by moving to lay the resolution on the table, and printing it. That motion would prevent discussion, while, at the same time, the House and the world would see the nature and character of the resolution, in favor of which they refused to hear a single word.

Mr. DENNY renewed the demand for the question of consideration.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the House. Being taken, they stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Armstrong, John S. Barbour, Barnwell, Barringer, Baylor, Bell, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Borst, Brodhead, Brown, Cambreleng, Campbell, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Coke, Conner, Craig, Crockett, Crocheron, Davenport, W. So the House determined to consider the resolution.

Mr. HAYNES then rose, and said he was glad, notwithstanding the rule which, however wisely adopted, was in its operation so well calculated to abridge the liberty of speech, that the House had extended to the resolution just offered the courtesy of consideration. He was willing to have rested the subject solely upon the resolution first offered, and, but for the apprehension of a refusal to consider it, should not have modified it by the addition of the preamble. But, as the House had, somewhat unexpectedly, afforded him the opportunity of presenting a few observations to its attention, he would not permit that opportunity to pass away wholly unimproved by him. When he had the honor to bring this subject to the consideration of the House at an early day of the present session, he had extended his proposition to the whole class of sugars, because, whether they had been imposed for the purpose of revenue or protection, he thought the time had arrived when the duties ought to be entirely abolished. But, in introducing the subject thus broadly, he did not consider that the Committee of Ways and Means would be necessarily restricted in their inquiry to the mere question of repeal; but if, in their wisdom, it should be determined that a partial reduction of the duties was all the exigencies of the country would permit, they would be authorized to go so far, and no farther. For his part, he had formerly believed, he now believed, and ever should believe, that the true end of Government was the happiness and prosperity of the people; and for the furtherance of this end, it was essential that the necessities of life should be subjected to the smallest amount of taxation which the public exigencies would permit.

Duty on Sugar.

[H. OF R.]

Whatever might have been the original use of the article of sugar—if it was first a medicine, and then a luxury—it had become an article of essential necessity, as was proven by the estimated consumption of the present year, at one hundred and fifty millions of pounds. Nor in this character is its use confined to any particular or favored class of the community, but runs through every degree and condition in life. Nor is it any answer to this assertion to say, that some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars of revenue has been derived from their consumption within the years 1815 to 1829, inclusive. And here he would remark, that, notwithstanding the laws of the country are accessible to all, it is important that the public mind should be enlightened upon the existing tax on sugar. But, before proceeding further with the subject, he would beg leave to remark, that how much so ever gentlemen might sneer at the proposition, that, under our system of revenue, the taxes are paid by the producers, no proposition was, to his mind, more clear and undeniable, as consumption must necessarily be regulated by production. By an examination of the tariff of 1816, and reference to the annual reports from the Treasury Department upon the commerce and navigation of the United States, since that period, it would be found that the duties imposed upon the import of lump and refined sugars and sugar candy had amounted to prohibition; thus effectually depriving the consumer of any choice whatsoever between the foreign and domestic articles. Nor is this all; for inasmuch as the consumption of brown sugar among the poorer classes is much greater in proportion to their means than, among the wealthy, the tax falls most heavily on those who are least able to bear it. And here he would take the occasion to remark, that, although he still entertained the opinion, under the influence of which his resolution of the 13th of December was offered, the advice of friends, and the hope of a more favorable consideration, had induced him to narrow that resolution to its present shape. But who seeks for the repeal or reduction of taxes? Not the receiver, but the payer of taxes.

He regretted that he had no specific information as to the price of sugar in foreign countries when the tariff of 1794 was imposed. But, if he had been correctly informed, the foreign cost of brown sugar imported into this country at that period was not less than eight to ten cents per pound. If this be true, it is the obvious inference that Government did not then intend, by a tariff of two cents per pound, to impose a duty which should operate as more than twenty or twenty-five per cent. ad valorem on the original cost of the article. But, as the foreign cost has considerably declined since that period, thereby increasing the relation of the duty to such cost, if the duty of 1794 had not been increased by the act of 1816, it would now operate at the rate of forty to fifty or sixty per cent. ad valorem on the original foreign cost. But, by raising the duty, in 1816, to three cents per pound on brown sugar, its ad valorem operation is still greater, being not less than one hundred per cent. In the discussion of this subject, we might be told that the average price of sugar had declined in consequence of its manufacture in this country, and, therefore, sound policy requires the continuance of the present duty. If gentlemen would take the trouble to inform themselves on this subject, he was satisfied they would find that such an assertion was wholly without foundation. For his part, he had been at some pains to obtain information, the result of which was, that the price of sugar imported into England, from the year 1814 to 1823, inclusive, had undergone an astonishing diminution, no part of which could be ascribed to its manufacture in this country. By a reference to a statistical work on the population and resources of Great Britain, which he had examined, it would be found that the average price of brown sugar imported into England, in the former year, was seventy-three shillings and four pence one farthing the hundred weight, and, in the latter year, but thirty-one shillings and one farthing. Surely this could not be ascribed to its manufacture here. Nor does it appear that the price of either year depended upon a stinted supply in the one, or an excessive importation in the other, as a considerable surplus was exported in each.

And here he would repeat, substantially, what was said during the discussion of the East India sugar duty in the House of Commons, in 1823, by the late Mr. Huskisson, one of the most able and practical statesmen England has ever produced, and whose death may well be lamented in that country as a great public calamity, that, whenever there is an excess of import over consumption, the price of the article must be regulated by the markets of the world. He said, that a proposition of such obvious truth did not require the aid of illustration or argument from him. Not only had the British market exercised an influence on the price of the article, but the French market also. And here he was not prepared to speak so definitely as to the price in France, as he had done of England. Nor was it important for him to do so, as the influence exercised by the French market on the price of sugar originated principally from the partial exclusion of the article. It must be well known to every member of this House, that, during the wars of the French revolution, the sugar colonies of France were cut off from the mother country, and that although the commerce between those colonies and the mother country entered for several years very largely into the American carrying trade, yet the interpolations of national law, brought to operate upon neutrals by the principal belligerents, at length destroyed that trade entirely. Accustomed to the use of sugar, the French people were not willing to forego this necessary article of consumption, and their ingenuity soon furnished a substitute in the sugar extracted from the beet. The culture of the beet, and the extraction of sugar from it, had grown to such an extent before the general pacification of Europe in 1815, that the Government imposed a high duty on foreign sugar for the protection of the domestic. This system had not been abandoned since the recovery of the French sugar colonies in the West Indies. Thus it was probable that a considerable portion of the sugar manufactured in those colonies was necessarily thrown upon the great market of the world. He said, if the facts and inferences upon which he had thrown himself, were true, and he did not think they could be successfully controverted, the price of sugar arising from its manufacture in this country, so far from regulating, had been regulated by the markets of the world. But, before dismissing this branch of the subject, he would observe, that the price of sugar in the English market could not have been influenced by any variation of the duty, as that fluctuated between twenty-seven and thirty shillings the hundred weight, making a difference of but three shillings the hundred weight between any two years of the period to which he had referred. Nor can it be doubted that the high duty in Great Britain considerably lessens the amount of sugar consumed there, and particularly in Scotland and Ireland, thus leaving a much larger quantity for the supply of other markets, and consequently lowering its price in those markets. But we might derive instruction on this subject, by a reference to the treasury reports upon the commerce and navigation of this country from 1821 to 1829, inclusive. During that whole period, it would be found that the foreign cost of brown sugar imported into the United States had not varied more than about half a cent per pound, and that not by a uniformly declining price. Nor will it fail to be observed, upon an examination of the reports referred to, that the importation of brown sugar paying duty, was greater in 1829 than in 1821, and not much less than the average annual importation of the whole period. Nor might it be improper for him here to remark, that there was a considerable annual exportation with the benefit of drawback from 1821 to 1829, inclusive. If it could be necessary for him to go further to account for the gradual decline in the price of sugar throughout the commercial world within the last fifteen years, it would be sufficient to advert to the large amount of labor released from the purposes of war about the commencement of that period, and the consequent diminution of its value in all the productions of human industry. But, as the kindness of a friend had furnished him with the means of doing so since the commencement of his remarks, he would state some additional facts bearing upon the probable causes of the diminished price of sugar within the last few years. He had brought down the price of sugar imported into Great Britain to the year 1823, and was now prepared to trace it to 1828, at the close of which it was twenty-seven shillings the hundred weight. Nor was this occasioned by diminished duty—the duty having been permanently fixed at twenty-seven shillings the hundred weight, or one hundred and twelve pounds. He was also prepared to state specifically the effect which the protection afforded in France to sugar extracted from the beet had produced on the consumption of West India sugar in that country in the year 1827—the consumption amounting, in a population exceeding thirty millions, to no more than one hundred and thirty-two millions of pounds. But, when we consider that the whole consumption of sugar in France, and the British empire in Europe, equals six hundred millions of pounds annually, (the consumption of England alone, in 1823, having been estimated by Mr. Huskisson at three hundred and sixty millions,) and reflect on the immense additional quantity necessary to supply all the countries of the world which consume the article, it must be manifest, that its manufacture in the United States exercises a very insensible, if any, influence on its price either at home or abroad. But our own commercial history furnishes an instance of the decline in the price of brown sugar within a few years, as remarkable as any that has been mentioned, and that, too, without any possible reference to its manufacture in this country. If gentlemen will examine the prices current of Philadelphia for the years 1804 to 1807, inclusive, they will find that, from June of the former to the same month of the latter year, the price declined from twelve and one-half to nine cents per pound, and that, too, at a period when our foreign relations with the most powerful maritime nation in the world threatened serious interruption to our foreign trade, and consequently a diminished import of sugar. He said, that a strong additional argument against the presumption that the price of brown sugar in other countries had been influenced by the manufacture of that article in this, was, that the price of white clayed sugar, an article not of American manufacture, had experienced a corresponding decline. He had ascertained by an examination of the Philadelphia prices current, from 1803 to 1807, inclusive, that, in the former year, this article was quoted in that market at seventeen and one-half cents per pound, and in the latter at but thirteen and one-half, a difference of four cents per pound in the short period of four years. And although he had no means of ascertaining the cost in the foreign market, it could but be presumed to have been considerably higher than the average of the six years ending with 1829, within which, notwithstanding there was some variation in the prices of different years, he did not believe the average would be found to exceed seven and one-half cents per pound. As the operation of a part of the system of duties on sugars, he would state what he had no doubt was true, that, in some instances, much more drawback had been allowed on the exportation of refined sugar, than the duty previously paid on the raw sugar from which it was made. In fact, that the article alluded to as thus receiving drawback, was not worth the average price of brown sugar, and that little, if any, loss of quantity had probably been sustained by converting the one into the other. This, he said, he understood, had undergone judicial investigation, and the court had been compelled to decide that the article came within the technical meaning of refined sugar, under the law. But, although this was an abuse, he would not leave the subject without a passing notice of the protection afforded to bona fide refiners of sugar in this country. By the tariff of 1816, the duty on refined sugar imported into this country is twelve cents per pound. He believed that one hundred and seventy pounds of raw sugar were generally estimated as equal to, or sufficient for, the manufacture of one hundred pounds of refined.

He did not know precisely how it was estimated in this country. He knew that this was considered to be the standard in Great Britain, and, as he understood five cents per pound to be the drawback allowed on the exportation of American refined sugar, presumed the English and American standard did not materially vary. What, then, said he, is the consequence? That the refiner of sugar in this country receives a drawback to the whole amount of duty on what he exports, and a protecting duty of seven cents the pound on all that is consumed in the country. He did not pretend to know what is the cost of refining, but, to his mind, the tax appeared to be enormously disproportioned to the value of the article upon which it is laid. But, in discussing this subject, it is necessary that we consider its influence upon some of the various and important interests of the country. We have been told by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report upon the finances, that the navigation of the country is in a most languishing condition. This must be manifest, if we look at the diminished value of our exports and imports within the last five years. If he was not mistaken, though he had not very recently examined the subject, he believed that both exports and imports had declined in annual value within that period about thirty millions of dollars each. He said, although, for his part, he had no doubt the evil just adverted to had a much deeper root, he was prepared to believe, and did believe, that a due proportion of the depression under which American navigation now languishes, may be justly attributed to the restriction imposed by the existing duty on sugar, upon our intercourse with sugar-making countries; and for evidence of the partial effects of these restrictions on American trade and navigation, he would refer gentlemen to the correspondence between General Von Scholten, the special minister from Denmark, and the Secretary of State, which had lately been communicated by the President to Congress, and printed by order of the House. He had not troubled the House with the inquiry whether the duty imposed by the act of 1816 was intended for revenue or protection, or partly for both. This was unnecessary, as he had expressed the opinion at the outset, that whether designed for the one or the other, repeal or reduction was now necessary. In investigating the effect of this duty on American navigation, he had looked over a part of the annual report on commerce and navigation for the year 1829, for the purpose of ascertaining the true state of the matter. Upon a careful examination, he had found, that, although our exports for that year to the Swedish, Danish, Dutch, British, and French West Indies, British American colonies, Cuba, other Spanish colonies, Brazil, and the West Indies generally, amounted to fifteen million three hundred and two thousand and eighteen dollars, yet the imports amounted to no more than twelve million six hundred and seventy-four thousand three hundred and forty-two dollars, showing an excess of exports over imports of two million six hundred and twenty-seven thousand eight hundred and seventy-six dollars. As the value of the exports was estimated in the home market, and of imports in the foreign, it is difficult to reconcile the excess of the former over the latter, upon any principle consistent with profitable trade. But the subject seems to present further illustration when we compare the amount of tonnage engaged in this business, which entered and departed within the same period. This comparison shows an excess of seventy thousand one hundred and thirty tons of shipping departed, over that which entered during that year. He had not attempted an accurate estimate of the foreign tonnage engaged in this trade within the period under consideration, but did not believe it would materially vary the result. But, if we include the trade with Hayti, which shows a considerable balance of imports over exports, it will reduce the general balance against us to but little less than two millions of dollars. He said, further comment on this subject could not be necessary. And here he said he could but regret that the information called for by an honorable member from North Carolina, [Mr. CONNER,] at the last session of Congress, and that which had been called for by a resolution which was offered by himself since the commencement of the present, had not yet been received from the Treasury Department. And although he came not here as the eulogist of any man, it would become him to say, that if the information sought for by the resolutions to which he had alluded, had been within the power of the able and diligent head of that department, he had no doubt it would, before now, have been communicated to this House. He regretted the absence of this information, particularly as we are without any specific data upon which to estimate the amount of capital employed in the culture of the cane and the manufacture of sugar in this country, and the annual profit which it affords. It has been stated that the quantity manufactured in this country in the year 1830 amounts to one hundred thousand hogsheads, or one hundred millions of pounds. Assuming the amount imported in 1829 as the standard of importation of 1830, and it may be taken for granted that the consumption of the present year cannot fall short of one hundred and fifty millions of pounds. If this estimate be correct, it is not difficult to arrive at the amount of contribution levied upon the whole mass of consumers by the operation of the present unequal and most burdensome tax on this article. In his view of the subject, there was no doubt the consumers were taxed at the rate of three cents per pound upon the whole consumption of one hundred and fifty millions, making an aggregate of four millions and a half of dollars for the present year; thus showing that this tax, which carries into the treasury but one million and a half of dollars, puts the sum of three millions into the pockets of the American manufacturers of brown sugar. If he should be asked how he arrived at this conclusion, he would answer, that he had been informed, and did not believe the fact could be controverted, that the difference between the short price and the long price of sugar in our greatest commercial city was precisely the amount of the duty of three cents per pound.

As his remarks might, perchance, attract the notice of other eyes than those of commercial men, he would state, that the short price was the price without the duty, and the long price the price including the duty. So that, as no foreign sugar regularly imported can be consumed in the country without paying the long price, the duty is necessarily paid on all so consumed. It might be objected, that domestic sugar is lower in the market of New Orleans than the average price of foreign sugar in the Atlantic cities on which duty has been paid; but he apprehended no essential difference will be found between the prices of the foreign and domestic articles in the Atlantic cities above referred to. And he has been informed, and believes, that foreign sugar at the short price, or duty off, can, at the present moment, be bought at a considerably lower price in our Northern markets, than the domestic in the market of New Orleans. If this be the fact, would not the article, if the duty should be materially reduced, come as cheaply from the West Indies, or, indeed, more so, than from New Orleans? But, in the remarks which he had submitted upon the subject as connected with the navigation of the country, he had not adverted to the recent recovery of the direct trade with the British West India islands. He could not speak advisedly on the subject, but had no doubt a reduction of the duty on brown sugar would have a most salutary influence on the advantages to be derived from this acquisition.

But, in advocating the reduction of this duty, it was not to be considered that he looked to that reduction as likely to destroy, or essentially diminish, the manufacture of brown sugar in this country. The enormous profits which he believed were now reaped by persons engaged in this manufacture, might well bear some reduction—and, when we consider the languishing condition of other agricultural pursuits, ought to be made to bear it. What is the general condition of agriculture throughout the country, it is not necessary to state, nor the large portion of our people who derive their subsistence from its hard earnings. He must again express his regret for the want of more specific information on the subject. In the absence of such information, he must rely upon an estimate of the sum necessary to purchase and supply with the necessary stock, machinery, and subsistence, for one year, a plantation for sixty hands, and the probable product of their labor, as a standard of the profits of this pursuit. The estimate he would first offer was one said to have been made by an individual who has had some practical acquaintance with the business, as conducted in one of the sugar colonies of France. He said he did not intend to rely solely on this estimate; but, after presenting it, he would offer others to the notice of the House, which, he was persuaded, would be found not to present a picture too favorable to the manufacturer of brown sugar in this country. The estimate to which he had referred, puts down the sixty hands at an average of three hundred dollars, making an aggregate of eighteen thousand dollars. Five hundred acres of land at ten dollars per acre, five thousand dollars; dwelling, negro, and other houses, works, tools, steam engine, &c. at twenty-three thousand dollars; one year's subsistence, including incidental expenses, at four thousand dollars—making a total of fifty thousand dollars. Taking the quantity of land cultivated in cane at three hundred acres, and the average product of sugar at twelve hundred and fifty pounds per acre, will be three hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds. The quantity of molasses at eighty-four gallons per acre, will be three thousand seven hundred and fifty gallons of molasses. Estimating the sugar at five cents the pound, and the molasses at fifteen cents the gallon, the gross revenue will be twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars, from which deduct three thousand dollars for yearly expenses, and it will leave, of nett income, nineteen thousand five hundred dollars, or about thirty-nine per cent. upon the whole investment. Mr. H. said, although the estimated average value of slaves in other States might seem to justify the average assumed for the gang of sixty, yet, as the estimate might, by some, be considered too low for Louisiana, he would add ten thousand dollars to the estimated cost of the establishment; and then, assuming the same annual product from it, if he had made no mistake in the calculation, the nett profit would exceed thirty-two per cent. But suppose we set down the capital invested at one hundred thousand dollars, instead of fifty, and calculate upon the same product, the profit will be near twenty per cent.; and if we add half a cent per pound to the estimated value of the sugar,

H. of R.]

Duty on Sugar.

(and he had been informed that the last advices from New Orleans placed it at that sum,) the profit, taking the whole cost of the establishment at one hundred thousand dollars, would exceed twenty per centum per annum. But, suppose the medium sum of seventy-five thousand dollars be taken as the cost of the plantation, hands, &c., and estimate the product at four thousand pounds to the hand, and he would venture the decided opinion that the hands actually employed do not fall below that average, estimating the sum of two hundred and forty thousand pounds of sugar at five and a half cents per pound, twenty thousand one hundred and sixty gallons of molasses at fifteen cents per gallon, and the result is the gross sum of sixteen thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars, which, allowing four thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars for annual expenses, leaves twelve thousand dollars clear profit, or sixteen per cent. per annum.

Where is the agriculturist, engaged in any other branch of this widely diversified pursuit, who realizes one-third of this profit from the capital and labor which he employs? Surely not the grain grower, of whose limited market and scanty profits we have heard so much; and as surely not the tobacco or cotton grower, who, with so much difficulty, brings the two sides of the ledger to meet. He said he had no practical information on this subject, but, from what he had heard upon authority he did not question, two thousand pounds of sugar had been manufactured from an acre of cane, in one of the southern counties of Georgia, and he had understood that a like quantity had been manufactured by some individual in Florida, since the commencement of the present winter. But why go further into detail on this subject? If his calculations were to be relied on, and he had little doubt that some one of them might be, the result is, that the manufacture of brown sugar can be profitably prosecuted in this country without the aid of a protecting duty.

But let us view the subject somewhat more in the aggregate. If one thousand pounds of sugar to the acre be a fair average, and, if it varies from the truth, he believed it was below it; and if a hand can manage five acres, and he believed, from his general knowledge of Southern agriculture in relation to articles requiring similar cultivation to the sugar cane, he can do so, we arrive at the conclusion, that the land cultivated in cane does not exceed, and probably falls below, one hundred thousand acres, and the hands cultivating it cannot exceed twenty-five, and probably do not number more than twenty thousand. Taking then the whole product of eighteen hundred and thirty, at one hundred millions of pounds of sugar, and the molasses he should not estimate, because he had understood it would cover the annual expenses of the plantation on which it was made, at least, the expenses of cultivation—and the value of the sugar amounts to five millions and a half of dollars at New Orleans, and probably two millions, or two and a half more before it gets into the general consumption of the country. If we divide the five millions and a half between twenty thousand hands, the distributive amount to each is two hundred and seventy-five dollars. If a like distribution be made between twenty-five thousand, it is two hundred and twenty dollars each. Then is it just, is it reasonable, that the whole agriculture of the country should be burdened by a tax of four millions and a half of dollars—for if the million and a half now received as revenue can be dispensed with, and by its repeal the country would be relieved from an additional levy of three millions now paid to the sugar manufacturers, the whole tax may now be considered as operating for their benefit—that the hands employed in manufacturing brown sugar in this country may earn for their employers the annual return of from two hundred and twenty to two hundred and seventy-five dollars for the labor of each, exclusive of the value of molasses. Shall the hundreds of thousands of hands employed throughout our wide spread country in raising grain, tobacco, cotton, and other agricultural products, be taxed four millions and a half of dollars, to enable twenty or twenty-five thousand to cultivate from eighty to one hundred thousand acres of land, at a profit of from sixteen to near forty per centum per annum? Surely justice forbids it. But some advocate for continuing the duty might say, that the sugar culture cannot be profitably carried on without it. If he believed this to be the case, which he most certainly did not, he, for one, should say it was high time the culture was abandoned.

Mr. H. said, that, among the motives which had urged him to bring this subject to the consideration of the House, there was one, which, although it had been omitted at the outset of his observations, it might not be immaterial to mention. He came from a State which might be considered by some as having an interest in the continuance of this duty—a State which, as she had gone into the revolutionary contest in defence of principle, was ready to maintain it now. Yes, sir, it was for principle that Georgia made common cause with the oppressed of other colonies, in that dark hour through which the sun of independence has risen on this continent. As one of her representatives, I came here upon all subjects connected with the tariff with clean hands. If I did not, I should not be her true representative. But, sir, I did not introduce this subject alone for the purpose of addressing this House. I know not that any fact or argument which I could offer to its consideration, would have the smallest influence upon the decision of the question now before it. Sir, I had another and a higher motive—it was, that I might from this place address myself to the practical good sense of the country, that, perchance, I might awaken in the bosom of the laboring man, as he whistles over the handles of his plough, the inquiry why this unequal and burdensome tax should be continued, mainly for the benefit of the lordly capitalist.

[Before Mr. H. had finished his speech, the hour allotted for the consideration of resolutions expired, and he concluded his remarks on the following day; but they are given unbroken, above.]

The House took up the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That so much of an act entitled 'An act to provide for paying to the States of Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama, three per centum of the nett proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same,' approved the third of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-two, as requires an annual account of the application [by the State of Alabama] of the said three per centum to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. CLAY explained its object. It was supported by Messrs. CLAY, WICKLIFFE, PETTIS, and DUNCAN, and opposed by Messrs. VINTON and JENNINGS.

[The debate on this question involved on one hand the propriety of relieving the States referred to from the mere formality of rendering accounts of the expenditure of the fund in question, vexatious to them, troublesome to the treasury, and of no consequence in any view; and, on the other, the impropriety of altering the terms of a compact by a simple act of Congress, and the inexpediency of releasing the States from the responsibility for the just administration of these funds. In reply, it was contended that the provision of the act of 1825, proposed by this bill to be repealed, was not within the contemplation of the compact, and for that very reason ought to be repealed, because it imposed on the States a labor and expense to which they ought not to be subjected.]

The question being finally put on its passage, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 45.

Duty on Sugar.—Mileage of Members.

[H. OF R.]

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution yesterday moved by Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, for a reduction of the duty on imported brown sugar; and Mr. H. having concluded his remarks—

Mr. ALEXANDER said, that it might be considered unimportant by the House, whether the proposition now under consideration should be adopted, or no. Gentlemen should not lay this "flattering unction to their souls." For himself, he might be said to be almost indifferent as to the disposition that may be made of it, although he concurred fully with the mover in the object desired. Mr. A. was tired of appealing to this House, with a hope of producing conviction upon the minds of those who were interested in keeping up this system of taxation. The time is not long, when an issue must be made up between the people and the Government upon this question. There is a point of depression, yea, and oppression, in the physical as well as mechanical world, beyond which we cannot go without meeting resistance. A great portion of the good people of these United States have borne the ills of Government with a fortitude sustained alone by their devotion to the Union; but they can bear but a little while longer. They have remonstrated and protested, again and again, until these have become "a by-word," are contemned and utterly disregarded, and their only consolation is, to be told that they have the right to protest and remonstrate again. Their representatives have brought forward here, proposition after proposition for a redress of grievances, which have been voted down without even a respectful consideration. There is, then, but one resource left us—we are thrown back upon the States and the people for protection, who, alone, are sovereign, where their rights are concerned.

The States who have taken their stand under the banner of the constitution—not the striped bunting which has been hung up in this hall, to remind us only of their oppression—can never recede without dishonor, and a shameful dereliction of those great principles for which they profess to have been contending, in behalf of the people. Is it not far better, then—more honorable and magnanimous in a self-willed majority—to appease the wrath of an offended and insulted people, by alleviating the burdens of taxation, rather than go on in a heedless, reckless course, leading to consequences which all must deplore?

Sir, we have seen, within a very short space of time, the most important events occur which have ever happened in the history of nations. A day, yea, an hour, has achieved the grandest revolutions of which we read, anywhere, in times past. France has resumed her ancient constitutional rights. Russia, alarmed for her own safety, has lined her southern border with an army of two hundred thousand troops. Sweden, Holland, all Belgium, is in arms; and we have seen the failure of a single proposition in the Parliament of Great Britain, overthrow the ministry, and bring into power the friends of reform and economy in the administration of the Government—the friends of free trade! These important results have been brought about by a degree of oppression upon the people for centuries past, which they could endure no longer. We should learn wisdom from the examples of the times before us, and not permit ourselves to disregard results which must inevitably flow from certain causes. The same revolution is now going on here, although Mr. A. hoped to see it accomplished in a different way.

Mr. A. said he did not mean to enter into a consideration of the amount of sugar imported into the United States, or that which is produced here—the quantity consumed, the capital invested, nor the number of plantations that will be affected by the reduction. These are views which will properly come up when a bill shall be brought in. It is sufficient to know for the present, that it is an article which enters into the general consumption of every family, and the revenue arising from it is not necessary for the support of Government. If there be a part of this Union more interested than any other in keeping on the duty, it is the South, because a considerable portion of the property there will be diminished in value in proportion to the reduction. But, sir, we do not come here to legislate upon considerations of this sort, to calculate the advantage gained by the rule of three, although it is a good one to observe in reckoning our accounts at home; looking as we ought to the great and eternal principles of justice, which, pervading as they do all laws of creation, should be made to govern the actions of men!

What, said Mr. A., is the prospect before us? The grandest spectacle ever before exhibited to the world! A nation, after having borne patiently the burdens of taxation, growing out of two wars, now nearly freed from debt; and the question is to be brought home to the people, whether they will submit to keeping up a system of taxes, merely to promote the speculative schemes of politicians seeking to establish a personal reputation upon their ruins! That is the question, and cannot be avoided.

What, sir, has been the effect of the reduction of duties upon salt, coffee, and cocoa, made at the last session of Congress? Why, it was opportunely seized hold of by our minister at London, at a time when our negotiation seemed almost at an end with that court, and urged with such force and argument, to show the friendly disposition of the United States towards England, as well as a sincere wish, on the part of the administration, to re-establish amicable relations between the two Governments, as to result in removing the restriction from the West India trade. A continuance of the reduction of the duty upon an article, in the production of which the West Indies are so much interested, must furnish additional evidence of that spirit which we carried into the negotiation for removing the shackles upon commerce, as perhaps to induce Great Britain to take off some of her duties which bear so heavily upon our productions.

Let us then meet together like a band of brothers, discarding our local prejudices, feuds, and animosities, which have too often disturbed the harmony of our action here; forgiving and forgetting the past, intent alone upon doing justice to the great body of the people whom we represent, without regard to personal or political friendships.

When Mr. ALEXANDER took his seat, Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, obtained the floor; but the allotted hour being about expiring, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HALL moved to recommit the report of the Committee on Public Expenditures, made on the 7th instant, relative to the mileage of members of Congress; and Mr. CHILTON moved the following written instructions:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Expenditures be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House a bill containing the following provisions, to wit:

1. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, previous to issuing certificates to the members of their respective Houses, for the amounts to which said members may be entitled for mileage to and from the seat of the General Government, to obtain from each member so applying for a certificate, a statement, according to the best of his knowledge, of the distance from the capitol, in the city of Washington, to the residence of said member, computed upon the nearest route which may be conveniently travelled, and is necessarily and most usually travelled, from the one to the other point; which said statement shall be signed by the member making the same.

2. That said Secretary and Sergeant shall record said statements, so made and signed, each, in a book to be by him kept for that purpose; and that the Secretary of the Treasury, in publishing his annual statement of the amounts paid to members, shall distinguish between the amount paid for the per diem allowance, and the amount for mileage to each member, placing the number of miles charged for opposite the amount allowed.

Mr. HALL moved to strike out all the preceding, from the word "bill" to the end, and insert the following:

"Making it the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, with the aid of the Postmaster General, at the end of every session, to make an estimate, as nearly as possible, of the actual distance, in a direct line, of the residence of each member of the Senate, House of Representatives, and Delegate of a territory, from the seat of Government; and that the mileage of members of Congress be computed, and their accounts for travelling be settled, according to such estimate."

These propositions lie over till to-morrow.

SURVEYS OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments yesterday reported from the Committee of the Whole to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1831, and they were all agreed to but one, which provided for the appropriation of $8,000 for the survey of private land claims, and $130,000 for further surveys of the public lands.

Mr. MCCOY moved to amend the amendment, by striking out $130,000, and inserting $60,000.

Mr. MCCOY opposed the amendment of the committee. He said the surveys proposed were not necessary. There were lands already surveyed, and not sold, to the amount of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of acres, and there was no good reason why one hundred millions of acres more should be surveyed and thrown into the market. Some of the public lands, he said, were not worth surveying; he was in favor of surveying as fast as the lands would sell, and was disposed to authorize the surveying of the good lands as fast as purchasers could be found for them. Mr. McC. again alluded to the great extent of lands surveyed, and said, that a considerable portion of them would have to be resurveyed—such, for instance, as the prairie lands, in which fires very often took place, and burnt up the marks, &c. which had been placed there by the surveyors. Under his present impressions, he moved to strike from the amendment $130,000, and insert $60,000.

Mr. TEST said he generally had a great respect for the opinions of the gentleman from Virginia, who had just addressed the House; but he considered his motion to lessen the sum proposed for surveys, to say the least of it, inexpedient. He spoke of the public lands as an increasing source of revenue, and made some reference to the sales for the past year; and remarked further, that lands to the amount of half a million of dollars had been sold in the State of Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, remarked that he understood the surveyors had asked for an appropriation of $200,000. The Commissioner of the General Land Office had reduced that amount; and the Committee of Ways and Means had proposed to appropriate only $130,000 to provide for past arrearages, and surveys for the present year. Under these circumstances, the gentleman from Virginia was desirous of reducing the amount to $60,000. He had supposed that, in a short session like the present, there would be no disposition, on the part of any member, to introduce propositions for unnecessary discussion. What were the facts? A little over $100,000 was proposed to be appropriated towards the surveys of the public lands; it was necessary these surveys should go on; and he would ask gentlemen if they were disposed to withhold the necessary appropriations, and thus retard the settlement of the Western country. With regard to the remarks of the gentleman, that the marks of the surveyors would be destroyed, he would say that their marks—the metes and bounds described by them—would last as long as Government itself; the gentleman might make himself easy on that point. The surveys, said Mr. J., should be continued, and homes be thus provided for the numerous emigrants to the West. Mr. J. said it was true that in some States the surveys were sufficient; but there were territories to be peopled, and millions of acres to which the Indian title had been extinguished to be surveyed. He considered that the sum proposed by the committee should be granted, as indispensably necessary; they had shown a disposition to economize in reducing the sum recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and, so far from reducing the amount proposed by the committee, he was not certain that the whole sum asked for should not be allowed. He hoped, therefore, the proposed amendment would not prevail.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had hoped, after what had been said in explanation, yesterday, no further objection would have been made to this appropriation for continuing the surveys of the public lands, and, consequently, had expected no further discussion of the subject. Mr. C. said, the effects of withdrawing the appropriation which was proposed, would obviously be twofold—first, to check the tide of emigration to the West; and, secondly, to cut down and materially lessen this branch of the public revenue. If the public lands were not surveyed, they could not be sold; and individuals would not be disposed to remove to this new region, and devote their time, labor, and money to improving and preparing lands for cultivation, of which they could entertain no hope of becoming proprietors, at least within any reasonable time.

Mr. C. said, the public lands, too, had been an important source of revenue. The receipts from that source had been gradually increasing, until they had grown to an amount of no small importance. The amount paid by purchasers during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1830, was almost two millions of dollars; exceeding, by about half a million, he believed, the amount received in any former year. Mr. C. asked if gentlemen were disposed to change the present land system, and cut off this important branch of revenue.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCoy] speaks of the large quantity of land already surveyed and remaining unsold. Mr. C. said, if the gentleman would examine a document laid before Congress two or three years ago, he would find that a large portion of that quantity—perhaps thirty millions of acres—was sterile and worthless, and about eighty-three millions too inferior in quality to command the minimum price. In the State from which he came, said Mr. C., good land, or that which was fit for cultivation, seldom remained long unsold after it had been surveyed and put in market; and he presumed that was very much the case in the other new States. No danger, he conceived, was to be apprehended that good land would any where remain long in market for want of purchasers.

Again, Mr. C. asked if it be desirable in point of policy that the public lands should be long settled and improved before they were offered for sale. This would certainly be the case if the surveys were suspended; and Congress might again, and would properly, be appealed to, and importuned by petitions, for the right of pre-emption. Those gentlemen who were opposed to the pre-emption principle ought certainly, in Mr. C.'s judgment, to oppose a suspension of surveys. The lands would be settled as fast as they were acquired. It had been long the practice to permit such settlement, and, when occupied and improved, the right of pre-emption had been, and Mr. C.

hoped always would be, accorded. Looking either to the settlement of new tracts of country, or the interest of the Government, Mr. C. saw no good reason for withholding the appropriation. There had been none made last year; in consequence of which, we were in arrears; for the discharge of which, as well as the expense of the present year, the sum proposed by the committee was intended; which, we are informed by the honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] does not exceed the average amount appropriated for the same purpose for some years past. Mr. C. saw no necessity for further remarks, and hoped the question would be promptly settled.

Mr. STRONG said he did not understand the subject under consideration so well as he could wish, and hoped the gentleman who reported the bill would give the necessary information to enable him to act understandingly. Surveys might be necessary in Michigan, Florida, Indiana, and perhaps some other State; but why ask for an appropriation of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars? In 1828, but forty-five thousand dollars was appropriated; in 1829, fifty-one thousand dollars. In 1830, there was no appropriation—the Commissioner of the General Land Office having informed the House that there was a balance of eighty-four thousand dollars on hand. He desired to know what rendered the proposed appropriation necessary; and would also like to be informed of the necessity of bringing into market so great an amount of lands as the sum proposed to be appropriated would survey, in addition to those lands already surveyed. The Commissioner of the General Land Office had designated certain sections of the public domain which it was expedient to have surveyed the present year; but this survey would not require the sum proposed to be appropriated. Why then grant so much, unless we have abandoned all notions of economy? If any substantial reasons could be shown why the proposed appropriation was necessary, he hoped they would be given.

Mr. VERPLANCK said, that since he had been a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, he had often noticed the singular contrast in which he was placed when here, and when in the committee room. There were numerous demands before the committee, and their object was to reduce appropriations proposed to as small an amount as possible; while here, in this House, that committee was accused of extravagance. Such, in part, was the imputation cast upon them by the motion now before the House. The requisition made upon the General Land Office by the surveyors, for the present year, had been two hundred thousand dollars; the commissioner of that office, considering the sum too great, had reduced it to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; the Committee of Ways and Means, in the fulfilment of what they considered their duty, had asked for an appropriation of only one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The proposed amount would pay the arrearages of the last year, and leave for the surveys of the present year a sum averaging the amount appropriated for surveys for the last eight or nine years—perhaps it would fall below that average—the allowance, after paying arrearages, would leave about eighty or ninety thousand dollars. If gentlemen would examine, they would find that to be about the average sum appropriated for the survey of the public lands since the year 1831. Mr. V. then alluded to the valuable lands in Louisiana, the survey and settlement of which had long been retarded by claims of individuals having grants from the former Governments, which possessed that country, and spoke of the great desire of this Government to bring those lands into market. He said, if the proposed amendment now under consideration prevailed, it would reduce the appropriation for surveys to about thirty thousand dollars—a sum altogether inadequate. He hoped this encroachment on the usual course of the Government would not be made.

The Committee of Ways and Means had done their duty in proposing the appropriation, and it was for the House to decide whether the appropriation should be made or not.

Mr. SEVIER, of Arkansas, said he had witnessed with regret the opposition manifested by the gentleman from Virginia to the appropriation for surveying the public lands. I am one, said Mr. S., who believe the appropriation for this object should be increased, rather than diminished. We are told by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the surveys of the public lands have not advanced to the extent desired, in consequence of no appropriation having been made at the last session of Congress. We are told, from the same quarter, that, to meet the expenses of the surveys made in 1830, and those which will be required in 1831, an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be necessary. With this information before us, I am at a loss to account for the gentleman's opposition. The department, I humbly conceive, should be given the funds required. The department should have more than is required. Why do I think more than is asked should be given? I take for granted the commissioner has formed his estimate for those surveys which he considers are demanded immediately; and in this estimate I discover he has said the surveys in Missouri, Illinois, and Arkansas, have been made to an extent equal to the present demand. It is not for me to attend to the interest of Missouri and Illinois: those States have their representatives upon this floor, who can answer for themselves. But of my own country I profess to have some little knowledge. I hope the commissioner will pardon me when I tell him the surveys of the public lands in Arkansas have not been equal to the present demand. I hope he will not persist in this opinion, when I assure him that there are many counties containing thousands of inhabitants, which I have the honor to represent, in which not one foot of the public lands has ever been surveyed. I trust he will forgive me when I tell him that the surveys of the very land bordering upon the capital of Arkansas, and the most valuable of any we have, are yet incomplete. My constituents conceive that their interest in this particular has been grossly neglected; and for this neglect they have complained, and do yet complain, of the commissioner of our land office and our surveyor general. I am far from attributing any sinister motive to the worthy commissioner. I do not believe he wishes, by the management of his office, to retard the growth and settlement of that country. I must attribute his report to a woful ignorance of our wants. I must believe he has been too much engaged in his office to learn with sufficient accuracy the map of that distant and neglected country.

By examining the report of the commissioner, we discover that a smaller quantity of the public land has been sold in Arkansas than in any other section of the Western country; that, including all of the public sales from 1822 to 1830, there have not been sixty thousand dollars paid to the Government. Why has such an insignificant sum been received from the sales of the public land in that country? The commissioner himself ought to be able to answer the question. It is because there has been but little good land surveyed and in market. In what manner, sir, have the surveys in Arkansas been conducted? You have given us no surveyor general to reside among us. He resides in St. Louis, four hundred miles from our capital. He knows nothing of the situation of our country; is governed entirely in letting out his contracts by the representations of deputy surveyors. These deputies know their own interest. Their engagements to survey are generally in the prairies, and in the poor and barren sections of the country. Sir, I do not blame them. They could not afford to survey the rich lands of Arkansas, covered with cane, and almost impenetrable forests, for three dollars a mile. To provide against this evil, at the last session of Congress, an act was passed authorizing the surveyor general to allow his deputies for surveying the good lands in Arkansas, four dollars a mile. When such lands as these are surveyed—lands like these, upon which our settlements are almost entirely confined, you will perceive a very great increase in the income to the Government from the sales of the public lands.

At the last session of Congress an act was passed granting, for a limited period, the right of pre-emption to settlers upon the public lands. That act is about expiring, and but few of the citizens of Arkansas have availed themselves of its provisions. And why? Because the lands upon which they live have not been surveyed. They petition Congress at this present session to continue the act in force for a longer period of time. And why? Because the land upon which they live has not been surveyed. Yet the commissioner tells us the surveys in Arkansas have been made to an extent equal to the present demand.

Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia what difference it would make to the Government if all the public lands in each State and Territory were surveyed during the present year. The information the surveys would afford would surely be desirable to the Government; and I apprehend, at no future day, the cost for surveying would not be less than it is at present. The honorable gentleman seems to fear that the corners made by the surveyors in the prairies would be destroyed by fire, and, as a consequence of which, the land would have to be surveyed again. If that gentleman had been in prairies as often as I have, he would have known that these corners are made of other materials than wood; he would have known that at each corner mounds were made, which fire can never destroy. There is no instance within my knowledge, when the public lands have ever been twice surveyed, for this or any other cause.

What would be the consequence if you were to stop the public surveys? Would you not injure the Government? Would you not deprive it of an annual income by no means insignificant? Would you not find it impossible to keep off settlers from the public lands? They would come and occupy it, wear out the soil, destroy the timber, without paying a tax to the federal or local Government. This would be the consequence to the General Government; and, by stopping the surveys, you would injure our own citizens. They would live in constant dread and uncertainty: they would make no valuable or lasting improvements, for fear of losing their labor. By such a course, you would limit exportation, weaken the agricultural interest, and, of course, the great resources of individuals and the General Government. I shall trespass no longer upon the indulgence of the House. I hope the proposed amendment will be rejected.

Mr. YINTON said he was glad that the gentleman from Virginia had submitted his motion, and hoped it would prevail. He was one of those who believed the operations of the surveying department, for some years past, had gone to great excess, producing highly injurious effects throughout the whole Western country, and seriously deranging the land office department. It was time to bring back the land system to a healthy action; such as it possessed prior to the late war. The survey of land was a step preparatory to its being exposed to sale; and when surveyed, it would be forced into market, whether the quantity on hand would justify its introduction or not. It will hence be obvious that the surveying department really regulates the proportion between the demand for land, and the quantity in market; and it is only by a skilful and judicious management of that department, that any just proportion between the supply and the demand can be maintained. The land office commenced its operations under the present system in 1801. For the first fifteen years, and up to the close of the war, the quantity of land surveyed, making due allowances for bad land, did not go materially beyond the demand. That was the period of the greatest prosperity in the Western country. The value of both public and private property was sustained; a circumstance that gave activity to the sales, and confidence to the purchaser.

Shortly after the war, this salutary policy was lost sight of. Immense districts of country were surveyed and suddenly thrown into market, so that, at the close of 1825, there had been surveyed in all one hundred and thirty-eight millions of acres; and for the five last years, great quantities have also been surveyed, probably amounting to some forty or fifty millions more; the exact amount not known. Of these one hundred and thirty-eight millions then surveyed, between twenty-three and twenty-four millions had not been brought into market. At that time, the entire quantity sold since the year 1800 was less than twenty millions—between 1825 and the present time, the sales have amounted to about one million of acres per annum.

We have not been informed what quantity of surveyed land that is now on hand, has not yet been brought into market. It is to be presumed it has not been diminished since that time. The result of these facts is, that, at the close of 1825, and probably at the present time, the quantity surveyed and prepared for sale, but not yet brought into market, exceeds the whole amount sold for these thirty years, and exceeds also the existing annual demand about twenty-five times. That the quantity now in market, and seeking a purchaser, exceeds the annual demand more than one hundred times, and is about seven times as much as the whole amount sold since the year 1800. Now it must be borne in mind that the land system is nothing more nor less than a great concern for vending land; and, like any other article, if more of it is forced into market than can possibly be used, the inevitable consequences of a glut in the market, a depression in the value of the property of the public and of individuals, and the derangement and distress incident to such a state of things, must follow. We here, sir, get at the true cause of the growing complaints of the new States. Every part of the Western country is oppressed with this operation, and dissatisfaction every where prevails. The old settlements are dissatisfied, because you crowd into market such vast bodies of land around them, as to depress the value of the property they have purchased of you, faster than they can add to it by their labor. A farmer in Ohio, who has devoted to his farm the labor of his life, and that of his family, can scarcely dispose of it at this day, with all its improvements, for as much as he has paid you for it some twenty or thirty years ago. He has a right to be dissatisfied with this unreasonable glut, and he is dissatisfied. While he expects you will sell the public domain, he has a right to demand of you that you shall not so conduct that operation as to destroy the value of his property without benefit to yourself. Good faith forbids you to do so. The new settlements, if possible, are still more oppressed by this state of things. On a sudden you have thrown into market a hundred millions of acres of land, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Upper Lakes, requiring many millions of inhabitants to convert them to use. A few of them are taken up, and very sparse settlements are scattered here and there over the whole country. There is not a surplus population in the United States that can be detached from their present situations and employments to people the vast region of country thus open for settlement: nor can there be such a surplus for a generation yet to come. These new settlements, therefore, fill up very slowly—and in the newest settlements the sales are, generally speaking, the most limited in amount. The occupants see vast bodies of excellent land around them, without any one to buy—every thing goes on heavily, and they naturally enough think the Government retards their growth; and bring themselves to the belief that the country around them is not sold and settled on account of the price at which the Government holds it being too high.

Surveys of the Public Lands.

The anxiety of all new formed settlements to increase their numbers is very great; and that anxiety not being gratified, and suffering under the inconveniences incident to a new country, they become greatly dissatisfied, and charge the whole fault to the Government. Hence the agitation that is constantly kept up on this subject in the new States, and the high toned pretensions of Illinois in particular, about the right of property. We are now called upon to add to and aggravate this distressing state of things, by surveying four thousand six hundred townships more, amounting to one hundred and three millions of acres, at an expense of a million of dollars. The appropriation proposed in the bill will survey twelve millions of them, and is but the entering wedge of others that are to follow to execute this great project. Can any man entertain a doubt as to the effect of adding to the quantity now in market the enormous amount of one hundred and three millions of acres?

It has been already shown that there are now in market many millions which we have no ability to people; and is it not far better that some portion of the vast regions now in market should be disposed of and settled, before we bring any considerable additional quantities into market? If any particular settlement should take a direction into an unsurveyed region, Mr. V. said he would survey and bring it into market, so that the market might always be kept fully adequate to any demand. Beyond that he would not go for the present.

The quantity of land now in market being far greater than any existing demand for settlement, and of as good quality as any that remains to be surveyed, it follows as a necessary consequence, that, by increasing the quantity, you do not in reality open any additional room for settlement; nor can you expect in that way to add a single inhabitant to the aggregate population of the new States. All that you can effect by this operation, is, to diffuse our population over a greater region of country, where, in point of fact, the sparseness of population in that already settled is among the greatest evils it has to overcome. He said he most conscientiously believed that the vast bodies of land that now glutted the market, had depressed the actual value of the public domain, and of private property, at least fifty per cent. below what it would have been if a proper regard had been paid in adjusting the supply to the demand; while he did not believe the aggregate population of the country is any greater than it would have been by keeping the market always fully supplied, without going materially beyond that point. The hundred millions now proposed to be prepared for sale must inevitably produce still greater depression, in both public and private property, to an extent that no one can, with certainty, foretell. The land now in market is diffused throughout all the new States and Territories. There is not one of them where the quantity in market is not now more than thirty times as great as the annual sales, and in many of them many hundred times as great. And, singular as it may seem, where the disproportion is the greatest, the call for additional quantities is the most urgent.

The gentleman from Arkansas is very anxious for this appropriation, and informs us the settlement of that territory is retarded for want of land in market. Now, it appears that, so long ago as 1825, more than eleven millions of acres had been surveyed in that territory. What quantity had been since surveyed, he did not know; but the entire amount of sales for the last year did not exceed one thousandth part of the quantity surveyed and unsold; indeed, the whole amount sold would not make more than half a dozen good plantations; and the whole sales ever made there would very little more than pay the salaries and expenses of making the sales, without taking into the account more than a hundred thousand dollars paid for the surveys already made. Nothing can show more forcibly than this case, that it is not additional land that is wanted; but it is people that is wanted, to occupy those already exposed to sale. The gentleman from Florida had also expressed his anxiety about this appropriation. In 1825, the amount surveyed in that territory was about three millions of acres, and he believed about the same quantity had been surveyed within the last five years, while the annual sales in that territory do not amount to a fiftieth part of that quantity. The same remarks were applicable to Michigan, and, in general, to all the new States. For these reasons, he could not see any necessity for expending a larger sum than is proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. His amendment would leave at the disposal of the department, after discharging the arrearages now due, thirty thousand dollars, which would survey three millions of acres for the current year, while the sales will not probably much exceed one million. If we should come back again to the old principle and practice before the war, from which we have departed, and hereafter survey some two or three millions per annum, we should then keep constantly on hand and exposed to sale one hundred times as much as the annual demand. But in that way we should prevent things from growing worse, and avoid further unnecessary depression in the public property, or that of individuals. He thought it to be our duty to afford a reasonable protection to both. Entertaining these opinions, he hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia would be adopted.

Mr. DUNCAN, of Illinois, said, though he felt very anxious that an appropriation should be made to continue the surveys of the public land, he had intended to permit the vote to be taken without submitting a remark, as he considered the requisition of the Treasury Department, and the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, as ample evidence for the House to form their judgment upon; but, he said, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] had spoken of pretensions set up by Illinois, in such a manner as to justify him, he hoped, in troubling the House with a few remarks in reply. He said he had heard nothing of Illinois until the gentleman had himself mentioned it, and was at a loss to know what was meant by the gentleman's remark. He assured him that he would urge nothing for Illinois, on this or any other occasion, that was not just and proper to be granted. He said, by the gentleman's own showing, it would be seen that a very large portion of the State of Illinois was yet to be surveyed—only twenty-seven out of forty odd millions had been surveyed. Mr. D. spoke of the quality of the soil and beauty of the country in the northern section of Illinois, and north of it, and the prospect of its immediate settlement when surveyed and brought into market. He said there was now, and had been for several years, a large number of citizens, estimated at near ten thousand, residing in the northern part of Illinois, far beyond the present surveys; that an equal or greater number resided north of the State, in the Northwest territory, where there was not an acre of public land surveyed. He hoped that a statement of these facts would sufficiently show the necessity of extending the surveys in Illinois and Michigan; and from statements he had heard made by other gentlemen, it was clear to his mind that the necessity was equally pressing in other sections of the country. He said, if further evidence of the necessity of these surveys was necessary, he could refer the House to several petitions now upon their files.

Mr. D. said, the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] in opposition to this appropriation was such as he would have expected from the land speculator; and if he were permitted to make a guess, judging from his speech alone, he should say, that the gentleman was himself an extensive landholder or speculator in lands.

[Mr. VINTON here rose, and denied that he was a land speculator, or that he was the owner of any quantity of wild lands.]

H. OF R.]

Surveys of the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER remarked, that the gentleman from Illinois did not say that the gentleman from Ohio was a speculator; if he had, he should have stopped him, as such a remark would have been out of order.

Mr. D. proceeded, and said, that the whole argument of the gentleman was in favor of keeping up the price of private land, by keeping the public land out of market; which he said was a policy peculiarly favorable to the land speculator, and oppressive to the poor, who has his home yet to purchase. He said that a farmer, who wanted his land for his own use, cared but little whether it was estimated at a high or low price; nor did such men generally care at how low a rate their poor neighbors purchased their homes; it was only those, he said, who had land to sell, that felt much interest about the price it bears.

Mr. D. believed it to be the true policy of the Government to survey all the lands within the States and Territories as soon as possible, and bring them into market. He thought it quite probable that there were enough settlers at this moment on the unsurveyed land, who are prepared to purchase their homes, to pay enough at once to defray the expense of surveying all the public lands yet to be surveyed in the States. He said, in reply to the fear expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McCox,] that the public lands would have to be resurveyed, that he believed the suggestion was entitled to little or no consideration, as there never had been a case of the kind; and he believed, from the manner of executing those surveys, that there never would be such a necessity, unless the survey should be erroneous. He thought it was too late for gentlemen to succeed in an attempt to arrest the emigration to the West. People, he remarked, are now settled, in large or small bodies, in nearly every district of the public lands where the Indian title has been extinguished; and he held it to be the duty, as well as the best policy of the Government, to afford them an opportunity of purchasing their homes as soon as possible, and on the most favorable terms.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he was opposed to the motion made by the member from Virginia, [Mr. McCox,] to reduce the amount of appropriation for the surveying of the public lands; and he observed he should have given a silent vote on the question, but for the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Vinton,].

If the amount of the appropriation in this bill is to depend upon the soundness of the policy which that gentleman advocates, in reference to the public lands, this House will bear with me, said Mr. W., for a few moments, whilst I expose the unsoundness of such a policy—its utter ruin to the Western country. It is a policy which belongs not to the West: it has its origin and permanent residence in other regions. Feeling a lively interest for the growth and prosperity of the land of my birth, and of my home, I am compelled to rise in my place, to-day, and, in the name of the whole West, the entire West, the "further West," repudiate the doctrines advanced by the gentleman from Ohio. These doctrines and opinions belong not to the West: they are exotics, and cannot flourish in that climate.

I do this, sir, thus explicitly, because these opinions, emanating from so respectable a source as the member from Ohio, may hereafter be referred to as furnishing evidence of the public sentiment now, among a people with whom it is my pride to have lived.

The gentleman, as a representative of the West, is peculiar in his opinions on this subject. I doubt if another man, west of the mountains, in or out of this House, thinks as he does upon this very interesting question. I attribute to the gentleman every sincerity of motive to which he is entitled. His opinions are the results of early impressions in the land of his birth, (New England,) where they have been long cherished, and which were boldly unfolded at the last session, in the resolution of a Senator from Connecticut, the pretext (not the subject-matter) of a long and able debate in the Senate, upon every other subject save the one proposed by the resolution.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, it is not the wish of the gentleman to renew that discussion in this House upon an item in an appropriation bill. If it be the object of the member to get up a discussion upon the subject of the public lands, I invoke him to submit his proposition—let us see its length and breadth upon paper, in a tangible form, that we may discuss it, and vote it down. What are the objections of the member from Ohio to the appropriation now under consideration, and the arguments by which these objections are sustained? The gentleman says, we have more land now surveyed than we shall be able to sell in thirty years; and he has furnished us with the tables of the quantity surveyed, and number of acres sold. His statistics I do not controvert. Admit the facts and his inferences, is it any argument against continuing the surveying? If the argument is worth any thing, it would have its full weight upon a proposition to suspend, by law, the sales, not the surveying, of the public lands. We are not obliged to bring the lands into market so soon as surveyed, if it be the policy of the Government to limit the sales of the public lands, and confine the population to the States and Territories already surveyed. If it were proper to do this, and a law were now passed, declaring that not another section of public land should be surveyed until the last acre now surveyed was sold and occupied, still it would be proper to progress with the surveying, that the Government should know something of the quality, soil, and situation of the public domain.

Other reasons might be urged why the surveying of the public lands should progress rapidly; but I pass by them, to consider the main point in the gentleman's argument, which has often been presented to us in this or some other shape, and by the member from Ohio especially. And that is, if I understand it correctly, the United States, by her land system, by the reduction of the price of the public lands, holds out inducements to the citizens of the older States to emigrate, and purchase land for themselves, thereby extending our settlements beyond the limits which a true regard to the interest of the Government, and of individual landholders, will justify. And, again: By the immense quantity of public land which the Government has brought, and is still bringing into market, the quantity is greater than the demand; consequently, the price of landed estate in the hands of individual purchasers from the Government is less, and more than one-half its value, thus producing ruin upon whole communities, as well as operating injustice to individuals.

I have, Mr. Speaker, given the substance of the gentleman's argument, if not his words. I invite him to review it himself, and see if he is willing to stand by it. I propose to analyze it briefly, that we may see if it be founded upon that public policy which has, and which I hope ever will be pursued by this Government: a policy connected with her true interests and future welfare—a policy which will give physical strength and moral energy to the population of the United States. I mean such a disposition of her public lands as will put it in the power of every man, however poor and humble in society, to acquire a home for himself, and a fireside for his family. With a population of freeholders, of men who have their homes with all the interesting endearments which belong to that name, and a Government to which they may turn and look upon as a benefactor, what have our free institutions to fear from intestine divisions or foreign invasion? Nothing, sir—nothing.

With a Government like ours, and our citizens freeholders, liberty must ever be secure in this her favored land. No hostile Power will dare plant upon our borders his footsteps. I wish I could offer stronger inducements than at present exist, to my countrymen, who are the tenants, and give more than half their substance and labor to landlords, to pull up the stakes, and take up the line of march to a country where the labor of six months will buy them a home of far better land than that upon which they eke out a miserable existence of labor and penury, that aristocracy may live in splendor and pomp. The effect of the gentleman's policy is to continue this state of things. He insists that the United States shall not bring her public lands into market; because, by doing so, the value of the real estate of individuals is lessened—they can neither sell nor rent their lands so high. Our population is extending itself, and the older States sustain a material injury.

Land is too cheap already, says the gentleman. I will recollect the policy recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Rush,) under the last administration; and this argument of the gentleman from Ohio has called it to memory at the present moment. He, sir, was in favor of what is now a very fashionable term, "the American system." He was, in his report, justifying the principle, that the agricultural interest of the West ought to be taxed, to support the manufacturing interest of the East; because, in his opinion, Congress, by the reduced price at which public lands were sold, gave to agriculture a bounty equivalent to the increase of taxation in favor of manufactures; and if my memory does not deceive me, he condemned the policy thus pursued, because it excited to emigration from the manufacturing districts, and thereby enhanced the price of labor to the manufacturer; and thence deduced an argument in favor of this taxation upon the farming interests, for the benefit of the manufacturing States. How was this argument received in the West? With universal disapprobation, as the elections of 1828 will attest. I protest against it in every shape, whenever and however used. That policy which has for its object to build up an interest in this country at the expense of the farming interest, which has for its purpose the concentration of population, in order to reduce the price of labor, and exact from it its hard earnings to sustain a particular interest—call it by whatever name you will, give to it all the charms which impassioned eloquence can claim—I am utterly opposed to it.

And this, Mr. Speaker, is the tendency of the gentleman's argument. He, too, thinks that the facility which this Government affords to a poor man to escape from the vassalage of a tenant to the freedom of a landholder, lessens the price of lands in the hands of individuals, and increases the price of labor. But, sir, the gentleman claims it as an act of justice which we owe to those who have bought lands of the Government heretofore at two dollars per acre, to hold up our lands. For what purpose? That these purchasers may sell again, to realize a profit, I suppose.

Again: The gentleman says the price of land has fallen to half its former value, in consequence of the policy which the United States has pursued in reference to her public domain for the last twelve or fourteen years. I deny that it is owing to this cause entirely, if, indeed, at all. Other and more immediate causes must present itself to the inquiring mind. Is it in this country alone that the price of real estate has fallen? Is real estate in this country the only estate that has depreciated? No, sir, every thing has sunk in value, and the true cause may be traced by the political economist in the appreciation of the medium of exchange—the precious metals; and the man who buys his land now in Illinois at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, pays as much for it as the gentleman's constituents, who bought seventeen or eighteen years ago at two dollars per acre. Sir, he pays more, according to the comparative value of specie then and now, as estimated by the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on your table. This policy of stopping the surveying of the public lands now, will very well suit the gentleman's own State, where every acre has been surveyed, and subject to location. Stop the surveys, and limit the sales in other States and Territories, and you will perhaps increase the tide of emigration to the great and flourishing State of Ohio, and you may increase the value of lands owned by private individuals too. Is it our duty to do this? Shall we, by our legislation, attempt to restrain the tide of emigration? You might as well, sir, attempt to stay the tide of that mightiest of rivers which gives name and consequence to the Western country. There are reasons, however, sir, unconnected with this view of the subject, why the surveying of the public lands should progress with accelerated rapidity. The tide of emigration in front is forced on by its succeeding wave, and your public lands will be occupied by your citizens, and improved, whether you survey them or not; and what is the consequence? At every session of Congress, at this session, we are compelled to interrupt our regular system of disposing of the public lands, by granting to these honest pioneers the right of settlement and pre-emption. No Congress has yet refused it; no Congress will refuse it. My situation as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, enables me to speak of the fact, if it has not already attracted the attention of the House, that petitions from every quarter in behalf of this worthy class of our population now lie upon your table, calling upon you to extend to them the privileges of the pre-emption law of last session, upon the ground that the land on which they reside had not been surveyed; consequently, they could not avail themselves of the beneficent provisions of that act. We must grant it them; we cannot refuse; and I hope no American Congress will be found willing to expose the home, the labor, of a citizen to the highest bidder, with a view to wring from him the last dollar to pay for that which his own labor has produced—his little tenement, the shelter of his family. There is but one way to stop these appeals, and that is, by surveying the land as speedily as possible. You cannot prevent your citizens from taking possession of the public lands. You may pass your penal laws to prevent it, but you cannot enforce them. The public sentiment and feeling are against such laws, and they would be dead letters on your statute book. I trust, sir, the amendment will not prevail, and that the Government will be permitted to progress with all reasonable despatch to execute the surveys, and bring the lands into market.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, that the delays and difficulties succeeding the acquisition of Florida by the United States, the time required for the examination and decision of the claims derived from the former Government, and the removal of the Indians, had retarded the surveys of the public lands in that territory. Whatever might be the necessity in other quarters, where these embarrassments did not exist, he was sure it would operate injuriously to that part of the country whose interests it was his duty to guard on this floor. He was opposed to striking out the proposed appropriation, and most solemnly protested against the arguments on which it was urged upon the House. If he properly understood the honorable member from Ohio, he was in favor of striking out that section of the bill, because there were lands enough surveyed for the market; and offering new lands for sale would depreciate the price of that before purchased. This might suit the meridian of Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri, but it is not in accordance with the rights or interests of Arkansas and Florida. The gentleman has said that eight millions of acres have been surveyed in Florida, because he has a printed statement saying that twenty-four millions were to be surveyed in 1825. I do not believe, at that time, that there was half a million surveyed; and the only way in which it can be accounted for is, that the author of the paper he holds in his hands put down the private land claims that were held under the treaty, as no part of the public lands to be surveyed.

H. OF R.]

Surveys of the Public Lands.

[Mr. VINTON explained: He said he had derived his information from the statistical tables of Van Zandt and Wattertson. From these, it appeared that, in 1825, three millions of acres of lands had been surveyed in Florida; there were now seven millions surveyed. There were said to have been thirty-one millions of acres of land purchased by the United States in Florida. By a statement of the delegates from that territory, read from the Clerk's table yesterday, it appeared that twenty-four millions of acres remained to be surveyed, and the gentleman could therefore make his own calculations of the quantity that had been already surveyed.]

Mr. W. continued, urging the many considerations of policy and expediency of proceeding with the surveys, the necessity for encouraging settlement and population. He stated that the poor settlers who were entitled, by the bounty of the Government, to a pre-emption, could not enter their lands for want of an extension of the surveys.

Mr. PETTIS, of Missouri, said the House was then engaged in a discussion on a subject about which it appeared to be in order to say any and every thing, save that which related to the subject itself. He was not disposed to follow the example set him. Whilst he was anxious to avoid every remark calculated to produce the least excitement, he was very desirous of having an opportunity of placing the subject of the surveying of the public lands in its proper light before the House.

Mr. P. begged leave to remind gentlemen of what had frequently occurred in the House when any discussion took place on the subject of the public lands. Whenever any proposition was before it proposing to amend the system in regard to the mode of disposing of the public lands, whenever it was proposed to reduce the price of these lands, yea, the refuse of these lands, and that to actual settlers, in small parcels; we of the new States have had it rung in our ears from various quarters of the hall; we have been entreated by gentlemen not to interrupt the existing system in regard to these lands. We have been told that the system was devised by the wisest men of the nation, and matured by the wisdom of experience. They have said to us, "let us go on in the usual way; we are disposed to be liberal to the new States." Sir, said Mr. P., the tune is now changed. The gentlemen are themselves proposing an innovation of the most prejudicial character to the new States and to the Territories. Your Committee of Ways and Means have told you that the estimate made by the several surveyors was $200,000 dollars; that made and sent in by the Treasury Department was $150,000; and the committee propose appropriating but $130,000 for the surveys to be made the ensuing year. We all know that no appropriation was made for this object at the last session; and the committee have told us that the land office department was, in consequence, $30,000 in arrears. The committee have stated that the appropriation recommended by them is about the average of such appropriations made during the last seven or eight years, and not so much as had been appropriated for many years previous thereto. Notwithstanding these facts, we have seen the gentlemen heretofore so much opposed to innovation, proposing to strike out the appropriation recommended, and inserting less than half that sum. We have been told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] that this is an enormous appropriation, and that the sales of the public lands do not justify it. The net proceeds of these sales for the last year amounted to nearly two millions of dollars. Can this appropriation, then, be considered enormous? That gentleman has told us that, from 1815 to 1820, the Government surveyed and brought into market too great a portion of these lands, and that the consequence had been a great depreciation in the value of lands in the hands of individuals. And he now opposed the present appropriation, because, as he says, it will bring too much land into market, and the result will be a further depreciation of the price of private property. Mr. P. said he was not disposed to attribute personal motives to the gentleman from Ohio, but he did impute to him considerations of State interest. The true secret is, that Ohio has no more public lands to be surveyed. All the public lands within her limits were surveyed during the time when, according to the gentleman from Ohio, the Government was pursuing an extravagant course in regard to these surveys. We then heard no objection from Ohio. It is well known, that, during that period, Ohio had grown up in a manner unparalleled in the history of the world. Large appropriations for surveying were then well enough. Nearly all the public lands within her limits have been sold, and now we are called on to stop the surveys, for fear it may have an injurious effect upon private property in Ohio. We must not, it is said, bring these lands into competition with private lands in that State. They have reaped their harvest; they have had their lands surveyed and sold under this system; the private property of the citizens of the old States has, if you please, been depreciated in value for the benefit of Ohio; this State has rapidly populated from the old States under this system; but now, forsooth, Ohio having all she desires, the system of surveying is to be stopped for her benefit, to keep up the value of her private property, and to keep her population from being induced to migrate further west. This is not all; there is another motive. On a certain occasion, a million of acres of the public lands were given to Ohio for making canals. He would not say it was given by way of bribe. It is true, however, that, at a particular crisis, two bills were pushed through Congress, having different and opposing friends, each bill making a donation of about 500,000 acres of land. These lands have been selected in small parcels from the best of the public lands in that State; and now the survey of other public lands is to be checked, to prevent other lands from being brought in competition with these lands, thus given and thus selected, and to keep up their value. Sir, said Mr. P., is this liberal? Is it generous? Is it fair? He would not say it was unjust, but he would say it was very unfair. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] not satisfied with using these arguments, has thought proper to state that the most of the revenue arising from the sales of public lands is drawn from the old land districts, and consequently from Ohio. Sir, the gentleman is mistaken. The fact is not so. The sales of the public lands in the State of Illinois, for the last year, amount to nearly double the amount of those from Ohio. The sales in Missouri, in Indiana, and in Alabama, greatly exceed those of Ohio for the last year.

The gentleman from Ohio has based his opposition to this bill on the ground that there is already more land in market than is demanded by purchasers. He contends that the Government should act as an individual, and not permit the supply to exceed the demand for it. Was not this the case when the Government was making such liberal appropriations for surveys in Ohio? Could the gentleman, at any period referred to, have said, in favor of more surveys, that the Government can sell more lands in the next year than are already surveyed? Shall we now change our course for the benefit of Ohio, who, from her proximity to the old States, has always possessed a great advantage over other new States? Shall the Government hug the public lands as a treasure for mere purposes of revenue? Shall they prize their lands as the sordid miser does his gold? This doctrine has been utterly disclaimed by all parties in another quarter. The proposition to stop the surveys of the public lands had been discussed at great length in the quarter referred to. It received a decisive negative, not only then, but, as was then believed, its everlasting quietus, by the good people of this nation. Believing this question at rest forever, he had been taken by surprise in this debate. He would take this occasion to say, however, that he considered it the duty of the Government, and very important to the new States, that these lands should be brought into market as speedily as the United States can reasonably defray the expense thereof, and that every facility should be afforded to the extinguishment of the title of the Government in and to these lands. And to this end, he contended the price of these lands should be reduced, especially in favor of actual settlers. He made these remarks, because he was well satisfied that this opposition to the surveying of more lands was a preliminary step to the stand to be taken against any reduction of the price of public lands. Gentlemen have been railing against innovation in the land system, until they have got ready their own machinery; and now they are for a vigorous effort to oppress still further the new States, in regard to the public lands.

Mr. P. said he felt himself bound to take notice of the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VIN-ROX,] and by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] relative to the claims set up by some of the new States to the public lands. The gentleman from Ohio, in opposing this appropriation, has thought proper to urge, as a reason for his opposition, that some of the States had certain pretensions to the right of property in the lands within their limits; and insinuates that the United States should survey no more of these lands, because he says it is for the States thus setting up their claims. The gentleman from Kentucky, in repelling these insinuations, has indulged himself in ridicule of those who entertain such opinions. He has, indeed, uttered very severe denunciations against them. He was sorry to hear such remarks from that quarter; but he felt himself called on to make a reply. Mr. P. said it was well known to the House, that, during the last session, the new States were ridiculed, taunted, reproached, for the pretensions some of them had made to the right of property in the public domain within their limits. This was urged then as a reason why the proceeds of the lands should be divided among all the States, for the purposes of internal improvement and education. On that account, the public lands in the new States were to be seized on, and divided out among the old States. Observing the strong prejudices which had been excited by these insinuations, he attempted to remove them, by frankly and fully stating the arguments and grounds on which they relied for the justness of their conclusions. He had asked to be shown the part of the constitution which authorized the United States to hold lands within the limits of a sovereign State. He had insisted that, if the Government could hold these lands, and sell them, they could lease them, and make the citizens of the new States tenants to the United States. He had urged, that the practice of the Government, in regard to crown lands in the old States, showed what the first opinions under the constitution were on this subject. He had, as politely and respectfully as he could, invited gentlemen to answer his arguments. No one, not even the gentleman from Kentucky, had met the argument. None had undertaken the task. The subject had, it is true, been touched on in another body, and barely touched on, for the argument was not met. The gentleman from Kentucky had now, for the first time, alluded to the subject, and, instead of meeting the argument, he has undertaken to denounce the doctrine as a dream, a vision, a popularity-hunting scheme. [Here Mr. WICKLIFFE asked leave to explain: He said he assured the gentleman from Missouri that he did not allude to him. He had neither heard nor read his speech, and was not thinking of it.] I thought so, continued Mr. P. I thought the gentleman had neither heard nor read my speech; and that may be one reason why he does not understand the subject. The House will pardon me for saying it is the gentleman's misfortune. If he had read my speech, he would not, I am sure, have indulged in the remarks he made. Mr. P.

said, of one thing, however, he was certain; the only way the gentleman could refute the arguments would be, by voting against the measure if ever it shall come before him.

But to return to the immediate subject before us, Mr. P. said he considered the Government pledged to take the most liberal steps to settle and sell the public lands. In 1780, the old Congress, when they invited the States to surrender their wild lands, made a sacred pledge that these lands should be settled and sold, and formed into distinct republican States, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States. Shall we not redeem this pledge? How can it be redeemed, but by having these lands surveyed? How can you have these lands sold and settled, without bringing the price within the means of the great body of purchasers? Sir, said Mr. P., if no amelioration is intended to be extended to us, we cannot, surely, bear a more rigid system. Let us have the usual appropriation for surveying, and adjust other matters in relation to these lands hereafter.

Mr. STRONG regretted that so much debate had taken place on the proposed amendment. He said he was in favor of going on with the surveys, and believed the usual appropriations for the purpose averaged about $50,000. He wanted to know, however, what had become of the $84,000, of which he had before spoken? Was it all expended last year for surveys? Was the department now in debt? His desire was to get at the facts. Had $84,000 been expended last year for surveys, and was the department in debt $80,000 more? If such was the fact, he wanted to know the reasons for so great an expenditure for the purpose. He was willing to give fifty or sixty thousand dollars a year for surveys, but he saw no necessity for granting a hundred or a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year to carry them on. He was desirous that the department should be out of debt, and then let the surveys go on as fast as they were necessary.

Mr. VERPLANCK said his colleague would find an answer to his inquiries, by turning to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, appended to the message of the President at the commencement of the present session, (from which he read an extract.) He said further, that the present appropriation would cover all arrearages.

Mr. VINTON said it was not his intention, after what he had said, to enter further into the debate; but the remarks that had been made, applicable, not to the question, but to himself personally, and to the State of Ohio, left no alternative but to vindicate himself and the State from which he came. When on the floor before, he had stated certain facts, and deduced from them what he thought to be fair arguments and inferences. No gentleman had disproved the facts, or met the argument, or refuted the inferences. But an attempt had been made to create a prejudice in the House against those arguments, unworthy the place and of those who have resorted to it. On every side he had been assailed by imputations directed at him personally and at his State.

The gentleman from Illinois had thrown out the unfounded insinuation that he was a land speculator, and had fitted his argument to his own interest; while the gentleman from Kentucky, who was followed up by the gentleman from Missouri, had thought proper to open an attack upon the State of Ohio, through him, by asserting that Ohio had been the favored State of the West, and when she had obtained all her ends, she was actuated by a desire to oppress and keep down the other new States. He would say to those gentlemen, one and all, that to answer an argument was one thing, and to fly away from it into insinuation was another. It was an artifice to escape from an argument, which no gentleman who had a proper self-respect would hazard in the face of an intelligent assembly. The gentleman from Missouri, in particular, had given himself great indulgence in insinuations against the State of Ohio. He had called on her delegation to do as they had been done by, and commented very much at large upon the favors which Ohio had received from Congress. He said that vast sums of money had been paid for surveying the lands in Ohio; that now they were all surveyed, she was anxious to arrest the surveys in Missouri, at the same time taxing Ohio with ingratitude and other sinister motives. Sir, if the gentleman from Missouri is desirous that his State should be treated, in respect to the public lands, as the State of Ohio has been, for himself he would ask and desire no more than that the gentleman from Missouri would, without insinuation, abide the application of the rule which he seems to be so anxious to get the benefit of. He wants the public lands surveyed in Missouri with the same rapidity with which that operation was carried on in Ohio. The surveys, sir, were commenced in Ohio in 1785, and were not completed in that State until after the year 1820, a period of more than thirty-five years. Now, sir, apply the rule of favored Ohio to Missouri, and the surveys will not be completed there these twenty years to come: thus much for that part of the insinuation that Ohio is unwilling to do for others that which has been done for her.

But, again, the gentleman says vast sums have been expended for surveys in Ohio, and now she refuses a similar favor to Missouri. During these thirty-five years, a little more than fourteen millions of acres were surveyed in Ohio, being the whole amount of public land in that State. In the course of some seven or eight years prior to 1825, about twenty-seven millions had been surveyed in Missouri, being an expenditure of nearly twice as much in Missouri as the whole amount of all the surveys made in Ohio, and, too, in less than one-fourth part of the time. Let the gentleman have the benefit of this example of favored Ohio, and the surveys in Missouri would stop for the present where they now are. Ohio has paid into the public treasury near twenty millions of dollars for land, while the receipts from Missouri have not gone much, if any, beyond a million and a half. Let Missouri follow this example, if the gentleman is really desirous to copy from Ohio, and then come and claim the grants and favors that have been bestowed on Ohio.

Mr. V. said he protested against the right of any gentleman here to arraign the motives of Ohio. Is Ohio to be put under the ban of her neighbors? Is she not a part of this Union? Has she not interests which it is the duty of this House to protect in common with her sister States? Have not her representatives a right to be heard on this floor, and to mingle in debate in questions like the present, in which she has more at stake, and a deeper interest, than any State in the Union? These, sir, are rights which her representatives on this floor will neither surrender nor cease to exercise, while they are faithful to her or true to themselves.

Mr. POLK said he did not intend unnecessarily to protract this unexpected discussion. His principal object was to call back the attention of the House to the real question before it. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had informed us that this was the usual and ordinary annual appropriation for this object; that it was below the average of appropriations for the survey of the public lands, for the last half dozen years or more; that it was much below the appropriations for the same object, between the years 1815 and 1821. To refuse it, would be suddenly to change what has, for a great series of years, been understood to be the settled policy of the Government in regard to its public domain. Were we now prepared to discuss or to decide that question? He trusted, upon this annual appropriation bill for the support of Government, we should not get into a discussion about the expediency of changing our past policy. If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia prevailed, more than half of it would be exhausted in paying arrearages for surveys made during the last year, and the sum remaining would be greatly less than the usual sum, and would be wholly inadequate to defray the expense of surveying that portion of the public lands which it might be the interest of the Government to survey, and bring into market the present year. The gentleman from New York had admonished us that we should have an eye to economy. He believed that he regarded economy in his votes in that House, as much as the gentleman from New York, or any other; but he denied that it was economy to postpone the surveys of the public lands. When once surveyed, the work had never to be done again. The expense of surveying them had to be incurred before they could be brought into market; and he thought it true economy to place them in a condition to be sold as speedily as possible, that the Government might realize the price of them. If the object of reducing the appropriation was to retard their sale, and thereby put a check to the emigration to the West, and prevent their speedy settlement, he trusted that we would not be compelled to discuss a question, so radically changing our policy, upon an appropriation bill. If economy was the object, there was the same reason for reducing the appropriation last year, or ten years ago, that there was now. He trusted that the House would take the question without further debate.

The question was now loudly demanded; and Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, asked what had been the average sum appropriated for surveys in past years?

Mr. VERPLANCK replied, that it had varied from seventy to one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars. The Committee of Ways and Means, after due examination, had fixed it at from ninety to one hundred thousand dollars. Going back to the year 1815, it would be found to be something more.

After a few words from Mr. INGERSOLL, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. STORRS, the question was put on agreeing to the amendment submitted by Mr. McCOR, and decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays not counted.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposed in Committee of the Whole, and was determined in the affirmative, without a division.

SALARY OF THE MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The question being then about to be put on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. STANBERY moved to strike out the appropriation for the salary of a minister to Russia for the present year. Mr. S. remarked, that the President had informed the House that the United States were not represented at the court of Russia, nor was it probable, Mr. S. said, that they soon would be. Under such circumstances, an appropriation certainly was not necessary, and he hoped it would be stricken out of the bill. He called for the yeas and nays on his motion; when,

On motion of Mr. CARSON, the House adjourned.

FROM THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER OF JANUARY 22.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton: In your report in this morning's paper of the debate on the 12th instant, concerning the appropriation for surveying the public lands, Mr. WICKLIFFE makes me urge the following objection against the appropriation: That "the United States, by her land system, by reduction of the price of public lands, holds out inducements to the citizens of the older States to emigrate, and purchase lands for themselves; thereby extending our settlements beyond the limits which a true regard to the interest of the Government and of individual landholders will justify." Having a seat at a distance from that occupied by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and hearing him but imperfectly, this statement by him of the argument he supposed I had used, wholly escaped my notice, or I should have set him right at the time. I presume the same circumstance occasioned his misapprehension of my remarks. I did not say what is imputed to me, nor any thing like it; and of course all that part of his speech which is intended to refute the argument he supposed me to have made, is misapplied. I never, upon the floor, or elsewhere, objected to the citizens of the old States emigrating to the new; nor did I, in that speech, say any thing about a reduction of the price of public lands. It had nothing to do with the subject under discussion. My objection was to surveying and bringing more land into market than there is a demand for. The price of public land being fixed by law at $1 25 per acre, the purchaser will pay that price, whether one million or one hundred millions are surveyed and brought into market.

As to the great question of reducing the price of public lands, I have submitted the result of my opinions respecting it, in the shape of an amendment to the graduation bill, and when that bill is called up, it will be time enough for me to express my views on that subject.

Yours, with great respect,

SAMUEL F. VINTON.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. MALLARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the tariff of duties on imports, and so much thereof as respects manufactures, made a report, (for which see Appendix.)

The report was laid on the table, and 6,000 copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONELL, from the same committee, submitted a counter report of the minority of the committee, and 6,000 copies of that were also ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF THE DUTY ON SUGAR.

The resolution of Mr. HAYNES, on the subject of the proposed reduction of the duties on brown sugar, was then taken up.

Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, after a few remarks, moved its postponement until Monday week, in order to allow time for the reception of certain documents which he wished to obtain on the subject.

Mr. HAYNES opposed the postponement of the question.

Mr. TUCKER said that he saw no necessity for deferring the consideration of the measure. For his own part, he could not perceive the object of the proposed postponement, nor could he imagine what beneficial results could be produced by it. What, said he, is the purport of this resolution? Does it commit the House in any manner? Does it involve us in a pledge to abandon or to pursue any line of policy in this matter? Does it impose on us the task of diminishing or continuing the present duty on sugar? No. It is simply a motion of inquiry on the part of the committee; and when that committee shall have investigated the subject, and reported upon it, then it will be the proper time for the House to enter upon a discussion of its merits. At present it surely is not in order to do so. When the proper time arrives, I, for one, shall have no objection to go into the whole question, and to take into consideration all the documents or evidence of any other kind, which may have a relation to the subject.

Mr. RAMSEY said, if the proposed motion prevailed, he should move that the resolution take another course; that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER said the question was now upon the postponement of the resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his hope that the motion for postponement would prevail. The subject of the resolution was one of the first importance to the country, and it was desirable to obtain every information possible before acting upon it. The Secretary of the Treasury would be enabled to furnish much information concerning it, by next week; and with the aid of that, the question would be more fully investigated than it could be now.

The further consideration of the resolution was finally postponed till Monday next.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The proposed instructions to the Committee on Public Expenditures, yesterday submitted by Messrs. CHILTON and HALL, were taken up, and debated by those gentlemen till the time allotted for the consideration of resolutions had expired.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The House then resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill: the question under consideration being the motion of Mr. STANBERRY to strike out of the bill the appropriation for the salary of the minister to Russia.

Mr. CARSON said he heard with surprise the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio; and it was with still more surprise he had heard the reason which the gentleman assigned for his motion; which was, that the House had been informed by the message of the President, that we had no minister at the court of Russia. The gentleman had mistaken the Executive message—he had mistaken the information which it conveyed to the House; and if the motion originated in that mistake, it fell to the ground. When a motion is submitted by a member, said Mr. C., courtesy requires that we suppose it to be prompted by a high sense of duty to this House, or to the country. It is for those who hear it to judge if it have any other motive. If any other design gave rise to the present motion—if it was meant as a covert blow at the Executive, it was a feeble one—the arm that struck it was too nerveless to reach its object. Mr. C. here read the following passage from the President's message:

"Our relations with Russia are of the most stable character. Respect for that empire, and confidence in its friendship towards the United States, have been so long entertained on our part, and so carefully cherished by the present Emperor and his illustrious predecessor, as to have become incorporated with the public sentiment of the United States. No means will be left unemployed on my part to promote these salutary feelings, and those improvements of which the commercial intercourse between the two countries is susceptible, and which have derived increased importance from our treaty with the Sublime Porte.

"I sincerely regret to inform you that our minister lately commissioned to that court, on whose distinguished talents and great experience in public affairs I place great reliance, has been compelled by extreme indisposition to exercise a privilege which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion, of leaving temporarily his post for the advantage of a more genial climate.

"If, as it is to be hoped, the improvement of his health should be such as to justify him in doing so, he will repair to St. Petersburg, and resume the discharge of his official duties. I have received the most satisfactory assurance that, in the mean time, the public interests in that quarter will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which he will continue, through the secretary of legation, with the Russian cabinet."

Minister to Russia.

Now, said Mr. C., does this justify the motion, and, as a measure of policy, would it be right to strike out the appropriation? What inference could be drawn from our refusing the appropriation, but that we were about to suspend our intercourse, and all amicable relations, with the court of Russia? Sir, General Jackson and the administration need no support from me. The administration speaks for itself, and can support itself.

Mr. STANBERRY rose, and replied that the motion was dictated by those principles which brought General Jackson into office. During the preceding administration, great clamor was heard about the profligate expenditure of the public money, and about constructive journeys—and a change of administration was urged for the purpose of correcting these abuses. But Mr. S. saw no difference between paying an officer for a constructive residence and for a constructive journey. The House had just heard read, that the minister sent to Russia does not reside there; we have all seen him here—we know him, and know that he cannot reside there—if he receive the public money as minister to Russia, without residing there, he will be paid for a constructive residence. We know, as far as we know any thing about him, that he resides in England, or in France—we know, at any rate, that he does not reside at his post in Russia, and have reason to believe that he will not reside there. Is it right to pay for duties thus performed? Might he not as well reside at home, and still be considered minister to Russia, as to reside in England or France, in that capacity? Mr. S. said that, in making the motion, he had aimed no covert blow at the administration—he had made the motion in pursuance of what he deemed his duty to the public. In doing so, he was acting as the individual in question would himself have acted, under similar circumstances, were he now a member of this House. If we are to pay that individual for the public services which it is said he has performed, let us do so directly, not indirectly—not pay him for those services, by giving him a salary for an office which he fills but in name. These principles I learned, said Mr. S., from that gentleman himself, in here listening to him with delight, while denouncing the abuses of other administrations in misapplying the public money.

Mr. ARCHER said, that when at the moment of the adjournment of the House last evening, as he understood, the motion had been submitted, he was not in his place, to take the notice of it which was due from him, in the relation in which he was placed to the discussion of topics of this character here. He had but a few words to offer in resistance of it now. It proposed to take from the appropriation the provision for the mission to Russia. If this were done, not the professed object only, the recall of the present minister to that court, but an effect much beyond it would be produced—the interdiction of any mission there at all. If there was to be no appropriation, no minister could be maintained—one more acceptable no more than the present. The operation then of the motion, if it could succeed, would be to suspend diplomatic relations with that Power—the greatest in the world—the Power with which our relations of amity had been the least interrupted, and the closest—to which, in great and vital collisions which might await us, we must look, if any where, for consentaneous policy and effective support. In this view of the subject, he should submit the motion to the decision of the House.

There were purposes, however, Mr. A. said, covered by the motion, which would induce him to trouble the House with a few observations. The gentleman aimed at by the motion, was from his own State—distinguished by a large share of its esteem; and some degree of sensibility might be supposed to be awakened by the attacks upon him, and on the Executive for his appointment, circulated very extensively, and now disclosing themselves here.

Exception had been taken to the appointment. With what propriety? The House might exert a restraining judgment, through the incidental operation of its power to deny appropriations, on the institution of missions. But in relation to the persons by whom they were to be filled, or the conduct of the incumbents in their discharge, it was not the province of the House to exercise judgment and discretion, but of the Executive. We intruded on that discretion, if we made any supposed conduct of the incumbents, as we did upon decency, if we made newspaper fabrications the ground of our proceeding on such subjects here. But where was the ground for imputation in any view in the present instance? As regarded the nomination, for which the Executive had been arraigned with censure so widely diffused and unsparing, the person receiving it—who was he? How many filled so large a space of reputation? Who was there remaining on the public theatre, who had filled so long and unbroken a space of public service—a career of active, and sedulous, and brilliant exertion, extending beyond the period of thirty years? His talents—where was any to be found superior, ripened in this long period of service, to the fullness, yet not beyond it, of the most fruitful maturity? His political attainments, they were not inferior to his talents. This was the nomination which had brought vehement vituperation on the Executive, as an extravagant abuse of its discretion of appointments.

But consider the matter in another view. A tried public servant, who, in a most active career of thirty years, has never sought official appointment, (as he did not this, which he has now received,) nor other reward, than the favor of his immediate constituents, and public esteem, retires, with health in some degree impaired, but his faculties and capacity of usefulness unbroken. Is it matter of just imputation on an Executive, which his exertions contributed to bring into the public service—representing a great political division in the nation of which he has been an eminent ornament—wholly unsolicited—when he had left the situation which might bring the motive of this proceeding into question—that it has been desirous to extend to a public servant, so circumstanced, an acknowledgment of merit—a mark of regard—a recall to renewed exertion of his abilities? Had not, Mr. A. would not say the individual, but the country, a right to expect this?

The complaint disclosed by the present motion, however, was not directly to the appointment of Mr. Randolph, but his absence at the present moment from the scene of his duties. The first suggestion in the party vituperation which had prevailed, was—that he had assumed this privilege of absenting himself, unpermitted. This suggestion had been repelled by the message of the President, which had been read by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON.] The exercise of a discretion in this respect had been accorded to the minister. On what grounds? His health, though better at the time of his acceptance of this mission, than for a considerable period, had been impaired. With a feeble constitution, and such a state of health, he distrusted the extreme rigor of the climate of Russia. Permission had, in this view, been accorded to him, in the event of his health failing, to remove to a more favorable climate. In the actual occurrence of the contingency, he had availed himself of the permission, with the purpose of returning to his situation with the removal of the cause of his departure.

It had been conceived, Mr. A. was aware, in not an entire consistency with the present charge of Mr. Randolph's undue absence from this sphere of his duties, that he had, in truth, no duties to discharge, and that it was for this reason that the appointment had been conferred on him. Mr. A. could assure the House, if they would accept his voucher for the fact, that this conception was founded in mistake. Our present mission to St. Petersburg was charged with duties of no unimportant character. It was due, however, to candor to say, that, however it was desirable to proceed in every business with despatch, the affairs were not of a nature to suffer detriment from a transient delay of prosecution, such as might be expected to be constituted by the present absence of the minister.

An erroneous impression, Mr. A. believed, had been taken up, that the departure of Mr. Randolph from St. Petersburg had given occasion of dissatisfaction to that court. Mr. A. had seen the correspondence ensuing the announcement to the Russian Government of his intention to be temporarily absent, and its grounds. The announcement had been received in the best temper, and responded to in a spirit of the utmost courtesy and politeness. But, whatever might be the character of the absence of the minister at St. Petersburg from his station, it furnished no colorable support, Mr. A. maintained, to the present motion. It did not belong to the House to supervise, in this mode, the demeanor of our diplomatic functionaries. This was the uncontested function of the Executive. Were the intentions on this function warranted, could any man conceive the present a proper case for it, and the ground alleged adequate? And, in the worst view, were we to suspend diplomatic relations with Russia, because we were not entirely satisfied with the conduct of the functionary who had been deputed there? For that such would be the effect of the denial of the entire appropriation, no one could contest. If we did not like the minister the Executive had selected, were we therefore to determine we would have no minister, which we could not have if we made no provision for the payment of a minister? This was the simple question to be decided in the vote on the motion. It was a false inference, that, because we had competence to determine the continuance of a mission, we were invested with the same competence to determine the propriety of continuing a minister; or if we were invested with it, that we should exercise such a competence on grounds that were inadequate, and in a form that would derogate from the dignity of the House.

These, Mr. A. said, were the explanatory observations he had to offer on the motion, and the grounds of it. The House would do him the justice to acknowledge that he had been guilty of no deviation from the proper tone of explanation, nor indulged, in any degree, that spirit of acrimony which had come to pervade all political discussions among us, and had especially infused its venom into the subject of this. He should stand without excuse, if he exhibited participation in a spirit which, from whatever source it sprang, or to whatever objects it was directed, he was one of the loudest to condemn.

Mr. MALJARY stated that there were some great considerations connected with this question, which demanded notice. He was not disposed to speak of the gentleman who holds the appointment of minister to Russia, as a gentleman from Virginia. He thought there were higher considerations to be viewed. We well knew the influence which the Autocrat exercises. He puts his foot on the neck of nine-tenths of the physical power of Europe: his thumb is on Kamschatka, his little finger touches the Aleutian islands; it is well known, also, that he feels, or pretends to feel, great friendship for the United States. It is our duty to cultivate this feeling. We know our situation is delicate, as regards the European Powers. What is to be done? How are we to improve our condition? Not by confiding our affairs to persons who have no higher qualifications than that they are gentlemen of Virginia. We want somebody at the court of Russia to hold intercourse with the Autocrat—to meet him face to face, not on bended knee—to be there on the spot, and honestly to communicate our honest wishes. We do not wish a minister who is to be continually an absentee. He intended no disrespectful reflection on the gentleman, but we want a man who can talk to the Autocrat, in reference to the mutual interests of the two countries. Such a one do we want at the court of Russia. The gentleman from Virginia tells us that Mr. Randolph has done great services to the country, that he is distinguished for his talents, and so forth. Well, let that pass. But it was not merely because a person had figured well on the floor of Congress, that he is to be selected as a minister. We want a man who can do the business of the country—who can present himself before the Emperor, and tell him what we deem to be the suitable relations between us. Is it merely because Mr. Randolph has, in a certain fashion, distinguished himself on the floor of Congress, that he has been selected as a minister? He [Mr. M.] believed, that he understood the character of Mr. Randolph as well as any man, and valued his talents about as high as any one; but here is a plain matter of business; and we want a man who will be on the spot, and stand by our interests. He understood that the gentleman was in delicate health, and could not stand the rough winter of a Muscovite climate. Well, we want some one who can; and not a minister who is obliged to retreat from the inclemency of a Russian atmosphere, to the more congenial climate of France, and to leave the interests which have been entrusted to him in the hands of a secretary. Something to this effect had been stated to us in the newspapers, as well as in the message. Mr. M. then referred to the clamor which was raised when Mr. Rufus King was sent to England by the late administration, because his state of health was such as to render it impossible for him to remain; yet we are now called on to vote a salary for a minister who has merely made his bow at court, and staid ten days, and then left the business of his mission to a secretary; and we are told that the purposes of his mission were successfully fulfilled while he remained there! If all which is required to be done, can be as well done by the secretary as by the minister, let the minister remain in the United States, in the city of Washington, and let him do all by correspondence with the secretary at St. Petersburg. Let the plenipo stay here, and communicate with his secretary there. No doubt, if the Emperor can have his objects accomplished, he will be satisfied with the minister we have sent him; but we want one who will remain on the spot. If (he repeated) a secretary be sufficient to transact the business, let the plenipotentiary remain at home, and the secretary reside at the court of Russia.

Mr. BURGESS said, the present is, I believe, no unusual discussion. In the short term of my service in this hall, I have witnessed sitting after sitting of a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where the quantum of salary, compared with the service of foreign ministers, was the subject of most stirring debate. When has the competency of this House to move such debate been questioned? Never, until the present sitting of this committee. If I am mistaken, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to tell me when that question was made by the friends of the last administration. The question is put to him, because of his proximity to the Executive Department, and because, if he will not give it a candid answer, such answer can be expected from no gentleman in this hall.

What call, then, can, by any usage, be at this time made on this branch of the Government, to throw itself at the very foot of Executive subserviency? Do the people expect this from us? They have placed the national funds at our control, but with a full confidence in our fidelity and diligence, and under no fear that we should unlock the treasury, unless paramount public interest call upon us to turn the key. We cannot do this merely because required to do it by cabinet ministers, or by the Executive under their advisement. This House has ever claimed and exercised the right to deliberate, to debate, and, under a sound discretion of its own, to decide and determine all claims for appropriation, by whomsoever, or for whatsoever purpose they may have been made. If missions of minor importance were, in years past, questioned, under the vigilance of a spirit of retrenchment, without a fellow in former times, may we not now—although that spirit has been touched, and put to sleep by the caduceus of the State Department—may we not call to our aid so much of the sober watchfulness of the best days of our republic as may enable us, with due diligence, to examine such a question of appropriation as this item of this bill has brought before us? It relates to no mission to an infant nation, or some inconsiderable State, but to our long established legation to a court among the most illustrious of Europe, and involving relations pre-eminently interesting to our country. Innovations relative to this distinguished mission do, above many others, place our national interests in jeopardy. Our relations with Russia have hitherto been cherished and sustained by a minister plenipotentiary residing near that court—at that court, in the royal city of St. Petersburg, and within the political and social circle of the Emperor himself, the high dignitaries of his Government, and the diplomatic envoys of all the nations of Europe, and many of those of Asia.

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

What, then, is the question before the committee, under this item of appropriation? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANBURY] has moved to strike from the bill the nine thousand dollars proposed to be appropriated for payment of the current year's salary to the gentleman said to have been despatched as minister to Russia. He has ably, though briefly, sustained his motion. I trust the committee will indulge me in a few remarks on the same side of the question.

The item itself bears no mark distinguishing it from others of the same kind, or giving us any warrant for rejecting this while those are allowed. We must look to other documents for information concerning this mission, and our obligations to furnish the money for supporting this minister at the court of St. Petersburg. The paper which I now take from the desk before me, contains that information. It purports to be the annual message from the President of the United States to Congress at the present session. It certainly bears his signature, and was sent to this House by that high dignitary. Notwithstanding these facts, the document must be received and considered entirely as the production of cabinet ministers. No literary gentleman in this hall—I mean no member of this House—who reads and examines this communication, made to us so much at length, could, I think, say, without hazard of their reputation, that he believes one sentence of it was composed by the distinguished gentleman whose name is placed at the end of it. This, sir, is not said for any purpose of derogation from the eminent official character of our First Magistrate, but for a very different—a much more important purpose. Are gentlemen aware of the extent of our importation of European politics? Have we not brought home, and put into use, the high tory maxim of their monarchies, that the King can do no wrong? Was there ever a time in our country when the friends of any administration, other than the present, believed and practised this article of political faith with more unscrupulous devotion? The cabinet ministers of our Executive have taken artful counsel from this fact. As European ministers, being answerable with their heads for what the King, their master, may, from the throne, communicate to his Lords and Commons, will not suffer any speech, but of their own contriving, to be thus communicated; so, the adroit ministers of our cabinet, taking shelter under the Executive subserviency of the times, have not only put upon the nation this message, but the President, a man who, if he moved at all, always marched straightforward to his object, they have betrayed into the crooked counsels which may, by diligent examination, be found in this message, sent to Congress by them, while they lie sheltered under the imposing name of the first dignitary of the nation. If the King can do no wrong, thank God ministers may, even in these times, be made accountable for the counsels which they have given him. "The right divine in man" to rule, "the enormous faith of many made for one," comprehends in its creed no permanent provision for any crafty sycophant to skulk and screen himself behind the throne, and play the little tyrant with security.

That part of this message, from which we learn the character of this mission to Russia, is all of it which now it concerns us to examine. Our foreign relations are a branch of the Department of State; and this mission was contrived, and the account of it contained in the message, has been given to us by the Secretary of that Department. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] has read this account for one purpose—suffer me to read it for another.

"Our relations with Russia are of the most stable character. Respect for that empire, and confidence in its friendship towards the United States, have been so long entertained on our part, and so carefully cherished by the present Emperor and his illustrious predecessor, as to have become incorporated with the public sentiment of the United States."

"I sincerely regret to inform you that our minister lately commissioned to that court, on whose distinguished talents and great experience in public affairs I place great reliance, has been compelled by extreme indisposition to exercise a privilege which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion, of leaving temporarily his post for the advantage of a more genial climate."

"I have received the most satisfactory assurance that, in the mean time, the public interests in that quarter will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which he will continue, through the secretary of legation, with the Russian cabinet."

Am I not correct in saying that this fabric was wrought in the Department of State? Who but Mr. Secretary Van Buren would have devised such a mission, or selected such a man to fill it, or caused such a printed paper to be sent to this House? We are told by it that our long established legation to Russia has been totally changed; and that, in place of a permanently resident minister at that court, regardless of the public service, a mission has been invented to suit the talents, the health, habits, and disposition of the distinguished individual for whom it was designed! By the very terms of this mission, this individual is required to repair to Russia, but is authorized to leave that court, and that empire, whenever his health (and of that he alone is the judge) may require it. Who but the Machiavelian politician at the head of the State Department would have advised the President to such a mission, or dared to place on a document, prepared to be sent to this House, such a statement of its commencement, progress, and present condition? In what part of the constitution, or the laws of the United States, or of the usages of this Government, does he find any thing in support of the measure? It will not be hazarding very much to say that the House was never before this time called upon to pay such a salary for such services.

This distinguished minister to Russia is John Randolph. How does he understand the terms on which he agreed to embark on this mission? The course of conduct pursued by him since his departure may give us some knowledge on this point. We are left in nearly utter darkness by the Department of State concerning all the movements of this minister: for the message merely tells us that he has already taken benefit under the sincere clause in his charter of legation. He has left the court of our illustrious friend the Autocrat of all the Russias; but when, or for what other region? Here the Secretary is cautiously silent. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has been equally so. Can any gentleman of this committee either indoctrinate us into this great mystery of State, or give us the light of a single fact concerning the voyages and travels of this minister of ours, and let us know whether he is now moving or stationary? Where is John Randolph? Where is our ambassador, for whose public services Mr. Van Buren is calling upon us to provide a salary? We are told that he is not where he was sent; and that he had permission to go thence when and whither he might choose; but whether he is, in pursuit of health, now basking in the sunshine of Naples, or, for a like purpose, traversing "the fog-wrapt island of Britain," we are left to learn from the same authentic documents from which the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations seems to have taken advice—rumor and the public papers. These have "talked of his whereabouts;" and, though, without giving daily bulletins of his health, habits, or motions; yet their right to speak, and our right to hear, cannot be questioned, when those who know and could tell us the whole truth, persevere in a safe and cautious silence.

If we are left by the Secretary without knowledge of his movements or localities, we are equally uninstructed by him concerning the health of this ambassador. We are merely told that he has already availed himself of his right, by the terms of his commission, to abandon the public service. In what state of health was he then, is he now, or probably will he be, at any future time? For, legislating on this subject, in what a luminous condition this prescient Secretary has placed this House! We have an equally distinct view of the past, the present, and the future. Does any gentleman of this committee possess the power to tell us whether John Randolph might now, or ever can be required, by the terms of his legation, to return to the court of Russia? Is not this salary intended to be given to him for the distinguished services already rendered at that court? If his health continue to require it, he has, we are told, the right to choose his place of residence. What are, what have been, his own opinions, concerning that health? You have all seen him walk into this House, and out of it, and must know his own opinions concerning his own health. We have often heard him pronounce his chronic complaint "a churchyard cough." In winter, "he should not live over corn planting;" in seed time, "he should die before harvest." He has for years been travelling from New York to Liverpool, from England to France, from America to Europe, and from Europe to America, in pursuit of health. Has he not, from all this, learned that neither time nor travel can bring back to age the bloom of youth, nor to infirmity the vigor of health? Were he, at this moment, to walk into this hall, wrapped from the floor to the eyes in flannel and fearnought, what would he tell you, sir, concerning his health? What of his intended residence in Russia? No, sir, if he be the judge—and who but he can be the judge of his own health?—he will never again return to the court of the Czar. We are, therefore, directed and required, by the Secretary of State, to appropriate this item of $9,000, for the salary of a public minister, who has been in the public service, at the place of his destined residence, not much more than a like number of days. He arrived at St. Petersburg, was presented to the Emperor, made his bow, or genuflection, retired, and went to—England? France? Italy? or where? No mortal man, on this side the Atlantic, can inform us.

During this nine days' residence, what services did he render to the American people? The Secretary is satisfied; and we surely ought not to be anxious about this great affair. We are told it is a matter exclusively within the competency of the Executive; and, therefore, it is, I presume, considered, that the representatives of the people have no other vocation but to vote the promised and required compensation. He certainly succeeded, even in that short time, in rendering himself very distinguished at the court of Russia; and, therefore, it may be said, in giving equal celebrity to his country. He certainly gave voice to every tongue of rumor in both hemispheres. His mission will hereafter be regarded as an era in our foreign relations; and the residence of Randolph at the court of Russia will long be talked of as a phenomenon in diplomacy. For this we must give him the 9,000 dollars demanded by the Secretary.

What could such a man do for his country in the character of a foreign minister? Just what he has done: which was very much like what each man in the nation of all parties, who knew him, must have expected he would do. Genius he certainly has; for he is original, and unlike all other men. If you please, he is eloquent; but if so, that eloquence is, like himself, sui generis. These have enabled him to perform what he has done; could they qualify him for the services of a great diplomatic minister? Do not these require sound judgment, deep, extensive, and regular thinking; laborious perseverance in business; and, above all, prudence, and vigilant circumspection? In his thirty years' public service, where are the monuments of his political wisdom, and labors of patriotism? They are all of a piece; of one uniform character, and this Russian residence will neither give the blush or the palm to any other public transaction of this remarkable man throughout his political life.

With a perfect knowledge of this man, the Secretary of State could not have contrived this legation, so different from all others, with any view to the public service. This man was sent out not to benefit the people abroad, but to relieve the administration at home. The crafty Secretary had witnessed the political movements of this eccentric man. He feared the comet might return again, and visit his political hemisphere. He had seen it blaze in perihelium—

"With fear of change perplexing men in power."

Was it not prudent to remove this star of malign influence to another sky? It has been done; and the nation must pay, not for a mission made for the advancement of their interests, but made to secure the political power of the Secretary.

We have been told that our relations with Russia are of high and important interest; and, therefore, we cannot dispense with this appropriation, because, if we refuse this salary, we shall defeat the mission. Should this mission, by which no public benefit was intended, and from which none can be hoped, be recalled, it may be replaced by one of better purpose, and efficient character. It is an obstruction in the "straightforward" path of our relations with Russia, and we are laboring to abate, or to remove it out of the way.

Our relations with that Government are truly important. That empire is perhaps the most numerous in population, and certainly the most extensive in territory, of any Power on the globe. No nation of the old world, otherwise than by colonies, approaches so near to us. This people is advancing in civilization, wealth, and power, beyond any example in its former history. In the last controversy of arms between Russia and the Ottoman empire, had not other Powers of Europe interposed a shielding hand, the moslem, after a dominion of more than four centuries in the fairest part of Europe, had been driven beyond the Bosphorus; and the Autocrat of Russia would have ascended the throne of Constantine. At all times, our relations with such a Power must be important to the American people. Are those relations taken care of now, as heretofore they have been, and as now especially they ought to be?

Yes, sir, I say as now they should be. For now Europe is convulsed, and agitated from the Mediterranean to the Baltic. The flame of war is but just repressed. Troops are called into the field, in almost every nation; and Russia, in a kind of winter campaign, has sent out 200,000 soldiers to her southwestern frontier, to look out on the old battle fields of Belgium and France. In this condition of Europe, do we not require an able, a diligent, a resident minister at Russia? Withhold this appropriation, abolish this sinecure legation, and this may be effected.

One other fact in the history of our diplomacy renders the residence of a skilful, faithful minister at that court, at this time, above all others, indispensable. We learn from the Department of State, through the same medium, this message, that a treaty of amity and commerce has been negotiated between the United States and the Sublime Porte. The Secretary, with great candor, told us what this Turk had agreed to do for the christian, but he, with great caution, concealed what the christian had agreed to do for the Turk. This gentleman is as well persuaded as the French monarch was, that "he who knows not how to dissemble, knows not how to rule." Rumor has run clean counter to Mr. Van Buren; for though she often tells more than the truth, she never tells less. What have we learned from this witness? Why truly that a secret article is contained in this treaty; and this fact was, I believe, published in the newspapers before we received the message. It is said—it is believed, that by this article the American people agree to furnish armed ships to the Sultan of Turkey, in his future wars with christian nations. Do you believe, sir, that our envoy had left Constantinople before the Russian minister at the port knew this fact? The very drogoman, by whom your Mr. Rhind talked with Reis Effendi, would, for half a plate full of piastres, have told the whole story to Count Orloff; and sworn he was doing good service to the prophet, by betraying one christian dog to another. Sir, has friendship for the Russian empire been so cherished by the present sovereign, and his illustrious predecessor, that it has become a sentiment of the American people? Is not this secret article a diplomatic fraud, not only on that friendship, but, which it quite as much concerns us to consider, upon that sovereign who has so generously cherished it? I say nothing now of what may happen if the Turk should again war upon the Greek; or how it may comport with the republican principles of the Secretary of State, when he shall call on this House to furnish ships to that despot, thereby aiding him in bringing that people again under his iron yoke. What shall we say to the Emperor of Russia? Who shall make our explanation, if we have any to make? It is probable that the news of this treaty, and perhaps a copy of it, reached the court of St. Petersburg shortly after our minister left that city. The shortness of his residence there; the suddenness of his departure; the intelligence of this secret article; the intended sojourn of that minister, perhaps in England—perhaps in France; the attitudes of the nations of Europe, all giving dreadful note of preparation for war, must have had some tendency to place our relations with Russia on a footing not the most firm and friendly. Does not sound policy—does not national good sense, call on the American people to have an able minister at that court, and that, too, right speedily? Have we one there now? Under the mission for which this appropriation is to be made, are we likely soon, or ever, I do not say to have such a man there, but to have there any minister at all?

In answer to all these anxious forebodings, we are told, that, in this absence of the minister, the secretary of legation takes very special and satisfactory care of our relations at the court of St. Petersburg. If this were not too ludicrous, it must be received as a mere mockery of the American people. When this paragraph came from under his pen, Mr. Secretary Van Buren must, if he had placed his hand there, have felt something on his face different from the eternal smile. Who is this secretary of legation? The protege of the minister, John Randolph Clay—a lad of less, or certainly not more, than twenty-one years old; undistinguished by talents, education, or employment; without acquaintance with men, or things, or business; a youth to whom fame has not, nor have his friends, attributed any thing extraordinary, either in possession or promise; and with nothing but his surname to recommend to public attention. I would not, I cannot speak in derogation of this youth; and all I would say is, that he must be utterly unqualified for the public station where he is placed. The service requires men; the nation has able men—Herculean men. Why then hazard our interests, perhaps our peace, by placing the weight of empires on the slender shoulders of boyhood? Let us strike out this appropriation, that this sinecure, this state mission, may be avoided; that the minister may return to his "constituents," the Secretary to his studies; and that the President may send a legation to Russia fit for the public service.

As it will not be contended that this appropriation should be made, because the gentleman, who may take the benefit of it, is a native of Virginia, so may gentlemen be assured that these remarks have no sectional origin; and I utterly disclaim any and all adversary feeling to that distinguished commonwealth, her interests, and her citizens. I have spoken as one of the representatives of the American people; and as one coming from a part of our common country which has done and will do as much for the illustrious men of Virginia as any other part of this nation. This appropriation is opposed because it is intended to support a mission formed for purposes unconnected with the public interests, places our foreign relation in peril, and is without any justification in law, usage, or constitutional principle.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said that he would briefly reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS.]

Mr. B. said he felt the entire force of the duty to do so, and its obligations could not be lightly regarded. In a subject for grave legislation, involving considerations that deserved to be well weighed, and in the calmest deliberation, it might be hoped that faction and party would have paused in reflection. This hope was vain. The infusion of party malignity had already embittered and discolored the debate. Will gentlemen allow no moment of repose to the inflamed and angry passions of political warfare? Is discord to banish harmony from our councils, and consign to party all the duties that belong to, and are involved in, the name of country? The tendency and effect of these things cannot be mistaken or disguised. Obscure them as gentlemen may choose, the drift and intent of discussions like this cannot be mistaken. The gentleman from Rhode Island has kindled his sensibilities, and indulged in those malevolent epithets that cloud the debate, and surrender the judgment a victim to feeling. He asserts that Executive influence controls the action of the House, by declaring that subserviency to Executive will is far beyond all past extent in the history of this country. Sir, if this be the dominant vice of the age, it carries alongside of it a countervailing antidote. The present times are fruitful of unsparing hostility to the Executive. But, said Mr. B., the gentleman is entirely at fault. His assertion is a figment of the fancy, and has no foundation in reality.

If there be any thing at this time more remarkable than all other things, it is the utter absence of Executive influence over the deliberations of this House as well as the Senate. I think that I perceive and could trace the causes that produce this state of things; but it would be a profitless pursuit, even if covered with the fullest success. It is, however, a fact, as singular as it is true, that a President of the United States, holding in full and sure possession a larger share of popular affection than the most of his predecessors, finds that most of his prominent recommendations to Congress have been neglected. Invested as he is with the strongest evidences of popular regard, all his more prominent recommendations have perished by inertia or rejection. This may present a question between the constituent body and their agents, of which I mean to give no opinion. Those to whom the public weal has been entrusted, have, doubtless, acted upon their own views of right and wrong. But this fact alone repels the ill-founded insinuation of subserviency to Executive behests.

It has likewise been intimated from the same quarter, with a grace neither becoming nor decorous, that we are called on to vote a salary to the American minister at the court of St. Petersburg, because he is a Virginian. Now, sir, my worthy colleague, who sits before me, [Mr. Archer,] used no language, employed no expression, that force and ingenuity united could torture into such meaning. Vindication against such a charge is entirely unnecessary, as it regards the State or the ambassador in question. The character of that ancient commonwealth, as well as that of her distinguished son, constitute an impregnable fortress, that frowns on and defies the assault—a character that is not the fruit of a summer's day, but has been dearly earned, in an age crowded with events that are at the same time appalling, and sacred to the best and highest interests of humanity. When my colleague adverted to the genius and services of Mr. Randolph, he remarked that Virginia had illustrated the distinction of her partialities in that uncommon confidence which was reposed in his virtues and his talents. And this is all he said relating to Virginia. I will take leave, too, to say, that such confidence, so dearly earned, so fully possessed, and so merited, "is praise enough to fill the ambition of a common man;" ay, sir, of any man, be he whom he may. I pass, said Mr. B., from this insinuation to another, fraught with equal injustice. The member from Rhode Island more than intimates that the State in which I live was to be conciliated by this appointment. If, in this Union, or on this globe of earth, there be a State or empire beyond the reach of such vile seductions, it is the State on whom this tart reproach is cast. Virginia has her principles, perhaps peculiar, and these she prizes above the temptations and treasures of earth. For she believes that with the maintenance of these is inseparably wrapt up the happiness and the freedom of the community. In support of this class of principles, she claims to stand foremost in the field of contest; "and this is the head and front of her offending." I speak with justifiable confidence when I say, that, in these times, neither Virginia nor her citizens wished the honors of this Government. It is not true in any case that high offices were sought after or obtained by any of her sons through unworthy means.

It was said on a former but appropriate occasion, by Mr. Randolph, "that his feet had never been soiled by the dust of the anti-chambers." He had been the light and the ornament of this House and the Senate, in times when friends and foes guided the destinies of this country. He had never bent his knee where his heart owed no respect. We are arrogantly called on by the gentleman from Rhode Island to point to the monuments of past service that Mr. Randolph has left behind him. Sir, it was once said of a patriot, a soldier, and a statesman, whose deeds of renown are beyond the reach of praise or dispraise, that his monument was erected in the hearts of his countrymen. Profiting by this figure, I beg leave to say that Mr. Randolph has left with us one monument of his great services. It rests in the heart of the gentleman from Rhode Island. Rising out of it to full view in this debate, it is now seen sparkling in the glitter of his fancy, and now casting its malignant shadow over those services which justice and history have already consecrated to patriotism and to glory. Mr. Randolph's great exertions, united with as gallant and devoted a band of patriots as ever combated oppression in the Senate, or withstood it in the field, overthrew that party to which the gentleman from Rhode Island belonged. In that great struggle between liberty and power, Mr. Randolph was true to the people. His matchless genius was exerted in favor of popular freedom—and this is his crime. His claims to public gratitude would be but a transcript of the records of the age in which he lived. No vituperation can sully his renown. History will record—justice will be done. His reputation will be cherished by the present generation of men, and it will pass to posterity. The gentleman has been pleased to notice the secretary to the Russian legation, and has applied to him some of those epithets he has always at command. It is enough, in reply, to say, that those to whom the constitution has confided the power and the duty to judge of his fitness and abilities, have no doubt discharged that office; and their decision, it is presumed, may be safely trusted. But, says the gentleman, he is "a boy, a beardless boy." That epithet implies an objection that is now out of time, for the Senate yesterday clothed him with the toga virilis, by confirming his nomination. But, after all, what reason can be assigned why this House, acting as a moral agent, and influenced by those considerations which have moral weight, what sound and valid reason, I repeat, can be assigned for withholding this salary? The President appointed the minister to Russia, and the Senate, as is known, confirmed the nomination, not only without the show of serious opposition, but with a promptitude that indicated no wish for opposition. The minister accepts the office, repairs to the theatre of its duties, and executes them. The frailty of his constitution rendering ill health possible, he asked and obtained permission, if overtaken by disease, to seek a more genial clime. It was conceded to him with perfect coherence to usage, propriety, and humanity. He had fulfilled his undertaking to the letter, fairly, fully, thoroughly; and I demand, will the Government meanly violate its contract, and refuse the payment of the salary?

The discussion of the foreign relations of the country have been obtruded into this debate. Matters of delicate and touching interest, still pending between this Government and others, have been drawn in, as if they were proper topics for discussion. Of such matters, said Mr. B., I claim to know nothing, except that their present introduction is unparliamentary, and discourteous to the organs charged with our foreign concerns. Whenever these subjects shall become proper topics of debate, my colleague, [Mr. Archer,] whose position in these affairs will then require and justify his speaking, will doubtless supply the just calls that may be made upon him.

I have thus far, Mr. Speaker, treated this question, in reply only to what has been urged on the other side. In this respect it is a subject important enough to engage your best deliberations. I beg leave now to address a few words in a different view of the question. If it be important in its personal and party aspect, that importance dwindles into insignificance when we regard it in reference to our constitutional powers. I mean in relation to the distribution of power among the several departments of the Government. It is here that it swells into vast magnitude, and demands the most mature reflection.

Upon a proper subject, and at an appropriate time, none can deny to this House the rightful power to interpose its will between the public interests and the march of folly and wickedness in a mad and faithless administration. Whenever, in such cases, Congress is called on to grant appropriations, I am not willing to concede that it possesses a mere instrumental agency, while all deliberative will is drawn to other departments. No, sir, no! But this is not the creation of a new mission. It is not a prospective matter. The thing is done, and beyond our control. The embassy itself is not objected to; the mission is acknowledged to be highly necessary. The appointing power, with the co-operation of all those guards and checks which the constitution for wise ends has put around it, have all concurred in approving the selection of the minister—and whilst you have the power, and the power only, to withhold the appropriation, I deny that you have any right to interpose at this time. I deny that your power rests in the moral stability of justice. There are sometimes obligations of a higher nature, resting on governments as well as individuals, than those which may be enforced by coercion—obligations which we cannot disregard, without a reckless contempt for our loftiest duties. If we follow the constitution, and respect the allotments of power, it seems to me impossible that the mind of man can bring to its aid a plausible pretext for interposing the negative of this House upon a subject entrusted to others. We have no right to resist their will, when fairly moving in their sphere of conceded power. Alarming cases may sometimes arise, of such magnitude or atrocity, as to require it. Such cases, when they do occur, set aside all law and all obligation; they furnish a law to themselves, which the public safety may constrain us to follow.

Minister to Russia.

Mr. WAYNE observed, that when the gentleman from Ohio made the motion to strike from the bill under consideration the appropriation for the salary of the minister to Russia, he had accompanied it with two declarations, neither of which was the fact, though both had the appearance of being so. The moral apprehension of the gentleman will readily distinguish between them, and also suggest to him how far the difference in this instance had been accidental. His declarations were, that the President had told us the United States was not represented at the court of Russia, and that it was not probable we soon would be; the last being an assertion of his own. These were the reasons he had given to sustain his motion, and both he professes to have derived from the message. Sir, the President, after stating our amicable relations with Russia, and that no means will be left unemployed to promote them, and to improve the commercial intercourse between the two nations, sincerely regrets to inform us, that extreme indisposition had compelled the minister to leave, temporarily, his post, for a more genial climate, and that this was a privilege which had been committed to the minister's discretion, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service. But the President also states, he had received the most satisfactory assurances that the public interests would not suffer in the minister's absence, as it was his intention to keep up an intercourse with the Russian cabinet, through the secretary of legation. So far, then, sir, from not being represented, we are informed that, notwithstanding disease had forced the minister to leave St. Petersburg for a time, he was, though under its pressure, not unmindful of his duty, of the particular interests which had been confided to him, and of the welfare of his country. How different is this statement from the naked declaration of the gentleman, which, without any explanation from him, implies an entire suspension of all negotiation during the minister's absence, conveys an intimation that the public interest was suffering, and the imputation that the appropriation was asked to pay for constructive and not for actual services. It may suit the gentleman's views to use his place here to make such insinuations for circulation out of the House; but when they are unwarranted by the only document which we have to give us information upon this subject, and upon which he makes his assertions, and that one written in so plain, unaffected, and candid a manner, that it cannot be mistaken, but by great carelessness, or a disposition to pervert it, he must bear the exposure of the difference between his declarations and the authority upon which he rests them, and not complain if his motives should even be harshly suspected. Equally unfortunate is the gentleman's declaration, that it was not probable we would soon be represented at the Russian court, as it is the opposite conclusion to which a candid mind would come, from the language of the message: In such a case, nothing could be certainly said, or promised; but enough was said to show that the President had a definite hope that the minister would return in the spring to his post, with a full ability to give to his country the use of those talents and attainments by which he had become so much distinguished at home.

The motion is not, therefore, sustained by the facts of the case: we are forced to look beyond them for the cause which induced it; and it seems to have been intended to give an opportunity for an outpouring of party resentment, which has been the more violent and personal, from having no substantial cause of complaint upon which it would fasten its rancor. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] has indulged in a wide range of observation, in no way connected with the subject, and by no means sanctioned by the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which he more than once referred as an example, to protect him in his irregular course. The House had understood the chairman to deprecate any reliance being placed upon newspaper conjectures and calumnies; but the gentleman had made them the basis of his argument, and his authority for facts—and, until he had done so, the real subject of debate had not been lost sight of. What connexion, sir, with his subject has the treaty with Turkey, or any one of its articles, about which we cannot know any thing until it shall be ratified, or its provisions shall be divulged, by a vote of the Senate, unless information concerning it has been got by a shameless violation of fidelity to the constitution? Did the gentleman reflect upon the impropriety in a member of Congress giving, in debate, currency and consequence to mere newspaper surmise, concerning our foreign relations, which, whether it shall turn out to be true or false, might be hurtful to our interests, by a premature disclosure, or an increased supposition of its correctness, and before it is known what attitude those who administer the Government have taken in relation to the subject of conjecture? Or does he think it allowable, in the warfare of party, to catch at every suggestion which malice or curiosity may make of those now in power, and to argue from them as probabilities? In such contentions, honor rejects the use of an untruth, as readily as honor and humanity would refuse to wield the poisoned weapon in war. Did the historical reading of the gentleman not remind him how often it has happened in negotiation, that an inadmissible article is permitted to be a part of a treaty by a minister not having full power to ratify it, in the expectation that its temporary admission will be productive of ultimate good? But, sir, we know nothing of that treaty; and I abstain from further notice of that part of the gentleman's speech, believing, whilst the treaty is under consideration in the Senate, conjectures of its contents, or any remarks concerning it, to be altogether unbecoming here. The gentleman, however, is as little justified for having made the qualifications and fitness of the minister to Russia a subject of inquiry and remark upon a motion to strike out the appropriation for his salary. When the right of appointment exists, and it is made and confirmed by the Senate, the fitness of the individual is conclusive upon this House, and a constitutional obligation is imposed upon it to co-operate in voting the supply to support the minister; and our only constitutional check upon the disbursement of it is a right of inquiry into its application. A call upon us to refuse the supply in anticipation of its misapplication is an indecency of assumption, which was unknown to the journals of our legislation until this motion was made. But why refuse the appropriation? The right of the President to extend to a minister the indulgence of temporary removal from his post, in anticipation of a hostile influence of climate upon his health, cannot be denied; for it does not differ in effect from such allowance after the ravages of climate have been felt, and the latter, though often done, has not been heretofore a subject of complaint or of reproach against any minister or any administration under which it has happened. The same principle produced the law which gives to a member of Congress his pay, if, after having begun his journey to Washington, he shall be overtaken with sickness, and be prevented by it from reaching the capitol during the session. The exercise of the President's discretion, therefore, in this instance, is strictly in analogy with our legislation for ourselves; and for my own part, I cannot but think it was highly commendable in Mr. Randolph, when he accepted the mission, to have warned the administration that his health, though then good, might be affected by the climate of Russia—patriotic in him to have incurred a risk which very few men of feeble constitution would have encountered, and doubly so on one, with his fortune and at his time of life, to have determined to encounter the climate of St. Petersburg again, after having suffered to the extent he has done, and in the way he had apprehended. What was thought possible, or even probable, if gentlemen will rather please to have it so, has occurred to an extreme degree; and because disease, in a foreign climate, has driven one of our most distinguished men from the theatre of his services for a few months, there are those to be found here, who, instead of having a generous sympathy for the sufferer, seize upon his affliction to vent the bitterness of party resentments. There are periods which will permit no limit to our devotion to the public service; but when no such crisis impends, the man who, without being allured by the distinctions or the emoluments of office, exposes himself at the call of his country to what he knows may be uncommonly hazardous to his health, deserves uncommon praise. But, sir, the minister is only known to me by his fame, and I refrain from trespassing upon the generous anxiety of others who know him well, to protect him from imputation. The gentleman argued the question also with a view to make the impression upon the public, that, in any event, whether the minister should return or not to his post, it was intended by the administration to apply to his uses the entire salary for a year. This point, however, is regulated by law; and it will be a difficult matter for the gentleman and his coadjutors to make even a faint impression, that those who have been so recently engaged in correcting abuses in our diplomatic expenditures will subject themselves to any imputation from those who have been shamed by their vigilance. Nor can I agree with the gentleman, that, at this crisis in the affairs of Europe, our interests have or can suffer by the absence of Mr. Randolph. The Emperor and his cabinet have been engaged in more intense occupations, to the probable exclusion of such remote connexions as he has with us; and nothing can occur affecting the nations of Europe, and having any bearing upon our interest, which will not be as soon communicated to us through other channels, as it would be by the minister from St. Petersburg. But, sir, I will say no more. This motion is well understood; it is intended to accomplish nothing here, but has been made for outdoor effect; and the people will be as apt to detect the sinister design, as gentlemen have been to hope, and anticipate, and to insinuate, that something would grow out of this trifling appropriation, which would furnish them with a subject of reproach against the administration. They will be disappointed.

Minister to Russia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his regret that, at so late an hour, he should be obliged to trespass on the attention of the House. He regretted, too, that any circumstance should render it necessary for him to notice any remarks that might fall from the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS.] It was impossible, however, to let them pass without some notice. The honorable gentleman, said Mr. C., has given us an elaborate and minute account of our treaty with the Porte: assuming his own facts, he has discussed its merits, and animadverted on its imaginary imperfections. I shall not, Mr. Speaker, travel out of my way, and violate a rule of order, by entering now into that discussion, by examining the provisions of the Turkish treaty. Whenever I do, sir, my facts and my arguments shall be founded on something more substantial than a newspaper rumor; more unquestionable than the statement of an unprincipled partisan; more unimpeachable than the evidence of a perjured Senator. The gentleman has introduced other matters into this debate. We heard something of the wily policy of a Machiavel; of the deep and designing motives of a distinguished member of the cabinet; of "our minister to Russia, and his master the Secretary of State;" even, sir, endorsing, by insinuation, the stale slanders of the press. Mr. Speaker, I disdain to engage in such a debate with the gentleman from Rhode Island. I condescend to notice his remarks, only to repel and to denounce his unworthy insinuations. No, sir, I shall not contend with him—age cannot dignify the slanderer—a hoary head, though "crammed with Ætna's fires," cannot purify calumny, or sanctify it to the touch of honorable men. I have done with the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Let us turn, for a moment, sir, to this extraordinary motion to strike out the salary of our minister to Russia. I feel, Mr. Speaker, a proud satisfaction, that, amidst all the angry and violent collisions of our late political contest, the party with which I have the honor of acting never disgraced itself by a motion similar to that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, and sustained by the gentleman from Rhode Island. [Here the SPEAKER called Mr. CAMBRELENG to order.] I claim, sir, the privilege of reply; I claim the privilege of vindicating my party, and have only to lament that others have not better appreciated their own dignity. In all that angry war, sir, we had no instance so degrading as a motion to strike out the salary of a minister on account of absence or indisposition. When our late estimable minister to France visited the waters of Aix la Chapelle, did any one on our side of the House humble himself and his cause by inquiring whether he had the permission of his Government to go there? Did any member of this House disgrace his country by a motion to strike out his salary, because the same minister had visited the lake of Geneva? No, sir. When the late administration appointed an aged invalid—a venerable, distinguished, and highly respected gentleman—our minister to Great Britain; when that venerable gentleman, notoriously in a rapid decline, was appointed to the most important and urgent mission within the gift of the Executive—was any member of our side so lost to decency and humanity, as to inquire whether he had the permission of his Government to visit the waters of Cheltenham? After that distinguished gentleman had visited the court of St. James, had resided there, and returned an invalid, physically and unfortunately incapable of discharging any one of the important duties assigned him by the late administration—was there, sir, one so poor among us, as to move to strike out his salary! No, sir, no. We played a nobler game, and won it. Mr. Speaker, it is the fortune—nay, the high privilege of illustrious men, to be calumniated and pursued with bitter hostility. Our minister to Russia cannot escape—for he has occupied a high station in the political annals of our country—he has obtained for himself an illustrious rank in our parliamentary history. I have listened, sir, with delight and instruction to some of our distinguished rivals for parliamentary fame—to the simple, but persuasive and fascinating reasoning of a Lowndes—to the melodious and impassioned eloquence of a Clay--to the lucid, commanding, and solid argument of a Webster; but for a combination and profusion of all the weapons of parliamentary war--of wit, irony, sarcasm, imagination, and eloquence--he was surpassed by none--nay, sir, as a parliamentary orator, he was unequalled. He combined all the skill of a debater--the genius of a poet--with the patriotism and sound philosophy of a statesman. The people of this country owe him a large debt of gratitude. He was ever the vigilant enemy of power, and the devoted friend of our ancient and excellent constitution. With a political foresight and sagacity, beyond any of his distinguished rivals for parliamentary honors, he detected in the embryo, and resisted with prophetic wisdom, those measures which laid the basis of that gigantic accumulation of federal power and taxation which we are now so zealously endeavoring to check and moderate.

Such, sir, is the distinguished man--with thirty years' experience in the public service--with a familiar knowledge of all our national concerns, foreign and domestic--such the man to whom the President assigned the charge of our mission to Russia. With a frame constitutionally infirm, he departed upon his mission, and was necessarily left at liberty to leave his station, should his health require it. He retreated, through an evident necessity, from the inclemencies of a Russian winter. Had he ventured, sir, to remain, and, with his feeble constitution, to encounter the horrors of a Northern winter, we should not now have had occasion to discuss this miserable question about his salary! The career of this eccentric but illustrious man is near its close. Perhaps, even now, Mr. Speaker, while we are debating this wretched motion, Providence may have placed him beyond the reach of all his enemies. Should it be so, sir, every honorable adversary will leave him to his repose. None will pursue him there--none will hover over his grave--save the bald vulture and croaking raven.

Mr. MALLARY again rose, and enforced the views taken by him in the earlier stage of the debate, which have been already reported.

Mr. COKE, of Virginia, rose at a late hour of the day, and said that he regretted the necessity which constrained him to present himself before the House at that late period of the day, and at the present stage of the discussion. I should not do justice to myself, said Mr. C., if I omitted to state, that I appear under disadvantages which greatly embarrass me in the performance of the duty I propose to attempt. I feel bound to sacrifice all personal considerations, when they conflict with a sense of duty, such as now actuates me, in the effort to sustain my colleague in rescuing my State, my countryman, who is absent, and the administration, from the scoffs and sneers of the gentleman from Vermont, and the gentleman from Rhode Island.

It may not be amiss here to notice the valor and prudence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANBERRY.] He submitted the motion to strike from the bill the sum proposed to be appropriated for the minister in Russia, out of which this angry discussion has grown; and when the consequences were realized, which previous concert with distinguished gentlemen of his party had, probably, secured, he warily retires from the scene, and eludes the attacks which his temerity had provoked. That it was prudent to secure himself from dangers against which he was not fortified, I cannot deny; and that his firmness sank under the perils of his situation, is an apology which excuses his retreat, I am not unwilling to admit.

The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MALLARY,] with his peculiar dignity of manner and style, has instituted a comparison of Virginia with Vermont, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. The effort did not commend itself to the impartiality of this intelligent body, by any of those appearances of respectful consideration which the dignity of the subject might be expected to inspire. It wore no semblance of that impartial criticism which distinguishes an effort of the mind to work out a fair result.

The suggestions of reason and justice were not allowed to impede his hasty conclusions, or to dispute their equity. His determination was to sneer at Virginia, right or wrong. Let me assure the honorable gentleman that Virginia fears not the result of a comparison with Vermont, or any other State in this Union. It does not become me, standing in the relation I do to her, to speak of her in terms which my knowledge of her merits, and her own history would prove; but I may say, without impropriety, that the annals of this nation may be safely appealed to, in proof that her full quota of virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, has been contributed in winning the liberty, and securing the happiness we now enjoy.

The honorable gentleman has not been content with ridiculing Virginia. He has found it agreeable to his feelings, or consistent with his policy, to impute to the minister at Russia motives of private speculation in the acceptance of this mission. He tells us that, a few years ago, he heard a great deal of constructive journeys, and asserts that this mission is the most apt illustration of his idea of a constructive journey. The gentleman, to use his own beautiful phrase, wants "a man of bodily strength, who can stand face to face with the Emperor of Russia." Was ever a charge made more heedlessly? Was the wantonness of factious zeal ever distinguished by evidence so unerring, and so irresistible, as the ascription of such motives to John Randolph furnishes on this occasion?

Is the gentleman aware that he speaks of a man of fortune! a man of substance! of him who has land and slaves! whose income is from his crops--certain, fixed, regular, yea, as uniform as nature in her seasons--as invaluable as produce in its price? He does not speak of some Eastern manufacturer who, to-day, is rich, and to-morrow is a beggar--whose capital and income depends upon the ebb or flow of public opinion--on the right or policy of the tariff system, or the quiescence and submission of the laborer to be shorn of the just remuneration of his toil. No, sir, John Randolph, if of a temper to be influenced by mercenary motives, is above their influence.

The gentleman, in his profile of a man fitted for a foreign mission, has laid great stress upon personal strength. I have now learned, for the first time, under the counsel of the gentleman from Vermont, that education and refinement, tact and talent, are subordinate considerations in the formation of a character for diplomacy. If this position be well founded, if it be true that dignity, combined with high intellectual endowments, shall yield the posts of trusts and usefulness to mere corporeal strength, I must acknowledge the appointment to be indiscreet, and admit (what I must otherwise deny) that the gentleman from Vermont is himself reformed into fitness for this distinguished station.

But the gentleman, in the ardor of his opposition, has denied that Mr. Randolph is a man of distinguished talents. He tells us he is a mere retailer of poetry, utterly unfit for such a station. This observation presupposes in the gentleman from Vermont a capacity to form a correct judgment upon the subject. But his vain confidence does not stop here. He imagines himself better qualified to determine the fitness of the individual for the station he fills, than the President who nominated him, or the Senate who confirmed and approved the nomination; and obliquely censures the wisdom of those sages who placed the power of appointment where it now resides. What immeasurable vanity! To what extremes of folly it drives those who cherish it.

I have now to notice some of the observations made by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BROWN.] Before I do so, I must be allowed to say that I have often regretted, and never more than on the present occasion, the unsparing censure which that gentleman never fails to bestow on those who are opposed to him in politics. Charity never whispers that men who err, (which they who think differently from himself are always supposed to do,) err from mere mortal weakness—that perfection and infallibility are attributes reserved to himself by the God who created us, and that man, when turned out of the hands of his Maker, was, as he is now, a short-sighted mortal, not having the capacity to see, and to know, and to provide for all things that are to happen. He holds his opponents bound to know and to counterveil the high decrees of heaven. Censure so indiscriminate denotes the absence of an ennobling virtue, and baffles its own purposes.

The gentleman complains loudly of the appointment of Mr. Randolph, his want of talents, and his departure for Russia. The Machiavelian policy of the President represents him as putting his name to a message written by somebody else, and, in terms of contumely, concludes that the appointment was necessary to conciliate Virginia.

The first remark I have to make on this subject is, that, in my judgment, the subject of a speech does not exempt the speaker from the operation of those rules of decorum which a gentleman ever acknowledges in all places. Precedents, in the violation of those principles, acquire no sanctity or authority from the eminence of the individual by whom they are practised; the breach is more palpable and inexcusable in such persons, than when committed by those who may not be presumed to be so well informed of their obligations. But, Mr. Speaker, reckless as I know to be the temper in which this motion was made, and ruthless as I knew the war against all persons concerned in this appointment, I could not have imagined that the gentleman would have been betrayed into reflections, so gross and undeserved, upon the minister, the State from which he came, and the President from whom he received the appointment. There is, in a desperate attack upon an absent man, so little of that magnanimity and nobleness of mind which lofty spirits seek occasion to practise, that I could not have expected any one to seize a mere pretext to show himself wanting in those properties. But, sir, it only proves what I have long believed, that every exercise of the gentleman's powers, which are confessedly great, is directed with a view to the prevalence of some factious interest or party measure.

He tells us that the minister at Russia has fled from the rigors of the climate to foggy England, instead of resorting to the genial climate of Italy; and by an insinuation, unworthy of himself, intimates that the appointment was made to win over Mr. Randolph to the support of a weak administration, and to tempt the independence of Virginia. Sir, I am the slave of no faction. I have not sworn fealty to this administration, or sued for smiles and favor by the sacrifice of my independence. I am as when I first came here—free to approve all that is good, and bold enough to condemn all that is wrong, in the acts of the President. But, shall a man be held responsible for consequences which no human sagacity could avert? Shall censure await the man who, in making an appointment to a foreign mission, does not ensure that the objects of the mission are not impeded or delayed by the dispensations of Providence? Does the gentleman insist, as a part of his political system, that all appointments to foreign missions are injudicious, unless they are bestowed on men having the essential properties of Hygeia? Sir, is it reasonable to believe that the President, embarrassed, as he has been, with every species of opposition, would have appointed a man whom he knew to be unfit, either by want of talents, or want of health, to accomplish the objects of the mission? This would be strange, indeed, that he should give to his very indulgent opponents a theme upon which to lavish their abuse of him; or, is it more probable that the mission should have been accepted by Mr. Randolph, for the pleasure of falling sick in Russia? No, sir; it cannot be doubted that the mission was offered and accepted in the expectation that Mr. Randolph's health would enable him to remain in Russia until his object was accomplished.

But the gentleman has insinuated that the object was to flatter the minister, and the State from which he comes, into submission to the views of the President. Can it be necessary to remind the honorable gentleman of the noble disinterestedness and generous self-devotion of the person of whom he speaks, to convince him that the suggestion has no foundation? Need I remind him of that which the records of this House, and the chronicles of the times, will abundantly prove, that John Randolph has been opposed to those in power, from the days of General Washington to the last moment of Mr. Adams's administration, in order to show him and this House that he did not seek promotion by wooing and courting those who could dispense favors? No, sir; evidence in refutation of such a charge is wholly unnecessary, since the gentleman who made, and those who heard it, must be assured that it has been made, and is attempted to be sustained, by a zeal of opposition which seizes every occasion to diminish the popular fame of the individuals involved in it.

But, sir, the gentleman emphatically asks, where are John Randolph's monuments? He has not seen them—he has not heard of them. I answer, they are not to be found in the offices he has received at the hands of this Government. The records of appointment do not show them. It has not occurred in my day, nor in any other of which I have read, that opposition to power has been rewarded with promotion by those who are opposed. But I point the gentleman for an answer to his question to the people—there, in the hearts of his countrymen, he will find the monuments which gratitude for his devotion to their interests, and to the cause of liberty, has raised to him, and which continuing confidence cherishes with religious veneration. John Randolph, like the State which claims him, would not flatter “Neptune for his trident, or Jove for his power of thundering.”

The proffer of the appointment was made and accepted, in the hope and expectation that the best interests of the nation would be subserved; and if the minister has fallen sick, it is the act of God, not the crime of the President, or of the minister. Not less unfounded, or less excusable, is the insinuation that the appointment was necessary to conciliate Virginia. In what did the lure consist? In the offer of a foreign mission to one of her citizens, the gentleman would say. How long, may I inquire, sir, is it since the ambition of Virginia was tickled with such a toy? Cheap, indeed, must be her integrity, when it is struck off at such a bid. The insinuation is unworthy of the man who made it, and the place in which it was made. A fruitful subject for invective against the President has been found in that clause of his annual communication to this House, in which he states that Mr. Randolph was allowed to leave Russia in the event that the state of his health should render it necessary.

This appears to me, of all the monstrous things said by the gentleman in the course of his remarks, pre-eminent in absurdity. Will the gentleman have the goodness to inform me and the House whether there is any thing in the acceptance of a foreign mission which overrules the most valuable of all our natural rights—the right of self-preservation? If there is not, the permission accorded, and which is the source of the clamor, is no boon at all. It is nothing more nor less than he would have had a perfect right to do without it, and could not, with any color of impartiality, have been made a subject for censure, or the channel through which factious zeal should discharge its malevolence upon the devoted object. There are situations in life, there are offices of public trust, the duties of which require of the incumbent to brave every danger, rather than seek safety in flight.

The field of battle, and the soldier's post, are stations never to be abandoned without disgrace, while they can be maintained. But I am incapable of discerning any such similitude in the embassy to Russia to a military post, as should require the presence of the minister to be continued at the peril of his life.

I will no longer detain the House in listening to the defence of charges so unjust and so unmerited. I leave the gentleman to that remorse of conscience which must harass the man who has accused the innocent, and abused the virtuous. I am, for the reasons assigned, opposed to the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHILTON then obtained the floor; but the usual hour of adjournment having arrived, a motion for adjournment was made, and agreed to.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the instructions proposed to be given to the Committee on Public Expenditures relative to the computation of the mileage of members of Congress—the question being on the adoption of the amendment heretofore moved by Mr. HALL on the 12th instant.

Mr. HALL said it was not his purpose in rising to detain the House. You know, sir, said he, that I rarely obtrude myself upon the notice of the House; but I feel constrained to do so on the present occasion, because the committee to which I belong, and myself in particular as chairman, have, by the order of the House, been placed under a responsibility which it was my wish to have redeemed in a manner somewhat different from what seemed to meet the views of the committee. It is known to the members of the Committee on Public Expenditures, that my wish was at first to have reported a bill containing precisely the provisions now offered in the proposed amendment. The committee, however, were of a different opinion; and the report presenting my own views with some of the Postmaster General's, was made to the House, recommending, should it seem good to the House, to give imperative instruction to the committee to report a bill according to any of the plans proposed in the report. The committee were bound to consider the passage of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CURRIOS,] as an evidence of the intention or wish of the House that something should be done. It was under that impression that I wished to have reported a bill such as I have mentioned. The committee overruled me, as they had the right to do. Conceiving that the responsibility placed on me as chairman of the committee had not been redeemed, or thrown off in a manner entirely satisfactory, I have availed myself of the amendment now proposed to place the subject again before the House—having done so, the responsibility will rest there; and now, as to myself individually, it is of little importance what direction the House may give it. But I must be allowed to say, that if (as I felt bound to concede, from the large majority by which the resolution for inquiry was sent to the committee) it was the will of the House that some alteration in the mode of computing mileage of members should be made, after maturely examining the subject, I am decidedly of opinion that the plan proposed in the amendment now offered is the only one which can work any practical benefit. If this is not adopted, I feel perfectly satisfied that no alteration of the mere phraseology of the law will do any good. It is entirely immaterial whether the terms are most usual road, most usual post road, or most usually and necessarily travelled post route or road. A little examination into the subject will show, as indeed the letter of the Postmaster General clearly shows, that the result will be essentially the same, and that nothing like equality will be the result. This will be perceived when we consider that most who come to the seat of Government have to travel on curved lines. Those who live on the great public highway which runs from North to South, and do not live very remote from the seat of Government, not only travel upon the most usual public highway, but also upon the most usually travelled post route, and, at the same time, a direct, or nearly direct route. But they may, perhaps, overlook the fact, that others living at an angle either east or west of this great thoroughfare, are compelled to travel more or less in curved lines, and consequently further in proportion to the actual distance in a straight line, and that it is impossible to adopt, as is clearly shown, any rule which will operate precisely equal. A person living one hundred miles from Washington, on or near the great highway, running north and south through the country, would have but one hundred miles to travel, and be paid accordingly; but another might live not more than a hundred miles, and, from his peculiar situation, have to travel circuitously a hundred and fifty. The question is, whether he shall be paid for what he travels, or only for the actual distance from his residence to the seat of Government. The letter of the Postmaster General mentions several cases by way of illustration, to show that the post route system will not afford an equal rule. He mentions two cases which operate antithetically, the one to the North, the other to the South. By one, a member being paid according to the most usual post route, may yet have travelled only two-thirds of the distance paid for, while conversely, on the other, a member may travel on the most usual post route, and only be paid for two-thirds of the distance. And these, sir, are not hypothetical cases, though antithetical, and the converse of each other. These are not the only cases of this character; they are to be found in a vast number of instances. If it is believed by any one that any plan can be adopted to arrive either at equality or retrenchment, more effectually than the amendment proposes, I think him deceived. I go for retrenchment, real practical retrenchment; and the gentleman from Kentucky, who first introduced the resolutions relative to the subject of retrenchment, (for which he had my most hearty thanks,) will bear me out, when I say that I accompanied him pari passu around the whole journey he took upon the great road to retrenchment, voting for every feasible plan, or plan not feasible, which was proposed, under the committees instituted for the purpose; and now, according to the good old rule of "one good turn deserves another," all I ask of the gentleman is, to accompany me upon a direct line; my plan is a straight line, a mathematical line, the shortest line from point to point. By the bye, Mr. Speaker, what has become of the whole subject of retrenchment, of which we have heard so much for several years? Has it died a natural death, or, as an old neighbor of mine used to say of one who died calmly and silently, has it sauntered away? Take it altogether, sir, we have made but a sorry business of it. We have been palavering here about three years upon the general subject of retrenchment, and what have we done? Why, sir, so far as I am informed, all we have done has been to retrench one little mapmaker, who, if I am rightly informed, had a salary of $1,500 a year, for copying maps from copies of maps, taken by somebody else, from maps made by some other person. I do not vouch for this, sir; it is what, however, I have heard, I believe, both on this floor and elsewhere. And, sir, if I am also rightly informed, though we retrenched his salary of $1,500, by way of making amends, he has been re-engaged in the business, much more to his profit. This also I only give as I hear it. He had felt bound, in justification to himself, to place the subject again before the House; he had done so, and should there leave it. He begged leave, however, to correct an impression which, he understood, had been improperly made on the minds of some, that, in the remark in which he had used the word palavering, he had intended it to apply personally to some individual. This evidently was not the case, as must be plain to any one who heard the expression. The words were, "we have been palavering here about three years upon the general subject of retrenchment, and what have we done?" Evidently alluding to the general course pursued here; and I submit whether or not it has not been a fair subject for criticism. I hope no one will make an individual application of the expression to himself, or any one else. Mr. Speaker, as my object is to proceed at once with the subject, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIG submitted an amendment to the amendment, to add to it the words, "with an allowance of ten per cent. for variation from the direct line."

Mr. DE WITT moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Negatived—yeas 26, nays 159.

The question then recurring on the amendment submitted by Mr. CRAIG,

Mr. BAILEY handed to the Chair the following, which he was desirous of submitting as a substitute for the original amendment:

Strike out after the words "Resolved, That," and insert, so as to make it read—

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House:

It shall be the duty of the Committee of Accounts to report to the House, during the first session of each Congress, a statement of the distance of the residence of each member from the seat of Government; which statement, when approved by the House, shall be the rule for calculating the mileage of the members.

But it was declared to be out of order.

Mr. CRAIG assigned his reasons for offering his amendment. Some members lived on or near the direct line—others did not—and it was his object to pay to those who did not, an addition of ten per cent. to the usual allowance for mileage.

Mr. CHILTON opposed the amendment. If a bill was passed containing such a provision, it would be giving an advantage to those members who lived on the direct line of travel to the seat of Government, of ten per cent. over those who had to travel over a mountainous country, and by a circuitous route.

The question was then put on the amendment proposed by Mr. CRAIG, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. HALL, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Armstrong, John S. Storrs, William L. Storrs, Strong, John Thomson, Tracy, Vance, Whittlesey, C. P. White, Edward D. White, Young.—80.

So the amendment was adopted, in the words following: "Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Expenditures be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House a bill making it the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, with the aid of the Postmaster General, at the end of every session, to make an estimate, as nearly as possible, of the actual distance (in a direct line) of the residence of each member of the Senate, House of Representatives, and Delegate of a Territory, from the seat of Government; and that the mileage of members of Congress be computed, and their accounts for travelling be settled, according to such estimate."

Mr. VANCE and Mr. BATES both wished to propose further amendments; but they were declared to be out of order.

That proposed by Mr. VANCE was as follows: That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to publish, at the commencement of each Congress, in two of the public newspapers of the city of Washington, a statement of the mileage as charged by the members of their respective bodies.

The SPEAKER was stating how the gentlemen referred to could get at their object, when

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to address the House; but the SPEAKER said the hour for morning business had expired, and the subject must pass over for the present.

The orders of the day were then announced; when Mr. BUCHANAN moved that they be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the bill "for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States;" he said it was a matter of great importance, and he hoped the motion might prevail.

Mr. MERCER regretted that he should be obliged to oppose the motion; the bill for the relief of James Monroe had been made the special order of the day, and he wished it to be taken up, and, if possible, finally disposed of to-day.

CLAIM OF JAMES MONROE.

The motion to postpone the orders of the day was negatived; and, on motion of Mr. MERCER, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. FINDLAY in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "for the relief of James Monroe"—the question being on a motion of Mr. CHILTON to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

When the bill was last before the committee, Mr. CHILTON moved an adjournment, and was therefore entitled to the floor to-day; but he declined speaking on the subject.

Mr. SPENCER spoke at great length in favor of the bill, and, in the course of his remarks, vindicated the citizens of the city of New York in the course they had taken to procure the passage of a bill for Mr. Monroe's benefit.

Mr. COKE and Mr. BURGESS also spoke in favor of the claim.

H. OF R.]

Claim of James Monroe.

Mr. IHRLE, of Pennsylvania, said: If I were on this occasion to give way to my individual feelings, and permitted myself to be under their control, I should certainly support the claim of the petitioner. No gentleman upon this floor estimates the character and services of Mr. Monroe more highly than I do; and if it were possible to persuade myself to doubt upon this question, I would freely, and without hesitation, give my vote in favor of the bill. But I have in vain endeavored to satisfy myself with regard to its propriety, and the conclusion to which I have arrived has been to myself a subject of regret. Sir, it is a painful subject. That a citizen upon whom all the honors of the republic have been bestowed, who has reaped the rich harvest of rewards—whose fame and name stand identified with the glory and past history of his country—that such a man, in the evening of his day, should be impressed with a belief that his country is ungrateful or unjust, is indeed a circumstance much to be regretted. In the investigation of such questions, however, we are not permitted to yield to our sympathies, nor indulge in personal predilection—there are other considerations of a graver character, which must guide us in the course we ought to pursue.

In the view which I have taken of this claim, for obvious reasons, I have confined myself principally to the memorial of Mr. Monroe himself, which was laid upon our tables during the present session, and I think it is fairly embraced under the following items: First. For additional expenses in the employment of several assistant secretaries during his mission to France, in the year 1794, the rent of a house for their service, and other accommodations. Second. For extraordinary expenses in England and France, arising from his detention there. Third. For losses sustained in the purchase of a house in Paris. Fourth. For gratuities to the citizens of Paris, and for assistance extended to American citizens then in France, who made appeals to his generosity during his mission there. Fifth. For compensation in negotiating certain loans during the last war, whilst Secretary of War; and, lastly, interest upon all these items, to the present period.

In the memorial just referred to, Mr. Monroe puts his claim upon the ground that the Government is in his debt, and, in submitting it to your consideration, he expressly solicits no indulgence or favor. Sir, if the claim be proved a debt due, I apprehend no one here pretends to doubt but that it should be paid; and whether it be a debt or not, appears to me the only inquiry necessary or proper for us to make. By a reference to the report of the committee of Congress, in 1826, which was raised upon a claim at that time presented by Mr. Monroe, it will be perceived that an allowance was then made for two of the items composing the present claim, viz. For contingent expenses of the mission to France, from the 1st of August, 1794, to the 1st of January, 1797, the sum of one thousand four hundred and ninety-five dollars and eighty-five cents, that being the average allowance to all the American ministers in France, deducting one hundred and ten dollars previously received; and for extraordinary expenses incurred by Mr. Monroe's detention in England, by direction of his Government, for the space of two years and four months, the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars, together with interest upon both items from the 3d of December, 1810, to the 3d of December, 1825. The action of this House, then, having been already obtained, with regard to two of the items before enumerated, and now again presented, and the money having been paid, I consider that, with respect to them, the account is closed, and therefore, in the few remarks which I propose to submit, I will confine myself to the three remaining items of the demand.

It is not pretended by any one in favor of this bill, that Mr. Monroe had any instructions from his Government to purchase a house in Paris. The course thus by him pursued, is placed upon the grounds of expediency and of sound policy. I assume it for granted, therefore, that no such instructions were, in fact, given; and that the Government was not privy to the purchase. Sir, in a step so extraordinary, I would suppose that some previous intimation, at least, should have been given to his Government, and the necessity or policy of the measure explained. I have searched, in vain, for evidence upon this subject. There is none upon your records; and it is, therefore, that, in the absence of all proof of that description, I hold it incumbent on the friends of this claim to satisfy us that the measure was, at least, expedient. Indeed, I think, under all the circumstances, the expediency of the measure should be apparent. The Committee of Public Safety, in France, shortly after his recognition by the then existing Government, proffered to Mr. Monroe a national house for his accommodation, which he declined to receive, because of that clause in the constitution of the United States which forbade him to accept any present or emolument from a foreign Power; and, for fear this refusal on his part might be misinterpreted, it is said he purchased the property in question. Sir, I cannot perceive, notwithstanding all that has been spoken and proved upon this subject, that there existed any reasonable ground for this apprehension. Mr. Monroe had assigned the true and substantial reason for this refusal, and doubtless the reason thus assigned, in the opinion of the Committee of Public Safety, was entirely satisfactory, as it certainly was conclusive. The citizens of France, I cannot believe, could expect, that, in any transaction with their Government, he should violate the constitution of his own country. There is, therefore, in my humble apprehension, no soundness in the argument; there was no reasonable cause to fear the displeasure of the French Government.

I do not profess, sir, to be well acquainted with the course usually adopted by this Government with our foreign ministers, in regard to their residence. But I cannot understand why Government should at all interfere. Are not our ministers in this respect free agents? and is it not reasonable they should be? A mansion or a situation that would be agreeable to one, might not perhaps please another. One may prefer the quiet and seclusion of the country, another the bustle and life of a gay metropolis. One may prefer to live a plain republican, another to compete with the wealthy in the glitter of his equipage. Whatever the inclination in this respect may be, Government, I apprehend, does not interfere. I do not suppose, nor do I desire to insinuate, that Mr. Monroe was unnecessarily extravagant. I desire merely to show how very idle, nay, how very inconvenient it would prove, if Government should undertake to control its ministers in the selection of a residence. Sir, if it should proceed so far, it might as well go farther; and, besides selecting a residence, also control the expenditure of an outfit or a salary. Indeed, all that Government reasonably can require of its ministers, is an upright and vigilant discharge of their functions; that being accomplished, it will not stop to inquire where, or how they live—whether in a hut or a palace.

But I am wandering from the true point before me. It is said, however, that the purchase of a house assisted in giving the appearance of permanency to our amicable relations with the French republic. Sir, I cannot think so, unless the Committee of Public Safety were very easily convinced upon that subject, as they assuredly must have been if the mere purchase of property could induce such a belief. In reality, I cannot perceive what possible material difference there could be with the French Government, whether your minister's abode was in a rented mansion, for a term of years merely, or upon a purchased estate, at any time, at all times easily sold.

Claim of James Monroe.

[H. OF R.]

It is contended, I am aware, that Mr. Monroe, at the time he made the purchase, intended it for the use of the Government of the United States, and that the purchase was made with a view of making it the future residence of our ministers to France. Sir, I do not in the least doubt but that such was the intention of Mr. Monroe, because he says so now, and so declared it at that period. But to any one who will take the trouble to examine the documents upon your table on this subject, it will appear manifest, that if such was the intention of Mr. Monroe at the period of the purchase, that intention, beyond all doubt, was abandoned subsequently. Indeed, any other construction would place Mr. Monroe in a singular, perhaps unfavorable, attitude.
